In these terms he had exhorted and en courage his forlaid, he commanded them to take their repast and retire, to cherish and refresh their bodies, and to prepare themselves for the march. The moreow after he departed fro the banks of Rhodanum, and entered the inland parts of France: not for that it was the more direct way to the Alps, but because he thought the further he went from the Red sea, in to the lesser danger he should be meeting the Romans, with whom he was not minded to fight, before he was arrived into Italy. After that he had travelled four days journey, he came to an land: where the two rivers Atria and Rhodanum, flowing out of sundry parts of the Alps, and taking a direct course after they had run through a good part of the country fall at length together and meet in one, and the ground lying between is called by the name of the land. Near ther, inhabit the Allobroges, a Nation even in those days nothing inferior, either in wealth and piace, or in fame and reputation to any people or state of the Gauls whatsoever. But at that very time there was some disorder and uncertain among them, by occasion of two brethren who were at strife for the crown and kingdom: the elder whose name was Brandes, and had before enjoyed the Seigniori, was depriued and thrust out by his brother, and a holy crew of the youth: who as they had lived in their land, so they were the mightier. The deciding of this variance, was prepared and put out unto Arvalis, in as good and for a time for his purpose, as he could have wished it: and for want of such a time, the empress and judge, to determine whether of them both be King, who restored the elder to the Kingdom: like as it would have been adjudged by the award of the Senators and Nobles of the country. For when his feast and good humour he was, he was eaten with cares, and more of all things abundantly yeared and instrumental and apostate, who he was driven to provide a hand, for what the coldness were in rest.

Having so availed the duty of the Allobroges, and finding now to be forward to the Alps he would urge the direct right way but turned on the left hand to the Triabiges, and from there falling by the frontiers of the Vosuitians, he entered into the Tricenrians, and never was they tried or impeaded in his journey before that he came to the River Dunamun, where dependendoe out of the Alps, is of all other Rivers in France hard to be passed over: for although it carry with it a mighty force of water yet will it be need not be, because it is kept and restrained without banks; but running at once by many diverse channels, maketh ever new new foords, and caufeth up new shelves and whirl-pits; (for which cauheit a footman hath much ado to wade through them, and knoweth not the foords:) besides, it rolleth down round stones and pibles, whereby there is no fire nor fitle foot for him that would wade through. And it chance at that time, that it twelled and was riven high by fall of rain, and by land-floods, and caufeth them to have very much to do, that passeth over it: and over and besides all other difficulties, they were of themfelves troubled and disquieted through their own fearfulness and inndry cries which they made.

Pulius Cornelius the Conful, about three days after that Annibale dillocated from the bantl of Rheadumus, was arrived with his army (arranged in a fourquare bat-tel) as far as the place where the enemy was lately encamped, purpofing without any flay to give him battle, but feeing the hold abandoned, and that he was not like to overtake him, being too far gone forwards; he returned to his fins at Sea, purpofing by that means, with lefle danger and difficulty, to encounter Annibale as he defended from the Alps. But left that Spain (which was the Province allotted unto him) should be left difannihed of Roman fuccours; he fent his brother Cn. Setio with the greateft part of his forces againſt Africful: not to much to de-fend their old allies, and procure new, as to drive Africful out of Spain. Himself with a very small company returned to *Gennia, with intent to guard Italy, with that army which was about the Po.

Annibale being departed from Duuentia, marched for the moft part through the champion coutries, and came in peace and quietly, to the foot of the Alps, for any trouble from the peafants that there inhabited. And albeit he had fome knowledge of the Alps before by report, (which uelt to make things that are uncertain, much more than indeed they are) yet feeing now neer at hand the height of thofe Hills, and the fnows, entermingle along with the skie; the rude and miffappen houfes let upon rooks; the cattel, fheep, oxen, and horses, finged with cold; the people with long flagg'd hair; and without any trimming, both living and liveliefs creatures, even parched, fift and ftark with frott; and all things else more strange and ilia vour'd, than can be fpoken: then began his fouldiers to fear afreight. So foon as they advanced forward, and began to march up the firt cliffs, there appeared over their heads the mountain people, who had feiz'd the Hills: who if they had kept the fecret and hidden vallies, and suddenly all at once charged upon them they would have made a foul slaughter of them, and put them to flight. Then Annibale commendanthe the enigns to fland still, and fent certain Gauls afore, as epifals: by whom L he understood, that there was no paffage that way: whereupon, he pitched his camp among the thole craggy and steep rough places, upon as large a plain and valley as he could find. Then by the fame Gauls (who much differed not in tongue and manners from the other, and had enterminglethemelves in talk with the mountaineers) he understood, that they kept the paffage, but in the day time, and flipt away in the night every one to his own harbour. So at the break of day he mounted thofe steep hills: as if he would openly in the day time march through the ftreights. Thus having fpent the day in making fellaneous and fweat of one thing, and intending another, he encamp'd himfelf strongly in the place where he had retted and flaid: and fo foon as he per ceived, that the mountain people were departed from the steep hills, and kept not fo freight watch and ward after that he had made fweat of fires, more than for the number of thole that re mained behind; and left with the Cavafly all the bag and baggage, with the greateft part of the foemen: himfelf in perion took unto him the nimblineft, moft active, and valiant fouldiers lightly appointed, and with all speed paffed through the ftreights aforefaid, and encamped on the very hills which the enemies before held and beleit. Then in the morning befone his camp dillocated: and the army behind, begun to march and fteit forward. By which time the mountaineers, at the ordinary signal given, came forth out of their Calfles and Forts, and met at the utlal place of their accustomed guards: but then all at once they might fee fome of the enemies over their heads, to have gained their own fforts, and others alo marching in the way. Both which objeets at one time prented to their eye, made them blant and to fland till in a mutf a good while. But afterwards, when they faw Annibale his army, dilfreted in the ftreights, and in great trouble and disorder among themselves in the march, by reafon especially the horses were to affrighted: supposing, that the half fear and terror (besides) that they could procure, would be enough for their enemies overthrow and confufion, they croffed the rooks overtime, and (as they were accultur'd and ufed to them) ran to and fro, up and down through the blind and unhainted wayses. But then veily, the Carnaginians were much eneumbred, as wellby their enemies, as also by the diadvantage of the place, and more ado there was among them (whiles every one firove who should ftill escape the danger) than with the enemy. There was nothing that disorder'd and troubled the army in the march; fo much as their own horses, which (by reason of the diflomant and divers cries that the echoes between the woods and vallies redounded) were affrighted: and also if any of them chance to be ftricken, galled, or wounded; they kept ftill wining, and flinging a-out them, that they overthrew and made great havoc of men, and of all forts of carriage. Besides, the pref was fo great, and the ftreights of both fides fo steep and craggy, that many a man was thrown down head-long a mighty height: yea, and some of them armed; and the humper horfes and beasts for carriage especially tumbled downmain with their load as ita hone or Catfile had come down with a mift hief, Which, although it were terribile behoid, yet Annibale for a while stood still and kept his own men together, for fear of encroaching this disorder and affright. But after then he law his army disbanded and marching in difarray, and that it was no pur-
A post to lead his army safe through the freights, if he loft the carriages: for fear thereof, he ran down from the higher ground, and albeit with the violence of his charge, he discomfited the enemy, yet he encraved the trouble and fear of his own people. But that was seen appeased in a very moment, after the ways and passages were once cleared, by reason of the Mountainiers that were fled; so that within a while the whole host passed through, not only at ease and leisure, but also in a manner without any noise at all. This done, he seized upon a Castle, which was the chief strength of that country, with other villages lying about it; and for three days space he victualled and trained his whole army, with the Castle of his prisoners. And for that he was now neither molested with the Mountainiers, who were at the hill discomfited, nor greatly embroiled with the difficulties of the ways, in those three days he rid a good deal of ground, and journeied a great way into the country; and all at the length he came to another coast well peopled (for such Mountain and Hilly quarters) where he had like to have been overtaken, not by open force, but even in a secret professed cunning: first, by a sudden practive, and after by a secret ambush. Certain ancient men, the Rulers and Governors of the Cattles, repaired unto Ambali as Orators, saying, That they having been taught and made wise, by the profitable example of other mens harms, made choice, rather to trye the amyte, than prove the force of the Carthaginians; and therefore were willing to do his commandment, and be at his desire: requesting him to take at their hands victuals and guides for their journey, yea, and hostages also for better assurance of promises to be performed. Ambali neither overhastily believing them, nor yet curthily distrustfull and requiting their offer, left being rejected and cast off, they might become open and professed enemies; gave them good language, and a courteous answer, received the hostages whom they gave; accepted victuals, which they had brought with them to maintain his army by the way, and followed their guides, but so, as his army was not disarray'd in their march, as if he had been amongst his friends, and in a peaceable country. First, went in the van-guard the Elephants, and the Horsemen; himself marched after with the flower and strength of his Footmen, looking all about him with an heedfull eye. So soon as he was entered a narrow passage, which of the one side lay under a steep Hill that commanded them alof, the barbarous people roole out of their ambusc from all parts at once, both before and behind, and charged upon him both a far and near at hand; yea, and rolled down mighty huge Itones upon them as they marched. But the greatest number came behind upon their backs; against whom he turned and made head with the power of his footmen, and without all peradventure (if the tail both of his army, had not been strong and well fortified) they must needs have received in that lane and freights, an exceeding great overthrow.

And even then, as it was, they came to an extremity of danger, and in manner fell into a sudden mischace. For whilrne Ambali made long stay, and doubted whether he should engage the Regiment of footmen within the freights, for that he had not left any lurours in the rearguard to back the footmen, like as himself was a deien: to the Horsemen: the mountainiers came overthwart, and flanked them; and breaking through the files of the battel, before the way, and crossed upon him. So that Ambali took up his lodging for one night, without his carriages and Horsemen.

The morrow after, when as the barbarous people ran between them more coldly than before, he joyed his forces together, and passed the freights not without great damage and loss; but with more hurt of the impetous Hories than of men. After this, the Mountainiers (fewer in number, and in robbing wife rather than in warlike sort) ran in heaps upon the vanguard, other upon the rearward, as any one of them could either get the vantage of ground, or by going one while afore, and by slaying another while behind win and catch any occasion and opportunity. The Elephants, as they were driven with great leisure, because through their narrow freights, they were ready ever and anon to run on their noses: to what way foremost they went, they kept the army safe and sure from the enemies: who being not util'd into them, durst not once come neer. The ninth day he won the very tops of the Alps, through by-lanes and blind cranks: after he had wandered many times out of the way, either through the deceptualnes of their guides: or for that when they durst not trust them, they adventured rashly themselves upon the valleys, and guessed the way at adventure, and went by aim. Two days abode he encamped upon the tops thereof; and the fouldiers wearied with travel and fight relifted that time: certain also of the impetous Elephants (which had slip aside from the rocks) by following the tracks of the army as it marched came to the camp. When they were thus overtoiled and wearied with the tedious travels, the now that fell (for now the far Verg'ty was set and gone doon out of that horizon) incrcased their fear exceedingly. Now when as at the break of day the ensigns were set forward, and the army marched slowly, through the thick and deep snow; and that there appeared in the countenance of them all, slothfulness and desperation: Ambali advanced before the standards, and commanded his fouldiers to stay upon a certain high Hill, (from thence they had a goodly prospect and might see a great way all about them) and there shewed unto them Italys, and the goodly champian fields about the Po, which lie hard under the foot of the Alpine Mountains: saying, That even then they mounted the wals not only of Italy, but also of the City of Rome: as for all besides (faith he) will be plain and easy to be travelled: and after one or two battles at the most, yea shallhave at your command, the very Castle and head City of all India. Then began the army to march forward: and as yet the enemies verily themselves adventured nothing at all, but some petty robberies by stealth, as opportunity and occasion served.
How eit they had much more difficulte travelling down the hill, than in the climbing and getting up; for that most of the passage to the Alps from Italy side, as they be thrones, to they are more upright: for all the way in a manner was steep, narrow, and slippery, so as either they could hold themselves from falling, nor any tripped and stumbled never so little, could they possibly (they staggered so) recover themselves and keep faire footing: but one fell upon another, as well Herse as Man. After this they came to a mian narrower rock, with crags and rags so steep down- right, that hardly a nimble poulter without his armor and baggage (do what he could take to hold with hands upon the twigs and plants: that there about grew forth) was able to creep down. This place being before naturally of it self steep and pendent with a down fall, now was doubled and dammed up with a new fall of earth, which left a bank behind it of a wonderful and monstrous height. There the Horsecmen stood still as if they had been come to their wayes end: and when Amnial marveled much what the matter might be that stayed them so, as they marred not one word was brought him that the Rock was inaccessible and impassable. Whereupon he went himself in person to view the place, and then he saw indeed without all doubt, that although he had fetched a compas about, yet he had gained nought thereby, but conducted his army, to goe through wilds, and fo places as before had never been heared and troden. And verily that (of all others) was such, as it was impossible to pass through. For whereas they lay old snow untouched and not troden on, and over it other snow newly fallen, of a small depth of this soft and tender snow, and the same not very deep, their feet as they went easily took hold; but that snow, being once with the going of so many people, and beales upon it, frettet and thowed, they were hard to go upon the bare ice underneath, and in the flabby snow-broth, as it retarded and meted about their heels. There they had little ado and much fargling: for that they could not trie not intire upon the flabby ice: and again going as they did (down hill) their feet sooner failed them: and when this they had helped themselves once in getting up, either with hands or knees, if they chance to fall again, when there their props and stayes deserted them: there were no twigs nor roots about, whereon a man might take hold, and rest or lay himself, either by hand or foot. And therefore all that the poor beales could do, was to tumble and wallow only, upon the flappetly and glassy ice, and the molten flabby snow. Otherwhiles also they persifled as they went in the deep snow, whiles it was yet soft and tender; for when they were once fliend and fallen, with flogging out their heels, and beating with their hoods more forcibly for to take hold: they broke the ice through: so as most of them, as if they had been caught full and lettered, stuck full in the deep, hard frozen, and concealed ice. And when, as in both man and beast were wearied and overedded, and all to no purpose, they entrenched upon the top of an hill, having with very much ado cleaned the place aforehand for that purpose: such a deal of snow there was to be dugged, lovelved, and thrown out. This done, the soldiers were brought to break that rock through which was their only way: and against the time that it was to be hewed through, they fellid and overthrew many huge trees that grew there about, and made a mighty heap and pile of wood: the wind lenten slyly, for the time to kindle a fire, and then they set all a burning. Now when the rock was on fire and red hot, they powred thereupon strong Vinegar for to calcine and dissolve it. When as the rock was thus barked (as it were) with fire, they digged ino it, and opened it with pick-e-axes, and made the decent gentle and easy, by means of moderate windings and turnings: so as not only the Horses and other beales, but even the Elephants also might be to goe down. For forty daies he spent about the levelling of this rock: and the beales were almost placed and lost for hunger. For the hill tops for the most part are bare of grass, and look what forage there was, the snow overhild it. The dale and lower grounds have some little banks lying to the sun, and rivers withal, near unto the woods, yes, and plains more meet and beleiving for men to inhabit. There were the labouring beales put out to graze and pastures, and the soldiers that were wearied with making the wayes, had three daies allowed to rest in. From thence they went down into the plain country, where they found both the plain more easy and pleasant, and the nature of the inhabitants more tractable.

In this manner, and by this means principally, entred the Carthaginians into Italy, five months after they departed from new Carthage (as some write) and within fifteen daies overcame and passed the Alps. What power Amhia had, when he was arrived in Italy, the historians do not agree. They that speak with the most, write that he was 100000 foot, and 20000 horse strong; they that make the list of it, say they were 20000 foot, and 6000 horse. L. Cicerio Alimentus, who had delivered under his hand, that himself was taken prisoner by Amhial (a writer of great authority) would induce me sufficiently to believe him, but that lettereth the number of conveyed, by adding to the rest, the Gauls and Ligurians. He recorded, that counting them, the Infantry was 80000, and the Cavalry 10000, which was conducted into Italy (but likely it is that from all parts there came more thither than so, and some Authors do report) and that he heard from Ambial his own mouth, that after he had pased Rhodius, he had lost 36000 men, and a great number of Horses and other beales of burden, when he was come down into the Taurine Country, which was the next Nation in Italy, adjoyning to the Gauls. Which being a thing agreed upon amongst all, I marvel so much the more that there is any doubt, on which side he went over the Alpes, and that commonly it is believed, that he pased by a space called Penniunes, and that thereupon the top of the Alpes took the name, and was so called. Chius faith, he took his way over by the top of Cerastes, both which passages freely would have brought A brought him not into the Taurins country, but through the mountain forests, unto the Gauls called Libu. But neither is it probable that in those days the same passages were open into France, considering, that the ways which led to Penninus were environed with nations half German. And certainly the Veeragins, who inhabit this very top (in case a man may build ought upon this conjecture) never knew that these mountains took the name of any passage of the Carthaginians, that way: but of some one place conjectured in the top of the hill, which the peasants and mountaineers called Penninus.

Very happily and fitly it fell out for the enterprise of his first disembarkings, that the Taurins the next nation he came unto made war upon the Inhabitans, But Annibal being butt'd in refreshing his army (that now had lost a great deal of their strength which they had caught before) could not bring with him the aid and gratifying of either party; for cale after cale, plenty upon plenty, very good keeping and delicate after local home delicacies, did by a sudden change greater alter and dil-

...and so, vanquished and degraded Anniab, But perdid centurie its form, and reason would, that the league of the gods themselves without man's help should against that nation and which had broke the same. Such as, and covenants, begin the war first; let it in good order, and bring to the point of an end; and then we, who next to the gods have been offended and wronged, should smite the same thus begun to our hands, and brought to so good an end. I fear not that any man here doth think, that I utter these brave and glorious words only to elicit you, and that my other thoughts in heart, then shall I speak with tongue, I might have gone my way well enough into Spain; my proper and peculiar province, (where I had been aforetime) and with an army of mine own! I should have had my brother there, both a counsellor to me in my discontents, and a companion with me in my dangers, I found Anniab rather then Anniab mine enemy, and I no doubt, the affairs and charge of the war far less then here. But when I failed by the coat of France, and upon the brink and news of this enemy was left a land, I sent my cavalry before and removed compass as to Rhodanius, and in a battle of horsemens (for with that part of my foot) it was my hap to encounter and fight: I discomfited the enemy: and for that by land I could not overtake him instantly, so halting they marched away, like men that fled. I was intent to return to the sea, and embark again into my ships: and with a great expedition and speed as I could make (considering how great a compass about of sea and land) at the very foot of the Alps, I was ready to encounter and affront him. Can it be thought when thus whipped I shunned and avoided fight, I fell by chance and at unawares upon this dread and dreaded enemy? or rather, that I followed him hard at heaps and challenged him, to draw him forth unto a battle, whereby to have it decided who should have the victory in the end? I would gladly make trial whether all of sudden the earth hath brought forth for these twenty years. Carthaginians, of another mould or new ramp; or whether they be the same that fought near the islands Lentes and whom ye went away, and let go from Erry, valued after the rate of a. * deniers a piece, and no more: and I would be wise, whether this Anniab be the concurrent of Hercules, to undertake this journey's voyages, as he with himself; or one left by his father, a tributary, a vaal, and a slave of the people of Rome; who, but that he is contented in mind concerning the outrage and cruelty committed upon Saguntum, would have some respect and regard, if not of his native country (conquered and subdued) yet of his own house, of the peace and covenants written by his father Amphil, and his own hand: Amphil (say) who at the commandment of our Conful, removed his garrison from Erry: who fuming and storming, received with forrowful heart the grievous and heavy conditions of peace imposed upon the conquered Carthaginians; who capitulated and covenanted to abandon Sicily, and to pay a tribute to the people of Rome: I would have you therefore (my hardy friends) to fight against him not only with the same courage as you do with other enemies, but in a certain heat of cholera and indignation, as you should see our own friends and slaves on sudden to rise up in arms against you. We might well if we had been so minded, when they were enclosed and shut within Erry, have put them to the utmost extremity of all worldly pain, and famished them. We might have passed over with our victorious Armado into Africa and with few days forced and razed Carthage, without any battle fought. We patched them at their humble request, and took them to mercy; we let them M out where they were besieged and beleaguered; and notwithstanding that they thereby were subdued, we made peace and contracted emity with them: and afterward, when they were molest and diludled with the Africans war, we counted them within our protection. In recompence of these good fortunes and favours, they come against us; under the leading of an humorous brain-fick and furious young man, to invade and assail our country. And I would it had pleased God; that we had all this war for our honor only and reputation, and not for our safety and our lives. But we are to fight now, not for the holding and possession of Sicily and Sardines, as in times past; but for our freedom, and the inheritance of Italy: and that which more is, there is no army behind our backs to withstand and make head against the enemy, if we chance to fail of victory: neither are there any more Alps which while he is getting over we might have leisure in the mean time to assemble and prepare new forces. Here in this very place (foothers) shall we stand to it, and make resistance as if we were fighting under Rome walls. Let every man think that he is not only to defend and ward his own body, but to protect his wife and little children and let every one regard and take care, not for his private affairs and domestical charge, but only consider this, That even now the Senator and people of Rome beholdeth and feeth our hardy deeds, and look how our force and valor now speedeth and sheweth it itself, such from henceforth will the state and fortune be of that City and Empire of Rome.

These words had the Conful to the Romans, But Anniab, supposing that his men were first to be encouraged by the representation of some deeds: and then exhorted with words; having marshalled his army in a round compass (as it were) to behold some spectacle in a Theatre: he set in the midst of them all, the prisoners mountebanks bound (as they were) hand and foot: and calling down at their feet: the armor and weapons of the Gauls he demanded of them by a trumpeter or interpreter, Which of them (upon condition to be eased of his bands, and to have armor, and an horse of service, given him for a prize of victory) would enter into combat, and fight at the utterance for his life. And when they all answered with one voice, That they would with no better, and not one of them but called for a sword & required to fight: and therupon, the lots were shuffled to be cast, & not one there was but wished himself to be the man, whom fortune would chuse for the combat. Then Then every man as his lot fell, in token of cheerfulness and composure of spirit, leapt for joy among his fellows that rejoiced in his behalf, fell a dancing after their manner, and lo (hailily) took arms and weapons: all the while that they were in fight there appeared such affection and disposition of mind, as well in them that were in the same state and condition, as also in those who stood there as spectators only in the multitude to look on: that no less happy and fortunate were they accounted, who chance it was to die in the place then those who had the upper hand. Upon the fight of some couples that were thus matched in combat, he dissected them and whilst he saw them in this good mind, so well affected and rejoicing, then he assembled them all together to an audience, and thus by report he spake unto them,

My valorous foundiers, if in the consideration of your own fortune, ye will anon but be of that mind, which even now ye shewed in beholding the example of the fate of others; the journey is yours, and we have the victory. For that was not but a dumb thou and bare pageant, but a very mirror and pattern of your own condition: and I wot not, whether fortune hath compassed about with harder bonds and greater necessities, your own selves, or your prisoners. On both hands, as well the right as the left, enclosed ye are, and shut up within two seas; and have not so much as one ship to embark in for to escape away, and save your selves. Before you rear at hand is the Po, a greater river, and more violent then Rhodanus: behind you are the Alps to hem you in: the Alps, I say, which ye hardly sawed when you were in heart and lusty, Here must ye either get victory (firs) or lose your lives, even where ye have first encountered your enemies: and the same fortune, which hath laid upon you necessity of fight presenteth and profereth unto you, (if you go away with victory) such rewards, as men use not to wit for greater and more honeetable at the hands of the immortal gods. If by your manhood and valour we should but recover and win again Sicily and Sardinia, which were got from our fathers: those were rewards and prizes sufficient; but now, over and besides, what riches or treasure the Romans in so many triumphs, have gathered laid up, and held in possession, all that will be ours ever, and the owners thereof themselves withal. Go to it then a Gods name, and take arms, in assured hope of gaining for rich a booty and reward, Ye have all this while been enough a courting and chasing the wild beasts in the wide and desert mountains of Lyctania and Citeria, and have seen no recumbence and fruit of your travels and dangers: it is now high time for you to serve in the wars for good pay and rich rewards, and to receive great wages and prizes for your labour and painful service; you that have measured so long a voyage, pass'd over so many mountains and rivers, and marched through so many armed and warlike nations. Here is the place where fortune hath fet down the utmost bound, and pitched the farthest point & limit of your labors: here will the give you a condigne recumbence and fally, after you have served and followed the wars the full time, by order and law required, Never think that the victory will be so hardly achieved, as the war in name is counted difficult. For oftentimes an enemy of small or no reckoning and regard, hath given a bloody battle; yea, most noble States, most renowned and glorious Kings, have in the very turning of an hand been overthrown. For, setting aside this godly, gay, and glittering name only of the Romans, what is there wherein they are with you to be compared? To say nothing of that continual warfare of yours, for 20 years since, with fain valour and happy success: even from Hercules pillars, from the Ocean, from the utmost bounds of the earth, through to many nations of Spain, and most fell and cruel Gauls, ye are come thus far with victory. And now shall ye fight with an army of new and untrained foundiers, who no longer ago then this very summer, were beaten, put to the sword, vanquished and beggared by the Gaulian army (to say a truth) not known at all to their own Captain, & as little acquainted with him. And to speak of mine own person, if I not born yet at leastwise brought up in the very tent and royal pavilion of my father (a most noble warrior and renowned Captain of bis time) who have subdued Spanin, conquered Gauls, overcome not only the people of the Alps, but that which is much more, the very Alps themselves. Should I make comparison between my selfe, and this half-year Captain, who hath abandoned and left his own camp and army? Unto whom, if a man should this day, present the Carthaginians and Romans together, without their ensigns and colours, he could not tell, I dare well say, of whether army he were the leader and Conful, For I make no small account, I tell you of this (my tall fellows) that there is not one of you all, who hath not many a time and often seen and beheld my self in person, performing some warlike and military exploit: and unto whom I (as beholder and eye-witness of his valor) cannot recount the time and place of his worthy deed & service. Then ye praised and recommended me, then ye rewarded & honored me with divers gifts & presents, And even I who have been a foundier trained up and taught by you, before I was your General will march in battle against them, that know not one another and are unknown to each like unto his Captain. Which way ever I turn and call mine eyes, me thinks. I see all full of courageous romack, and forrible puissance. The footmen, old beaten and prastiifh foundiers-lances and men of arms, with hard bards, and the light horsemen likewise, chosen forth of most hardy and valiant Nations: of one side, most faithful and trustworthy allies; on the other. Doubtfull Carthaginians ready to fight, as well in countries defence, as also for most just and due revenge. We come of our selves to make war, and we descend into Italy with banners displayed, resolved to fight with so much more courage, as they commonly who are associates, have greater romack and more hope then the defendents. Over and besides, our hearts are kindled, and our minds pricked. on and provoked with fene of injuries and indignities. First and foremost they required, that I your General should be delivered unto them, a condemned prisoner at the bar: then they would have had all you that were at the assault of Segusium, yielded up into their hands, to be put to most extremt tortures & execution. A people they are, in all of excessive cruelty inolent and proud beyond all measure: they would have but all in their power; and at their disposition: they must prescribe, limits, and let down, with whom we should war; with whom we may make peace; restraining and enjoining us within the terms and bounds of bills and rivers; which, forsooth we must not pass: and they themselves keep not the limits; which they appoint, Paes not (say they) Iberus in wise; meddle not at all with the Segusiones; come not near them, Segusium standeth upon the river Iberus, slip not one foot forward, we advise you. If I sufficeth not their turn, that they have taken from us our ancient Provinces, Sicily and Sardia-mina, unless they may have away Spain too. And if I should depart from thence, and quit that Realm also, they would not stay there, but will pass over straight into Africa: may, they have sent over this year already two Confuls, the one into Africa, the other into Spain: nothing have they left for us, but that which we can win and hold with the lords point. Well may they be cowards, and play the idle lusks, having a place of refuge to retire unto, who in their own country and ground may be received, when they take their heels and run through ways without danger, to save themselves. As for us, it stands us upon to play the men, and to make account of no mean designs between victory and death but upon certain despair of all fleves befides, either to obtain victory, or fortune shall fail and give us the spoil, chuse rather to die fight-K

ning, than to be killed flying. If this be letted and deeply imprinted in your hearts, if this be your resolution, I will lay once again, The day is yours. A more poyant and sharper good, than this, to provoke men to victory, never gave the immortal gods to any whatsoever.

When by these Orations, the fouldiers hearts of both sides were inflamed to fight, the Romans made a bridge over Tisemis; and for defence of the bridge erected a fence and fort thereupon. But Amnibal while the enemies were bate at work, sent Mahabal with a Cornet of Numidians, to the number of 3000. light horse-men, to overrun and waste the territories belonging to the allies of the people of Rome: commanding him withall, to make as great a noise of the Gauls as he could, and to looll, it and perivade their Nobles and Lords unto rebellion. After the bridge was finished, the Roman army passed over into the Infurbians country, encamped themselves upon certain hills, five miles off from a village where Amnibal allo lay in camp: who seeing there was a battel toward, went specifly for Mahabal back again, and the horfemen: and thinking belike, that he could never stay enough to his fouldiers, and admoni them sufficiently to do well and animate them to fight, he called them all again together to an audience: where he proposed, and promised unto them openly, certain affered rewards, the hope where of might incite them to fight namely, Imprimit, that he would endow them with fair lands in Iberius, Africa, or Spain, where they would themsefes to have, and enjoy to him, and to his heirs forever, as free hold in frank tenures, with out service: if any one would chufe to have money rather then land him he would content with shage, they should have their free burgeoie: & thole that had a mind rather to return home again, M he would endeavor and bring about that he should live so well, as not one of them would with what bond servants attended and followed their masters, to them he promised immence: and that inliem of them, he would deliver again unto their matters. two for one, of the faves taken captives in war. And that they might be affered, that he would perform all these promises, he held with his left hand a Lamb, and in the right a flight stone, and prayed solemnly, That if he failed herein, Jupiter and the rest of the gods, would so kill him, as he flew that Lamb: and presently after his prayer done, he immote the Lamb on the head, and dash it out the brains. Whereat they all every one, conceived and embraced affered hope unto themselues, that the gods said Amen and were on their side: and supposing that the only flay of enjoying their hopes, and obtaining their rewards, was, because they had not fought already; with one heart and voice they called for battel.

The Romans for their part, were nothing lo loy: for besides other things, they were affrighted with new prodigies and fearful fights. For it hapned that a Woll entered their camp, & after he had worried and roim thole that came in his way, escaped unhurt. Also a swarm of Bees fettled upon a tree that grew over the General’s pavilion. Which strange tokens being purged and cleared by an expiatory sacrifi ce, Sepio with his Cavalry and darts lightly appoinled, went toward the camp of the enemy to view their forces; and to observe how many and of what condition and quality they were; and there he encountered Amnibal, who alfo was gone forth with his horfemen to difcover the country about. At the firft they saw not one another but afterwards, by reason of the thick dust that rofe upon the march of so many men and horses, they knew that enemies approached nearer.
On both fides the battalions made a stand, and every man buckled him to the skirmish. Sepio placed his Archers and horfemen of the Gauls in the forefront: the Romans and strength of Allies, he bestowed behind for succours in the rearguard, Amnibal for in this battel, his great barbled horses with his lances and men of arms, and strengthened the wings with Numidian horfemen.
The very first charge and shout was faire done, when the Archers aforefaid retired among the rearguard in the second battalion: by occasion whereof, the horfmen alonesought a good while in

A battle: ye, and afterwards, because the footmen that were intermingled among troubled and disorder the horses, many either fell or else alighted from their horses, to go thither: where they saw their fellows to be environed and overcharged. The conflict became very doubtful in many places until such time as the Numidians (who were in the wings) wheeling about by little and little, drove them before the backs of the Romans: this fearful light troubled them greatly, and the fear was increased by reason of the Consul: his horse: the extreme danger whereof, was put by and avoided by the rescue of his son (then a very striking, as yet, and scarce had any hair upon his face) this youth is he, who had the honor of happy ending this war, unnerved afterwards upon the noble victory and memorable conquest over Annibals and the Carthaginians.

B) He was, but the Archers were they that fled fairest away, even those whom the Numidians left upon flight. The rest that were horsemen, keeping thick and close together, recovered their Consul within their files into the midst of them: and protecting him not only with their weapons, but also with their bodies, brought him back safe unto the camp: retiring all the way neither disorderly, nor like fearful men or hostile. The honor of saving the Consul, Cestius attributed unto a bondman of Liguria. But Verily would rather believe it of the son: which also the greater number of authors do affirm: but the common tame goeth of the said bondman. This was the first battle with Annibals: wherein it only appeared that the Carthaginians were better in Cavalry, and therefore the open plain field as it were between the Po and the Alps, were not so good for the Romans to fight in. The night following therefore, Scipio commanded his soldiers secretly

C) without any noise to truss up bag and baggage, and to dilodge: and removed from Ticius, and made haste to Po: that whiles his boats were not yet unlooked one from the other, in which (as upon a bridge) he had brought over his army, he might without any trouble and pursuit of the enemy, conduct the same back again. And they came to Placentia before that Annibals knew they were departed from Ticius; howbeit, he took some of them that made stay on the other side of the bank, as they were too slow about disjoining and loozening the foretold bridge of boats: upon which he could not pass over, by reason that when both ends were let loose, the planks and all, went down the water with the stream. Cestius wrote, that Mago with his horse, and Spanish horsemen, presently, swarm over the river: and that Annibals himself fell over his army at the upper foords of Po; for which purpose, he sent the Elephants along on arrow to break and bear of the

D) Violence and fire of the current. A thing surely that they were hardly able to do, who were skilful and by long experience knew the nature of the River very well. For it is neither not like a horsemen, with their armor and horses safe, could overcome so great a rage of the river, although we should grant that all the Spaniards got over on blown bladders or leather vessels, and besides, they had needed many days to fetch a compass for to find the foords of Po, over which, the army (laden with carriage) might be conveyed. But those authors carry more credit and authority with me, who write that scarcely in two days they found a place to make a bridge (of planks joined together) over the river, and that Mago and the Spanish light horsemen were sent that way over before.

While Annibals on this side of the River, laying in giving audience to the embassages of the Gauls, E) he conducted over the regiments of footmen more heavily armed: in the mean while, Mago and the horsemen, after they had passed the river, marched one 3 days journey space toward the enemies of Placentia. And Annibals (few days after) encamped himself strongly six miles from Placentia: and the morrow after in the sight of the enemies he put his men in array, and made them offer of battle. The night following there was a petty mistique committed in the Romans camp by the Gauls that came to aid: but greater was the garboil and tumult, then the harm indeed. For about 2000 footmen, and 200 horsemen, having lain the warders at the gates, fled away to Annibals: whom he spake courteously unto, and when he had drawn them on in hope of great gifts and rewards, he dismissed every one into his own City and Country to solicit and persuade their countrymen to side with him. Scipio taking that mistique as a forstoken and overture to the Gauls

F) revolt in general: and supposing, that now being once guilty and tainted with this offence, they would in a madness run all to take arms and rife. Although till he were once his late wound, yet the night following at the relief of the fourth watch, he marched swiftly, and removed his camp near the river Trebia, into the higher countries, and hills that were more troublesome for men of war. But he wrought not so closely and without the knowledge of the enemy, as he did at Ticius. For Annibals having sent out, first, the Numidian light horse, and then all his Cavalry: without question had disorder and endamaged the rereward. but that the Numidians for greediness of prey and booty, diverted aside, and turned into the tents, abandoned and forlorned of the Romans. Where, whiles they spent time in raffacking and riling every corner of the camp (and when all was done, could find no pillow worth the stay) the enemy creased their hands. And when as they had eloped a few of them that lingered about the river and flew them, Scipio not only to abide any longer the grief and pain of his wound, by reason of the shaking and thronging of his body as he travelled: and thinking it good to expect the coming of the other Consuls his Colleagues, (whom he heard already to be sent out of Sicily) chose out a place near the river which seemed most safe for to encamp in, and it he fortified. Annibals also lay not far off in camp; who as he was proud upon the late battle of horsemen, so was he perplexed for want of victuals, which scarcity encroached upon him every day more and more.

as he travelled through the enemies country, finding no place provision aforhand. Whereupon, he went to Clusium, a town wherein the Romans had belewed and laid up great store of grain: where, as he prepared with violence to for the town, there appeared some hope of treason, by corrupting of P. Brandinius, the captain of the garision there, and that with no great sum of money: for in consideration only of 400, pieces of gold given unto him, Clusium was betrayed unto Annibale the very firsthouse and garner of corn that the Carthaginians had, all the while they were in league near Tenea. Upon those prisoners that were taken when the garrison and fort was betrayed he exercised no cruelty, because that in the beginning of his affairs, he would win himself a name and opinion of clemency.

While the war by land continued thus at Tenea, there had been some warlike exploits achieved both by sea and land about Sicily, and the Islands that lie against Italy near unto it, both by Sempronius the Consul, and also before his coming. Twenty galleys with five ranks of Oars, and a thousand armed men, were sent from the Carthaginians to invade and waste the coasts of Italy. Nine of them arrived at Lupa e: eight fell with the Island of Vulcius, and three were driven by tempest into the straits of Sicily. Against them being defrayed within kenning, there were twelve ships let out from Messana, by Hiero King of the Saracutians, who hapned at that time to be in Messana, attending the Roman Consul his coming and without any resistance made his boord other three ships, and brought them away into the Haven of Messana. By those that were taken prisoners, it was known, that besides the twenty ships aforesaid, sent against Italy (of which Fleet they were) 35 galleys of five course of Oars, made sail for Sicily, to solicit and per K swade the old allies there to revolt, Item, that the especiall point and design that they felt at was to feize upon Lilibeans: but they thought veryly that by the same guilt or tempest wherein they were scattered, that other Fleet also was cast upon the Island Egests. And according to this intelligence, the King from Messana writeth to Sempronius the Roman Pretor or Governor of Sicily adviding him, that they might be in readiness, to keep all remaining garrisons in Lilibeans; whereupon the Lieutenants and Colonels about the Pretor, were sent from him with all need to all the Cities about, to give order, that their people might be in readiness, to keep good peace, and to hold Lilibeams fire. And for preparation of war, there were forth a proclamation, that the sailors and mariners should bring into the ships ten days provision of victuals and meat ready dressed, to the end that upon the signal given at an hours warning, without all delay, they should a shipboard: Also that all that dwell along the coasts, should from their lencinis, watch-towers, and beacons, espy when the enemies fleet approached. Now (albeit the Carthaginians of purpose played the course of their ships, that they might come just before day to Lilibeans) they were discovered, both for that the Moon shone all night, and also because they came under sail which they had hoisted on. So soon therefore as the signal was given out of the Sentinels and watch-towers, & alarm cried in the town, the mariners were lornard their ships and all those sea-fores also were besoarded some to man and guard the walls, and guard the gates, others to be in the ships. But the Carthaginians persuaded, they were to deal with them that were provided for them, (as being advertised of their coming) for to receive the enemy until day, and employed the time in striking falls, in unattacking their ships, and preparing them for a battle. When it was broad day light, they retired into the deep, to have sea room enough to fight, and that the enemies ships might have no ressort from the haven. The Romans for their part retrued not battle, comforting themselves with the remembrance of the valiant exploits performed in that very place, and tracing also upon the number and valour of their foildiers. They were not so soon landed into the open sea, but the Romans were desirous to grapple, and to come close to hand fight: but contrariwise, the Carthaginians held off afoot, willing to proceed by cunning and policy more then by strength and meer force; and to make trial rather of the nimbleness and agility of their ships, then either of the prowess of men or good ship of armor: for as their Fleet was sufficiently furnished, and to the bow, with a multitude of soldiers, as it was ill provided of foildiers: and wherefoever they grappled together and came to hand-fight, they had nor an equal number of men armed to hold play with the enemies: which being once perceived, the Romans gathered heart, and redoubled their courage, by reason of their number; the other side again were discoured and out of heart, for their default of foildiers. Insomuch as seven Carthaginian galleys were soon involved round and boiled, the test feld Offoildiers and mariners together. 1700, were in them taken; amongst whom, there were three great Gentlemen of the Roman Pretor. The Roman fleet still entire and whole, gave one vessel only that was bened and pierced (yet able to be brought back) returned into the haven.

Presently after this battle, and before that they of Messana had knowledge thereof, T. Sempronius the Consul arrived as Messana and as he entered within the round. King Hiero met him, with a fleet well furnished, and his de ked and coming forth of his royal ship into the Admiral of the Consul he welcomed him, and rejoiced for the late return of his men and ships and praised God that his voyage into Italy might prove happy and fortunate. Then showed he unto him the present effate, and the affairs of the Island; opened the designs of the Carthaginians; and promised withal, that with as good a mind and sound heart, as in the former war against the Carthaginians, when he was a young man, he had aided the people of Rome. So now in his old age he would assist them and for proof hereof, he would of his own fee confirn both the Consuls legions, and also the mariners with corn and payement. Among other matters he enforced him how Lilibeans, and other Cities on the sea coast were in great danger, by reason of some
A some among them that desired a change and alteration. Whereas upon the Conful thought good to make no delay, but to set sail with all speed to Lilybaenum, whom the King and his royal fleet accompanied: and as they were failing, tidings came of the foresaid battle before Lilybaenum, and how the enemies' ships were either scattered and put to flight, or boarded and taken. The Conful having bid King Hiero adieu, with his fleet set sail from Lilybaenum, leaving behind him the Pretor to defend the coast of Sicily, and crossed the sea himself to the Island * Melos, which was held by the Carthaginians. At whole coming, Amillus the son of Gises, Captain of the garrison there, rendered himself, and 2,000, fowlers within a very few, together with the Town and the Island. From whence, within few days he returned to Lilybaenum: where the pirates

B (ex cepting certain noble persons of high parentage) were by the Conful and the Pretor both held openly in portage. When the Conful thought Sicily on that coast force enough, he set sail from thence towards the Islands of Vulciun, so that the brunt went that a fleet of Carthaginians there lay at rest: but there were no enemies to be found about those Islands: for it chanced they were already, pasted over to wade along the river and coast of Lilybaenum; and having forraged the territory of *Vibo, they put the City also in great fear. As the Conful returned back again to Sicily, tidings came that the enemy had made roads into the country of Vibicenae and he received letters also from the Senate, concerning the coming of Amsibul into Italy, and therefore that he should with all speed provide aid and succour his Colleague. The Conful being at once troubled with many cares, presently embarked his army, and by the Adriatic sea, sent them away to *Ariminum. To Sext.

C Pompeius his Lieutenant, he gave the change of 25 Gallies for the defence of the territory of Vibo, and the sea-coast of Italy. With M. Emilius the Pretor, he left a fleet augmented to the number of forty sail, which done, and all things let in order in Sicily, himself with ten ships coasted along Italy, and arrived at Ariminum, from whence he put himself on his journey, and marched with one army to the river Trebis, where he joined with his fellow Conful. Now were both Confuls, and the whole piuance and force of the Romans opposed against Amsibul, so that as it appeared plainly, that either with that power the Empire of Rome might be defended, or else their hopes were gone. However, one of the Confuls being weakened and discouraged with the defect of his horsemen in one battle, and dismayed besides with the hurt he had received in his body, desired to his courtiers right deferred: but the other coming fresh and lusty, and thereby more hardy, would

D abide no delay. It fell out, at that time, that the Gauls inhabited all the Country between the two rivers Trebis and P. T. who whiles these two most piuant nations were at strife and warred, held off as neutrals, and favored neither side, making full account of the good will and grace of that part which should have the better. The Romans; because they would now make no fir, and have no more from the fire, took the matter well enough: but Amsibul was very much thereat offended, giving out very often, that he was sent for by the Gauls for their deliverance and liberty. Upon this indignation and displeasure, and for that also he would feed his men with boots; he commanded 2,000 feetmen, and a thousand horsemen, most of them Numidians, and some Gauls among, to overrun and spoil all the country forward, even to the banks of P. T. The Gauls standing in need of help, and having until that time kept themselves in doubtful tears, were forced to turn from those that offered them wrong, and to advance and cleave unto the Romans that should revenge their injuries and protect them. Whereupon they sent Embassadors to the Confuls, representing the Romans help for their land, which by reason of the exceeding fire, and so much insubordination of the inhabitants toward them, was now endangered. Cornelius liked neither the case, nor yet the time to deal in such affairs: he had the nation besides in suspicion and jealousy, as well for many treacherous parts, as also (in case he would or could forage all or her own pranks of theirs, or the fame duplicity and faithfulness of the Boians. Sempronius contrariwise thought it the instant to keep their allies in faith and allegiance, to defend those that came first to band and fide with him. But now fulfilling his Colleague's call doub'd and held off, yet he sent his own

F Cavalry, and a thousand well near of footmen thither amongst them, to guard the country of Gaul beyond Trebis, who coming suddenly upon the enemies, and charging them at unawares, as they came scattered alder, and out of order, yet and most of them laden with spoil, mightily affrighted them, and made a foul slaughter and pursued them in flight, as far as to their flaming camp, and 3000 iberg. From whence (notwithstanding) they were beaten back by the multitude that followed forth: but new forces from their own companies, they remem'd the fight again. The fight afterward was doubtful and variable: and although they made a lasting bargain on both parts yet the common voice encouraged the honor of victory (such as it was) to the Romans rather then the enemy. But no man would a greater matter of it, and reckoned it more to the fall, then the Col, himself. He joyed himself his bra; that he had got the better, with the help of the fame for-G

Cees, which under the conduct of the other Conful, came by the worte. And now (faith he) the "fowlers are conforted and refreshed well enough, and none there is but my brother Conful that would have the battle deterred: who no doubt is more hen-hearted than bodily hurt: and for the remembrance and intent of little green wound, quarketh to bear of the field & of his things cannot away with eyes-tools, but we must not thus ill here and was need for the pleasure of one cratic and sickly person. For what reason is it, that we should drive off longer, and spend more time in vain? What other Conful expect were to make up the third? or what army besides should we look for? The Carthaginians lie encamped in Italy, and well near within the view and sight of
of the City of Rome; and it is neither Sicily nor Sardinia taken from them by conquest, nor Upon new 8000. weapons, and once and "fierce and bold, he divided and appointed his Elephants both on the side and the other. The Consul Sempronius seeing his horsemen following the chase on the spur, and out of order; and how as unwares they were charged again by the Numidians, who upon a sudden turned and made head upon them, founded the retreat: and when they were rallied about him, he com- pared his footmen with them. The Romans were in number 18000, of Allies and Latines 22000, besides the aids of the *Cenomani: which Nation of the Gauls only, continued faithful and true to the Romans. With these forces came they into the field, and began the battle. The first charge of the skirmish was given by the Iladers of Balearics, upon whom, when the legions made head with greater violence, their light armed men were quickly brought into the wings: which was a canle that the Roman horsemen pretendely were charged and disordered. For whereas of themselves they were but 4000, horse, and hardly able to withstand the shock of a thousand horsemen of the other, the Romans also were wearied, but most of the Carthaginians fresh and untainted: over and besides, they were overwhelmed with a cloud (as it were) of darts, flying and shot by the Balearic Ilidders. Moreover the Elephants which appeared to the hindmost ends of the wings frighted the horses especially, and not only with the strange light, but also with as uncouth a scent and favor, made them flee every way. The battle of the infantry was equal in courage of heart, rather then in strength of body: which the Carthaginians, (as having a little fore taken repast) brought fresh with them into the field: but contrariwise the Romans were effe- cting and stitting, and for cold even stark and benumbed. Howbeit their romacks would have lef- ved to have held out and with flood to the end, if they might have fought with footmen only. But both the Balearics, having disordered the horsemen, flanked them with their shor, and also the Elephants by this time were entred into the middle battain of footmen: and withal. Mégas and the Numidian light horse (to noon as this battain was unwares gone past their am- buliment and lurking holes) flat upon and arose from behind, and put them in exceeding trouble and fright. Yet for all these inconveniences and disadvantages (to many on every side) the main barret a good while stood unmovable and flitted not, but kept the array, and especially (beyond the expectation of all men) against the Elephants. For certain footmen placed for the purpose by flinging of darts forced them to turn head: and when they were once turned from thers, they followed hard upon them, prickling and galling them under the tails, in which place by reason of the tender skin they are soon wounded. Whom when Annael saw thus fathered and ready to turn upon their own parts, from the main battle to the flanks and outsides, he commanded them to be driven into the left wing upon the Gauls that came to aid and presently enforced them to run a- way. The Romans seeing their auxiliary Gauls put to flight, were driven into a new fear. When upon fighting now as it were in a ring and round on both sides, there were among them to the number all of 10000, who seeing no way else to escape, brake through the middle battain of the Africans, which it was strengthened with the aid of the Gauls, and that with a great slaughter of their enemies: and seeing they neither could return into their camp (the river being between) nor for the rain well discern how toucciou their fellows, they took the way straight to Placentia. After this, thereof brake forth in all parts. They that took the river either perished in the streams and whirlpools: or such as made stay to enter were by the enemy overtaken and slain. But as many as here and there fled scattering through the fields, following the footings and tracks of the battain that retired back came to Placentia. Some for fear of the enemy adventured boldly to take the river, and being once over recovered the camp. The rain and snow together, and the incolerable cold killed many, as well men as beasts and in manner all the Elephants. The Carthaginians followed the enemies in chase as far as Tribus, and there gave over: and returned into the camp so humne and frozen as scarcely they felt the joy of their victory. By reason whereof the night following, when as the guard of the Roman camp, and the remnai of that great company of plunderers passed Tribus, with floar-boats and flat barges the Carthaginians either perceived them not indeed for the noise the tempestuous rain made: or for weariness and sore wounds were not able to stir, and therefore made them quit, as though they knew not of it. And to wiles the Carthaginians were at rest, the army was by Sempronius the Consul brought (in a full march) to Placentia: and from thence having crossed the Po, came to Cremona, became one Colony alone should not be charged with the wintering of two armies at one time.

Upon this defeat and overthrow, there arrived such tearsful tidings at Rome, that they beleaved verily and looked for no other but that the enemy would come with banner displayed right to the very City: and that there was no hope nor help left behind to defend their gates and walls from assault and violence, For seeing that the one Consul was vanquished at Ticinus and the other also, who was called into him out of Sicilis: since both Consuls, and two coniular armies were thus defeated, what other Captains, what Legions remained now to be sent for, to aid? As they were in this agony and fear Sempronius the Consul came home: who with very great danger had passed through the enemies Cavalry, which was spread here and there all about to fetch in booties: and and more by venturous hardiness then good advice and hope, either to mis this them unpitied, or to resist if he had hapned upon them, he got away. And after he had held the assembly for election of the Consuls (the only thing above all other for that present most desired) he returned into his standing camp to winter in. Now there were completed Consuls, Cn. Servilius; and Cn. Flaminius the second time.

Howbeit the Romans were not in quiet within their wintering camp for the Numidian horsemen ranged about, and made excursions into every quarter, and (those who troubled and empeched them, more then they) the Celibrians and Portugals. Whereby all convey of victuals from every part was stopped, but only that which came by the Po, in Keels and such like vessels.

Neer to Placentia there was a merchants town, both fortified strongly, and also well furnish'd I with a garrison: upon hope to force that castle or town, Anniab went with his horse and foot, lightly armed; and supposing that to carry the matter covertly, would avail much to the effecting of his purposed enterprise, he came upon them in the night; howbeit he was not so close and secret, but he was defierd by the watch: who suddenly set up such an alarm, that it was heard as far as Placentia. Whereby, the Consul somewhat before day was there with his Cavalry, having commanded the infantry to march on after, ranged in a square battailon. In the mean while the horsemen skirmish'd, wherein Anniab was hurt, and departed out of the skirmish, by which means the enemies were frightnd, and the Cattile and hold manfully defended. After few days that he had taken his case, before he was well cured of his wound, he went forward to assault Vicennw Rc. That was a town also of men, handize (for mart town) and had been fortified by the Romans in the Gavis war. Whereupon the people bordering there about on every side, used thither to make repairs, and much frequented the same: and even then for fear of rods and excursions many of the Peasants and rural people retir'd themselves thither for refuge. This multitude (such as they were) upon the report of the valiant holding and defence of the town by Placenti were encouraged, and took arms, and went forth to enuer Anniab. And in the middle way they chance to attaint him and skirmish'd, in no batter array, but as they marched disorderly: whereas they were on the one side, none but a rude and confused force; and on the other side, both a Captain that might trust his soldiery and soldiers also that might reckon upon their Captain, there were to the number of 3,000, discomfited and put to flight, even by a few of their enemies. The morrow after they yield'd themselves, and received a garrison within the wall, and so on as upon commandment to give up their armor, they had obey'd and done: presently a signal was given unto the conquerors to sack and spoil the town, as if it had been forced by assault: where there was not so eaten and omitted any calamity whatsoever, that might afford in such a case memorable matter & sufficient argument for writers to record. So pitiful examples were practizd upon the poor silly wretches, of all loathes and luft, cruelly, and inhuman pride and outrage. And there were the expeditions and enterprizes of Anniab archived for this winter time.

After this the soldiery took repose, but no longer then the intolerable cold lasted: For immediately upon the very first and doubtful tokens of spring he departed from his wintering hold, and led his army into Tuscany, purposing to adjoin unto him (either by force or love) that nation also, as well as the Gauls and Ligurians. But as he pass'd over Apeninum, there arose of terrible storms and tempest, and surpriz'd him that it famish'd well-near the soul trouble and encombrance endured in the Alp. For the wind and rain together did beat and drive upon their very faces. At the first for either they were to lay away their armor, or else in striving and labouring to march on against the weather, and by the whirl-puffs of wind turned round about, and ready to beborn down, they stood still; but when as now the violence and fury of the storm stop'd their breaths, suffer'd them not to take their wind at will, they were fain to turn their backs, and set them down on the ground for a time. Then fell, the sleet thunder'd amain, and made an horrible noise, and amid those terrible cracks redoubled it lightned thick. Whereupon, they lost their bearing and feeling; and for fear, all of them became asoound. At length it pour'd down, and thereby the wind and storm increased more forcably upon them. Whereupon they were driven N to this necessity, even to pitch their camp, even in that very place where they were so suddenly caught and overset by tempest. But that was to them the beginning of a new toil and travel; for neither could they spread and display ought, nor pitch any thing linerly: neither would that which was pitch'd down continue and abide the wind, which rent and tore, and broke every thing, and hurried it clean away. And within a while, the water that fell, and by reason of the wind was raised aloft, being conceald once upon the cold tops of the hills, turned into a kind of hail and snow together, and came upon them with such a force, that leaving all things else, the men were forced to lie along, groveling upon their faces, rather stifled and immother'd, then cover'd with their billings. Hereupon entered a frost, so violent and outrageous, that of that miserable and pitiful heap of men and beasts, that lay there along, there was not one for a good while could raise O and lift up himself when he would, by reason, that for stark cold their fingers were benumm'd, that they could hardly bend and bow their joints. Afterwards, at length, when with biting and chastising their limbs; they got some heat, and came again to themselves, and that here and there in some places the began to make fires; every one that had means so to do, ran and fled to the fires or and help of others. Thus for two days they remained there pinnd up as if they had been besieged, Many a man and beast, and seven Elephants also of them that remained after the battle at Trabia, were starved and perished.
A By occasion hereof, Annibal departed from Apenninus, back again toward Placentia: and when he had marched ten miles on his way, he set him down and encamped. The morrow after he led against the enemy 12,000 foot, and 5000 horse. Sempronius the Consul also, being now returned from Rome, retired not battle; and the same day, the enemies were distant but three miles almsfar: the morrow after they fought on each side most fiercely and courageously, and with variable event and fortune. At the first-on the Romans had the better hand, so far forth, as that not only in fight they overcame their enemies, but also after they had discomfited them, and put them back, they chased them into their camp, and anon assailed the same. Annibal having ordained some few to defend the rampart and the gates, retired the rest thick and close together into the midst of the camp, and commanded them to give ear and be inventive to the signal, when he would have them issue forth. Now was it the first hour of the day, when the Roman Consul having toiled and wearied his foundiers to no purpose, and seeing no hope to win the camp, sounded the retreat. Which so soon as Annibal heard and saw the fight withal to slack and wax cold, and the enemy retired back from the camp, presently illaid himself with the whole strength of his Infantry, for he had sent out his horsemen both on the right hand and the left after the enemies. There had not been lightly a more fierer and cruel battle stricken, and more memorable, for the final mischief of both parts, if the day would have given them time to have fought longer. But the night parted the fray, which was hotly begun with exceeding tempest and courage. Whereupon, the contriving and charging one of another, was more eager, then the slaughter bloody between them; and as the fight in manner was equal, so they parted with losses alike. For of each side there died above fix hundred footmen, and half as many horsemen. But the loss on the Romans side was greater than in proportion of the number, because certain of the degree and calling of Knights, and five Colonels, and three Captains of the Allies, were slain.

After this journey, Annibal went into the country of the Ligurians, and Sempronius to Luca. To welcome Annibal at his first coming into Liguria, there were delivered unto him two Roman Quellers or Treasurers, Cn. Fulvius and L. Lauretian, who were intercepted by the Ligurians, and taken in a train of ambush, with two Colonels, and five others besides, who were as good as Senators fellows: and this was done, because he should affume himself the better, that the peace and amity contracted with them, would be faithfully kept, and observed.

D Wherein these things thus passed in Italy, Cn. Scipio, who was sent into Spain with a fleet and army for sea and land, having set forth from the mouth of Rhodanus, and compassed the mountains Pyrenees, arrived at a place called Emporia, where he disembarked and landed his forces, and entered into the Roman Empire all the country, beginning at the Lacetan, and from thence all the sea coast as far as to the river Iberus, partly by renewing their ancient leagues, and partly by devolving men to contract new. Whereupon, there arose a great name of him for his clemency: whereby he prevailed not only with the States by the sea side but also amongst the inlanders and mountaineers, even to the nations that were more of an ancient usage with whom he not only made peace, but also wrought them so, that they took arms in his quarrel; and there were levied from among them, certain strong companies and bands for to aid and succour him. Hannibal, whom Annibal had left for defence of that province, was not ignorant hereof: and therefore, before all was gone, and the country alienated, he thought good to meet with this mischief; and having pitched his camp in sight of the enemies, set his men in ordainance of battle. The Roman Captain likewise resolved not to defer the fight: knowing that fo, he might be forced to encounter both with Hannibal, and Aferhalis, and rather he desired to deal with them one after the other single; than at once with both. But this battle was not so much dangerous. Six thousand enemies were left behind, and two thousand taken prisoners, together with those that were left in the guard of the camp. For both the camp was forced and won, and also the General himself with certain guards was taken prisoner. Moreover Seffian, a town near unto the camp was won by assault: howbeit, the spoil and pillage of the town were matters of small worth and value; namely, the houffold stuff, and such self and trumpery of barbarous people, and certain poor base values. It was the camp that enriched the foundiers: by reason that not only the army which was now vanquished, but also which with Annibal departed in Italy, and left behind them about Pyrenees, all good things to speak of, that they set store by, because they would go lightly, and not be encumbered with carriages. Before any certain report of this overthrow came to Aferhalis, he had passed over Iberus with 8000 footmen, and 1000 horsemen, as purposing to make head against the Romans at their first coming: but when he heard how the field was lost, and the camp withal, he turned his journey to the sea. And not far from Tartaros, he found the foundiers of the Armado, and the martiners besides, wandering and fleesing over the fields (for usual it is, that happy success should breed careless negligence) whereupon he sent out his horsemen every way, and with great laughter and flight he chased them to their ships: and not adventuring to make any longer stay thereabout, for fear to be surprized of Seipio, he retired back to the other side of Iberus. Seipio also upon the first report of these new enemies, having rallied his forces together in great haste, after he had chastised a few Captains, and left behind him a small garrison at Tartaros, returned with his fleet to Emporia. He had no sooner departed from thence, but Aferhalis was there in his place; and having induced and instated the chief of the Ilergetes, who (had given hostages to Seipio) for to revolt and rebel, even with their own youth waited the territories of all those that continued faithful condescend to the Romans. Afterwards, when Seipio was routed routed once out of the place where he wintered, the enemy retired again, and quit all the country on that side I levias. Then Scipio having in hostile manner invaded the countries, abandoned and left by him that was the author and cause of their rebellion, and by that means the nation likewise of the Illyrietes, after he had driven them all within Ataragiis, which is their capital town, he laid siege unto it round about, and within few days brought the whole felogeneity of the Illyrietes under his obedience: and besides a greater number of hostages then before (which they were contrained to deliver) he condemned them in a good round sum of money. From thence he went forward against the Aueurians, near to levias, being associates also to the Carthaginians: and having beleaguered their City, he fore-laid and intercepted the Aueurians as they came by night to succour their neighbors, not far from the town, even as they were at the point to enter in. There were slain of them 1200, and the rest being well-near all disarmed, laid every way flattering here and there over the fields home to their houses. All the help and defence that they had who were within, was only the soul and cold winter weather, evermore sought and hurried to auxiliaries that he forth. The siege lasted thirty days, during which time, seldom fell the snow less than four foot deep, and so covered the pentiies and mantlets of the Romans, that when the enemies flung fire and airy times thereupon that alone saved the fame & nothing else. In the end, upon the departure of their Prince Annius, who was fled to Afdrabul, they yielded, upon condition to pay twenty talents of silver, & Scپio returned to Tarracon, there to winter.

But that years at Rome and about the City, were many strange and prodigious signs seen, or at leastwise (a thing usual when minds are once tinctured with religion, and given to make things frantic) many were reported, and soon believed. Among which, this was one: that a babe of condition free born, and but half year old, cried with a loud voice in the herb market to Triumphi. Also in the beasts market, an Ox of himself undriven, climbed up to the third loft of story of an house, and from thence being frighted with the noise and noise of the dwellers below, himself down. Moreover, there was seen in the welkin or element, the resemblance of a navy of ships; and the Temple of Lady "Sper, standing in the herb market, was filled with lightning. Likewise at Lomianus the spear of Juno shook and brandlished of it fell: and a Raven flew into Juno's Church, and lighted upon the very Shrine or Altar of Juno. In the territory of Amrternum, in many places were seen men, as it were, in white garments, but only afar off; for as folk went nearer or nearer, they seemed not to be men, but could not be what it. In Picenum it rained stones; and at Core the lots were tound diminished; and in Gaul, a Wolf drew forth a watchman his sword out of his scabbard, and carried it away. For other prodigious tokens, order was given to the Decemvirs to peruse the books of Sibylla. But for the raining of stones in Picenum, there was ordained a Novennial feast for nine days: and for the expiration of the other prodigies, the whole City in manner was occupied in their devotions. And now above all other things the City was solemnly purged, and greater beasts killed in sacrifice in the honor of those gods, for whom they were ordained, and a profect of gold weighing 40 pound, was carried unto Juno at Laurentum. And the dames and matrons of Rome erected a molten image of brats for Juno in Aventium: and at Core where the lots were diminished, was appointed a Lestifern, and a procession or supplication to Fortune in Aventum. At Rome also there was a Lestifern solemnized to Ferventa [the M gods of youth] and a solemn procession at the Church of Hercules. Moreover, express commandment was given to all the people, to make procession and supplication at every Altar and Shrine of their gods. And to god Genius, they sacrificed five greater beasts, And C. Atilius Scarrus the Pretor, was commanded to pronounce a solemn vow, in case the Common weel continued in the same good estate, ten years, and decayed not. These pontentious prodigies thus expired, and vows made according to Sibylla books, eated mens hearts mightily of their religious fear. Then one of the elect Comites, to wit. Flamininus, to whom were allotted those Legions which wintered at Placentia, sent an Edict with Letters to the Comit, that the Army should be in camp at Ariminum, upon the " Ides of March. His purpose was. to enter into his Consulship in the Province, remembering the old contentions and debates which he had with the Nobles, first when he was a Tribun of the Commons, and afterwards when he was Consul, as well about the Consulship (of which, they would have deprived him) as also, about the triumph, which they denied him. Hated he was besides the Senate, for the new Act or Law, which Q. Claudius (a Tribun of the Commons) had made, to prejudicial to the Senate; and only C Flamininus) of all the Nobles, supported it and let it forwardmanly. That no Senator, or father of a Senator should have a Ship at Sea, bearing above 300, Amphorases: for that was thought sufficient to transport their commodities and fruits to Rome, sluing out of their lands and living. And as for all other gain by traffic, it was not beooming a Nobleman and Senator. This matter having been debated with great concretion, called the proponent of this law (Flamininus) to in such evil will and delightness with the Nobility, but it procured him the affection and love of the Commons, and in course of time a second Consulship, Supposing therefore, that with iterating the Aupices, and putting him to take the presages anew by the flight of birds, and by finding other delays, upon occasion of the Latin holy days, and one business or other belonging to the Consuls charge, they would detain and keep him back still in the City; he set a comenence, as though he would take a journey like a private person, and so departed secretly into the Province. Which thing, when it was once blazed abroad, made the Nobles who were afore maliciously bent against him, to be angry anew; and they gave out, that it was not the Senate only, that C. Flamininus waited against against, but the immortal Goddesse. For he, who before time had been made God, without regard of taking Antipics, and having the approbation of the birds, when he was proclaimed and called both by God and man out of the field, obeyed not: and now, having a heavy confidence, furnished with offences past, both fled from the Capitol and the solemn murther and making of vows, for that he would not upon the ordinary day entering his Magistracy, visit the Temple of Jup. Opt., Max. nor (because he was odious to the Senate, and they likewise hated him alone) see them and ask their advice and counsel: nor proclaim the Latin Holy-days, and celebrate to Jup. Latini, the solemn yearly sacrifices upon the Alban Hill: nor yet, after he had entered into the city by night, and taken on birds, pronounce his vows there, and depart from thence in his rich coat-armour toward the Province. They said moreover, that he was flipp and slyly never away like a dog, that followeth the camp, without the eights and ornaments of authority, without Sergents and Officers, as if he had been banished, and so left his country, minding beke to enter his government more for the honor and dignity of Ariminum than of Rome, and to put upon him his purp. robe of estate, embroidered with scarlet rather than in hollow and common line; then in his own house. They all every one opined and judged that he should be recalled and brought back again peremptorily yea and be forced personally at home to perform all duties belonging to God and man, before that he went forth to the Province and to the army, about this embelissig (for they thought meet to send Embassadors) went Q. Terentius, and M. Antius: but they prevailed no more than in his former Council the letters missing had done, which were sent from the sent. A few days after he entered his office, and as he was siting, the Cai of young Bullo, being already sly, got away from the hands of the sacrificers, and spottet of many of the 'sanders by with blind, But they that stood far off, not knowing what the matter was of that, fled away, and ran to and fro: which of most men was judged a foretoken and prefiguration of some great affright and trouble. After this, when he had received the two legions of Sempronius the Counti of the year before, and other two, of C. Attilius the Pretor, he began to conduct his army into Tuscany by the way of Apenninus.

Annibal came into Hetruria, after he had lost one of his eyes by occasion of comittal watching in the Marches, through which he marched four days and three nights, without taking his reposes, &c. C. Flaminius the Counti of Rome, went forth, contrary to the warrant and approbation of the A'spices, and caused the field-ensign to be dug out of the ground, when he saw, if they could not be picked up; and being mounted on Horse, &c. fell with his head from his body. His fortune was to be surprized in an amb. by Ribatilas, which he had laid for him near the Lake called Thylamaerus: where he and his army were defeated, and fell upon the edge of the sword. Six thousand Romans, who brake through and made an escape, now first finding the faithful pretor that Mahabal had made into them, were by the falsehood of Annibal put in prison. When upon the news of this overthrow, there was great mourning and sorrow at Rome; there were two mothers to die for joy, that beyond their hope and expectation, they recovered their sons, and saw them alive, whom they supposed to be slain in this field. In regard of the forenamed defeat, there was vowed a sacred spring, according to the books of Sibylas. After this when Q. Fabius Maximus the Dictator sent against Annibal, would not come after battle with him, for fear he should hazard his life; the soldiery hastily reviled and denounced with afe and ornaments, as an enemy, and of so many victories, and by making head, and opposing himself only against Annibal embattled his attempts and enterprises: M. Minutius the General of his Horse, a man of a proud spirit, and a rich field, at home, with charging the Dictator, and accepting upon himself the protection of the people, for a faithful and considerable person, and so much by virtue of their power and authority, he was joined in equal command and commission with the Dictator. By means whereof, the army and the forces were parted and diversified between them, as Minutius gave the enemy battle in a place of great advantage, whereupon his Legions were divided and in great h}

NOW approached the spring, when Hannibal removed out of his wintering holds, after he had layed before to pass over the Alpes: but in vain, by reason of the intolerable cold; where also he layed in greater danger of his own person. By which time the Gauls, who having risen up in arms on his side, for hope of pillage and pillage, seeing now in stead of harrying and carrying away of booties out of other men's lands, that their own country was become the place of the war troubled and molested as we live with the one army as the other which abide there all winter turned their hatred and malice from the Romans back again upon Hannibal: In such hour, as after he had been sturdy, times fore laid by the great trains of their princes, and in danger to be murdered, he escaped only by the deceitfulness and malice practised among their own selves. For with what in ontamity and entity they had conspiried together, with the same they bewrayed one another and detected the conspiracy unto him. By means whereof, as also by changing one while his apparel, another while he boned and attire of his head, by errours allo and misconception, he avoided the peril, and saved himself: But to it was, that even this fear in which he was troubled, caused him to remove the looser out of his wintering harbour,

About the same time, Aufidius entered into his Consulship at Rome, on the Ideas of Marcellus, where, after he had pronounced to the Senate concerning the affairs of the Common-wealth, the hatred and malice which the LL. had conceived against C. Flaminius, was renewed afore: For they said, that they created two Confils, and had cut one. For that lawful government and authority which Flaminius should have had, that auspice of Magnificity which he was meet and due, he ought to have carried with him from the City, from the publick and private habitations, after he had celebrated the Latin holy days, and offered sacrifice upon the mountain Alban, and made his solemn vows accordingly, within the Capitol. But since for default herein, he departed from the City a private person, the Auphires of government could not follow and accompany him: and being gone without them, he might not lawfully take the same anew in force of law. Now there were sundry strange prodigious tokens besides, reported from many places at once, which much encroached their fear: namely, that in Sicily certain foolsfiers javelins were on fire: and in Sar- donna, a Horseman walking staff, as he went the round, and visited the watch upon the wall, burned in his hand: That upon the first and Sea flour, there were seen many light fires, as to all the coasts shine again withall: That two shields were burning blood: That there were some foolsfiers smitten dead with lightning: That the circle and body of the sun appeared in fixed leis in compacts, and eclipsed. Also that there fell from the sky burning flames, at Preneste: And at Arpes there were seen in the Element, Palm or Date Trees: and the sun fighting with the moon: Moreover, at Capua, two moons rose and shewed in the day time: that at Crete, the waters ran mingled with blood: That the very fountain of Hercules yielded and cast up water bespied with blood: That as folk resided in Autumn fields, certain bloody ears of corn light into their baskets: At Falerii the heaven seemed to cleave in lacer and open, and to flow as it were a great chink; and out of the place where it gaped, there shone a great light: That the lots of their own selves diminished, and one fell out of the pitcher with this inscription, Mars brandisheth and forbids his fear. And about the same time at Rome the Statute of M. Livier in the high way Appia, near to the images of the wolves: and at Capua, the wellkin seemed to be on fire. And the form of a moon fell down in a rain or shower. After this, many gave belief afo to prodigies of far les importance: namely, that some mens goats, in stead of hair bare wool: that a hen turned into a cock, and a cock proved to be a hen. These things as folk reported, were declared abroad, and the authors brought into the Senate: where the Consul propounded before the L.L. and required their advice, as touching matters of Religion. Whereupon, there passed a decree that these strange tokens, some should be purged and expiated with greater sacrifices, other with young sucklings: and A and that for three days, there should be supplications at all the Shrines and Altars of the Gods. As for other matters, after that the Decemvirs had looked into their books, such provision was to be made, as the Gods in their verses should foretell to stand with their pleasure and contentment. So, by the advertisement and directions of the Decemvirs it was decreed as followeth: First, and foremost, that to Juno there should be made of gold a thunderbolt or form of lightning weighing 50 pounds; and another of silver, presented into Juno and Minerva. Item, to Juno Regina there should be sacrifice offered in the mount Areteas, and to Luna Hostia in Luniarium, of greater beasts: Item, that the dukes of Rome, making a contribution (every one to their ability) of a sum of money, should offer an Obolation unto Juno Regina and bring it into Areteas, and

B there to emnity a Lechitimum: Item, that the very Liberi and emancipat women all should according to their power, lay their money together and make a present for the goddess Pernus. These things accomplished, the Decemvirs is called in the market place of Aretis, and for that purpose killed greater beasts. Last of all, by direction out of the books of Stybbst, now in the month December, they celebrated a festific at Rome in the Temple of Saturn, and commandment was given that a Lechitium should belemunized (which bed and table the Senators themselves spread and set out with all the furniture) and a public feast besides, in any bands, and throughout the City both by day and night were proclaimed the solemn Saturnintas and order^ed^ that the people should hold and observe that day, as holy and festive, forever.

C (who was departed from his wintering tower, because the rumor ran that Flaminius the Comil was come as far as Aretis) albeit he had another way more ready and commodious (though it were somewhat farther about) yet chose that which was the nearer through the marshes where as the River, Armis at the same time had overflowed his banks more than initially. As for the Spaniards, Africans, and all his old beaten foemen (the lower flower and strength of his Army) he commanded to march fortofet together with all their baggage and carriages among them, to this end, that if they were to any where to lay, they should not fail and want necessities about them: the Gauls he appointed to follow next: and because he was desirous that these kind of people, should be in the middle ward, and the Horsemens likewise to go after them behindmost in the rearguard, he charged Mago with the right Horsemens of the Numidians, to guard the army D and keep them close together in their march, but especially to have an eye to the Gauls, and keep them in; for fear lest they for tediousness of travel, and weariness of long way (as they are a Nation tender enough and not able to abide any hardship) should either liik away, or else stand still. They of the vanguard, what way forever the guides led them and went afore-paced through thick and thin, waded through great Rivers and deep quicksand: and whilst they were minded and in a manner overwhelmed and swallowed up of bogs and muddy quagmires, yet they followed till their colors, But the Gauls, if their feet chanced to slip, could not hold themselves. And when they were down, they were not able to arise out of the dusty flouths and holes: neither could any of them comfort his corps with courage, nor help his heart with hope of better. Some of them hardly haled their heavy hams, and drew with much ado their hizie legs and laggings

E limbs after them: others, whole hearts were done for tedious toil and travel, when they were once down, laying amongst the jades and other beasts, which all were courted along every where. But that which hurt and undid them most, was their want of sleep, for they had watched four days and three nights continually without a wink. Now when as the water had covered and overspread every place, that they could find no dry ground: to lay their weary bodies on, they were fain to pile their packs one upon another in the waters, and to call themselves aloft upon them. All the way as they went, they might see the beasts and Horses lie every where on heeps overthrown and dead: which served them a while, instead of Conches for want of other means, who fought but only for some thing or other, that appeared above water to repel themselves upon, for to take a nap. As for Amnomial himself, (who had already an infirmity in his eyes, which came first by the distemperature of the spring season now hot and then cold) he was mounted upon an Elephant, the only Elephant that was left alive: this beast bare him a good way above the water; but by reason that he had overwatched himself: and the moist nights besides together with the damp and mist of the foggy lens, blinded his head and filled him full of threems, and became neither time nor place served for any cure and to take Phytick, he lost one of his eyes quite.

Thus after many a man loft, many a Horse pitously perished, when he wasget out at length of these foul lens and miry marshes, in the first dry ground that he came unto, he pitched his camp: and was courted by his epilas and vantcourriers whom he had lett out before, that the Roman army lay about the walls of Areutae. Then with great diligence and careful enquiry he

G endeavoured, to found the intent and the design of the Comil: to know the costs and site of the country: to hearken what ways he travelled; to learn what forces he had; to be adverted how he was flourished and provided of victuals: and to understand all other things expedient for his purpose in such a case, and necessary to be konw. The country was moist fertile and fruitful, as aynone in all Italy, to wit, the goodly champion fields of Tuscrna, lying between Ferula, and Areutae, plentiful in corn, abundant in cattle, and richly flourished with all good things. The Comil was stout and proud, by reason of the former Comilship that he had born: little account he made of the Majesty of Laws, and authority of Senators, and as small regard and reverence he had of the Gods themselves: which, as it were, he pluck't out of his heart, and, by his nature, tofortune, had nourished and maintained the same with prosperous success in his affairs at home, and wars abroad; so as it appeared evidently, that since he rejected neither God nor man, and designed not to take their counsel and advice, he would go rashly to work, and do all in haste, hand over hand, without discretion. And to the end he might be more forward to plunge himself headlong into these his infinities and imperfections, Anaibai desiring to anger him, and to move his patience. Leaving the enemy therefore on his left hand he put himself into the way to Feluda to wait and spoil the country of Feluda; and began to the Con tul a far off; what foul work and havoc he possibly could make, with fire and sword. Then Flamininus, who of himself would not have relented and fare still, in case Anaibai had been quiet; I seeing once the goods of his allies and friends, barbaried and driven away even before his eyes, and thinking it tended greatly to his fame and diurnation, that a Carthaginian should march thus at his pleasure, through the mists of Italy, and without any embasement and controulment, to pass on forward, even to besiege and assault the walls of Rome; when all others about him sitting in counsel, gave advice for profit and safety, rather than for cruel and bruyerly; namely, to pause a while, and expect the coming of his Colleagues, that they might with joint armies, with one heart, and with common accord of counsel, conduct and manage the war: and in the same time, the Cavailry with Auxillary or aid-foUdlers lightly armed, repuls the enemy, and flay him from spoiling to licenionally at his pleasure; in a great chafe and chace he role up, and departed out of the Counsel, and presently rounded the march, and gave the signal of battle: and withal, K

Nay we were biff (quoth he) to remain and sit here till before the walls of Artium for this, be like, our native country, and here is our place of habitation: as for Anaibai, let him escape forth of our hands, and wait all Italy: let him spoil afore him, and over-turn all with fire and sword, until he be as far as Rome walls; and lead me, in any case once flill: from hence be tofore the Senators lend for C. Flamininus from Arnunda. Sometimes they called Cialidus from Ven. With these and such like reproachful and taunting words, he commanded in all haste the standards and ensigns to be cacked up, and called for his Horie, he was not to be mov'd mounded on his back, but the Horse fell presently, call the Rider over and over with his head forward; and there lay Flamininus the Conful under foot. As they all, that attended about him, were af righted and troubled in mind, at this unlucky preface and ore-token, in the very beginning of this enterprise; word moreover was brought unto him, that one of the per-ensigns was not able to pull up his enign, do what he could, and getting his whole strength and force, to the Confulturning to the messenger. What? quoth thou any letters besides (quoth he) from the States to prohibit me for giving battle? go thy ways, and bid them dig up the enign, with help of fire and mat rock, if their hands be not benumbed for fear, that they can not pluck it up; and with that began the army to march. The Principal Leaders and Captains, besides that they agreed not, but gai said this course, were much dismayed and terrified with this twofold prodigious fight: but the common foUdlers rejoiced and took great pleasure, to see this forwardness and animosity of their General; having an eye rather to the end of their hope, than to the cause which they had to hope for. Now, Anaibai wasted in all manner of boldness that he could devise, the territories between the Town Consul, and the lake Thrasymenus, and all to what the edge of the Conuls flomack, to chase his hot blood, and to provoke him for to be revenged, for the harms and wrongs done to his good friends and allies. And come already they were to certain places, naturally made as it were for an ambush, whereas the lake Thrasymenus lieth hard at the foot of the Hills of Cil instantly: for there is between, but a very strait and narrow passage, as if there had been left to much space of ground, only for that purpose, and nothing else. For if a man go but a little further, the plain lieth mere open, and growing larger, and from hence the hills begin to arise aloft. Anaibai in the open ground pitched his camp, for himself with his Africans only and the Spaniards: to lodge in, and made abode. The Etruscans, and the other light armed foUdlers, he led about behing the Mountains: the Horsemen he placed at the very gullet of the fire passage, where in the little hills handliomely covered and hid them close; to the end that so looving the Romans were entered in, when he had put forth his horsemen against the gullet of the fire, as all might be enclosed within in, when he had put forth his horsemen against the gullet of the fire, as all might be enclosed within the lake and the Mountains. Flamininus being come to the lake the day before the Sunsetting; the morrow after, before it was full day light, without discovering and clearing the coast by any scouts and spials sent out before, passed through the fire. After that his army began to be spread and displayed more as large, as the plain opened wider he expedit and perced the enemies only which he had before his face; for the ambuscades lay cloke hidden behind him back, and over his head. Anaibai having once got the enemy (as he could) enclosed thus within the lake and the Mountains, and environed with his forces, gave the signal to them all for to charge: who came down everman the nearest way he could: and so much the more were the Romans affrighted and troubled with this sudden occurrence, by reason that the lift which arose out of the lake, was lest thicker than the plain, than upon the hills: whereby the Companies and Squadrons of their enemies coming out of many Vallyes, were seen well enough on one, and therefore more joyously gave the charge all at once together, The Romans hearing the cry and shout which arose from all parts, before they could well dis cern and see, perceived themselves compassed all about and surprized, and were affrayed both afront, and on their flanks, ere they could put themselves in battail-ray, as they ought, make their their armour and weapons ready, and draw their swords. When all the rest were thus amazed, and at their wit’s end, the Consul alone, for all this imminent danger, flewed himself nothing daunted or afraid, but in order the ranks and files which were shuffled and blended together, according as time and place would give him leave: and marshall’d his soldiers, (who turned every way as they heard the fiery and divers noises) and in the best manner he could devise, he comforted and encouraged them, willing them to stand to it, and fight like men, for that there was now no means else to escape. “All the vows and invocations upon the Gods for their help, I would not serve, but only it was mere force and mere manhood must do the deed: and they were to make way by dint of sword, through the midst of their enemies battalions: and the least men feared, the least danger commonly befeted them. Howbeit by rest of the noise and hubbub,

Ly, neither counsel nor command could be heard: and far off were the soldiers from knowing their own Ensigns, their ranks and places, that scarcely their heart would leave them to take arms, and to buckled them, as they should sily for fight: in such sort as of some of them were surprized and born down laden rather with their harness, then covered and defended therewith. And in forget a mild and darkness, more use they had of ears than eyes: for at the groves of their wounded fellows, at the blows and strokes upon the bodies and armour reounding again, at the confused shouts and shrieks of hardy and fearful men one with another, they turfed their faces, and call their eyes every way. Some as they would have fled, light into the press of those that were fighting, and there were set fast: some as they returned for to fight, were borne backward by companies that ran away. Afterwards, when they had assayed in vain every way to get forth, and law well, that on both sides, and flanks the mountains and the lake: that afront and behind, the enemies battalions hemmed them in; then they knew evidently there was no hope of life but in their right hand and force of arms. Then every man became a Captain, and encouraged himself to fight manfully: so as the battail began anew, in order by the Principles, Hoist-arms, and Triarii, nor according to the accustomed manner, whereby the vanguard should fight before the main battail and the standard, and behind them the vanguard; and that the soldier should keep his own legion, his own cohoott, band, and company: but as a venture, even as it happened, to they went to it and buckled, fell, fell: and as every mans heart served him, to be marshalld himself to fight, either before or behind. Their courage and animosity was so ardent, their spirits and minds to intenct to the batter, that being as there was, a terrible earthquake at the very instant,

D which overthrew and turned upside down, a great part of many Cities in Italy, turned aside the courtes of great Rivers out of their channels; and drove their streams against the current. forced the Sea into fresh Rivers, yea, and overturned Mountains with mighty falls, and laid them flat; yet there was not a man who fought in that battail, that once heard or perceived it. The conflict lasted almost three hours. Sharp it was in every place, but about the Consul most cruel: and look in what part ever he law his men distressed and in hazard, there courageously he aided them. By reason that the flower and bravest gallants followed him, and was himself for his own person boldly before in his rich armour, he both aslied the enemy most furiously, and also defended his own citizens as valiantly: for so long, until a certain Insubrian, a man of arms (Dacoreus was his name) one that knew his village well enough. This is (quoth he) to his countrymen, the Consul that defeated our army, put to the word our Legions, walled our territorries, and he that destroyed and laced out our City. Now will I offer him as a sacrifice out of hand to the ghosts and spirits of those our fellow citizens whose by his means have been piecefully slain: and therewith fasting purrs to his Horse, he rode through the thickest troop and preste of his enemies: and when he had first slain his Equier outright (who opposed his body between, and let himself against him, seeing him coming to furiously;) he ran the Consul quite through the body with his lance. And when he would rather than his life have disarmed and tilted him, the Triarii leapt with their targetts over his corps, and lo kept him off. Hereupon from hence forth many began to flee: but anon, neither deep lake nor high mountain, could impede and stop their fearful flight: like blind men they ran and fought means to make escapes, were the lane never fo narrow, were the Hills never so steep and raggy, horse and man, man and armour, fell headlong, one upon another. A number of them seeming to way else to escape, entred into the Lake by the first edges and shallow brims thereof, waded so far, and went up so high, that they left their heads and shoulders only above the water. Some there were, who unadvisedly (such was their fear,) sought to save themselves by swimming. Which being an endless piece of work: and beyond all hope, their wind and breath failing them, they were either tilded and swallowed up of the gulles, or after that with too much haft, they had over-laboured and foiled out themselves, what they could to swim back again, and with much ado to recover the Land: and there, by the enemies Horsemen who had taken the water, were they killed every where, and cut in pieces. Six thousand or thereabout, of the vanguard, who latly brake through the midst, masure the heads of their enemies, unwitting of all that was done behind, escaped safe out of the gullee: and having forced the top of a little hill, there they stood, and might hear only the encirches of men, the rattle and railling found of their armor, but how the battell went or sped, neither could they know, nor yet ditect for the thickness of the dark mist. But now, when they were come to some ods, and one side down went and had the worse, by which time the heat of the sun had broken and disparched the mist, and the bright day appeared: then through the clear light, the hills and dales shewed evidentely the havock & overthrow that was made, and how the
the Roman army was sorely discomfited and defeated. For fear therefore, that the enemy (having held them at bay) would send out against them the Cavalry, up they went with their Enligens in all haste, and got them away with all speed possible they could. The morrow after, when over and besides all other calamities, they were in danger of extreme famine, and that Mahibal (who with all his power off shore pursued them by night, and overtook them) had given his faithful word and promise, that if they delivered up their armour, he would suffer them to depart in their single garments, they yielded themselves. Which promise Ambibal performed as truly, as all Carthaginians tie to do, and faille Carthaginian as he was, be clap them all into prison, and hang iron upon them. This is that noble and famous battle fought at the Lake Trasimene, and of those few overthrows that the Romans had, the most memorable of all others, 1500 Romans were there slain in fight: 10000 were scattered: and flying through sundry parts of Tuscany, got to Rome, 1500 of the enemies lost their lives in the field. But many more of both sides afterwards died of their wounds, Others there be that report much murder and slaughter on both sides. For mine own part (besides that, I love not to write vain untruths, nor any thing without good warrant, and yet the rumour of writers for the most part is too much given that way) I have followed for mine Author Fabius especially, who lived about the time of this war. Ambibal having enlarged without rumour as many of his prisoners as were Latins, and put the Romans in strait ward, cut out from among the heaps of his enemies that lay one upon another, the dead bodies of his own men, and commanded they should be buried: and having with great care and diligence made search also, for the dead corps of Flamininus to inter it, he could never find it.

At the first news in Rome of this overthrow, the people ran together in exceeding fear and trouble into the common place of Assemblies. The Wives and Dames of the City, went up and down to and fro in the streets, and enquired of whomsoever they met, what was the matter of calamity this was, whereof the brute went; and what was become of the array? And when as the multitude assembled thick (as it were) to a publick audience, turning to the Comitium and the Senate-House, and called upon the Magistrates: at length somewhat before the lun, Marcus Pomponius the Praetor came forth and said, A great battle hath been fought, and we have lost the field. And albeit they heard him no more than this of certainty, yet they filled one another ears with rumors, and came home with them these news to wit, that the Conul was killed, and a great part of his army with him slain: that there were but few left alive, and those either fled and scattered up and down in Tuscany or else taken prisoners by the enemy. And how many great calamities & misfortunes follow the overthrow of an army, unto so many cares and perplexities were the spirits and minds of all those plunged, who had any knowledg that served under Flamininus the CoF, all the whiles they were ignorant, what was the fortune of their friends, and no man knew for certain, what was now to become to him. The morrow and certain days following, there stood at the gates a great folle of people, and those were women more than men, waiting to see their friends themselves, or those that could tell tidings of them: and ever as they met with any, they would flock about them, and be very inquisitive; neither could they be picked away from them of their acquaintance and knowledge before they had questioned every particular circumstance from point to point in order. There might a man have seen an alphabet of faces, in those that departed from the messengers, according as the tidings were joyful or woful: there might a man have seen a number coming about them to accompany them as they returned to their houses, either rejoicing for their good hap, or comforting them for their misfortune and calamity. The women especially, as well in joy, as also in sorrow, were in their extremities. One above the rest (as it is reported) standing at the gate upon the saddin sight of her son alive & safe fell down dead at his very feet. Another, who had received an untrue report of her sons death, as the first mourning at home within her house in great sorrow of heart, so soon as ever the faw him coming into the house, for exceeding joy yielded her left breath, and died. And for certain days the Pretores kept the Senators together in Council, from the sun-rising to the setting, consulting under whole conduct and with what forces they might be able to withstand the puissance of those victorious Carthaginians. But they before they were thoroughly resolved of any determinate purpose and confederate to be taken, suddaine there arrived other news of a second loss, namely, that 4000 horsemen under the leading of C. Centurion, the Praetor, sent from C. Servilus the CoF unto his College, were induced by Ambibal in Umbria. For thiser they had taken their way upon the news they heard of the battle at Thrasimene. The brute and rumor hereof hammered diversely in mens heads: some, whose minds were possettied already with grief of a greater calamity, thought the los of that Cavalry but small, in comparison of the former defeat: Others esteemed that which hapned, not according to the importance of the thing it self: but like as it fell out in the natural body of man, that if the crosse and weak, every occasion, be it never so small, and light, is more offensive unto it and too often felt, then a greater cause and object in a found and strong constitution even so, when any croys or adversity happen unto the politick body of a City or C. W. desired (as it were) and likely we are not to measure & weigh the same by the greatest of the accidents but according to the crouse and decaied estate thereof, able to endure and abide no new matter that may in hanger and grieve it, whatsoever. And therefore, the City of Rome took her faw to the sovereign law and approved remedy which she had long desired, and yet not applied and used of late namely to the nomination of a Dictator. And because the Conul himself was abente, by whom alone it was thought he might
A might be named: and by reason that Italy was to overbreach and forlaid with the Punick forces, there might no courier be well dispatch'd, nor letters safely sent unto him: and for that the people had not authority of themselves to create a Dictator, they therefore elected a Pro-dictator: thing that was never seen and practised before that day: namely, Q. Fabius Maximus, and for his General of the Cavalry, M. Minucius Rufus. These had commissio from the Senate to fortify the walls and Towers of the City, to plant and set guards thereon, where they thought meet, and to cut up and break down the bridges upon the great rivers: shewing hereby, that since they were not able to keep and defend Italy, they were now to fight for house and home and to guard the very City.

Amidst in this mean time was come directly by the way of Bombergi, as far to Spadum. And after he had grievously wasted and spoiled the territory, he affaid to give assault to that City: but from thence he had the republic with the lots of many of his men, and guessing by the strength of that one Colony (where he sped but badly in the attempt of) how great and difficult the enterprise might be of assailing the City of Rome; he turned another way into the *Picene country, not only abounding in plenty of all kind of corn and grain, but also affording rich spoil and pilage: which the hungry and needy soldiers foraged and carried away as greedily, beyond all measure. And there for certain days he kept a standing camp, and retrenched his soldiers, toiled as well with winter journey and boggy ways as also in the late battle, which was more joyous and fortunate in the loose and parting, than light and easy in the conflict and fighting. After he had rested and retrenched his soldiers in fittingly, who took more pleasure in booties and prizes, than in ease and repose, he dislodged, and journeyed forward: waiting and spoiling first the *Pictuvrin C and the Adrian territories, and then the Marisci, Marrucini and *Pelignian, and all about Arpin and Lucania, being a region next adjoining unto Apulia.

Ce, foreseeing the other Consuls having had some light skirmishes with the Gauls, and won from them one mean Town of small importance, after he was advertised one of the death of his Colleague and the disaster of the small army, he then what danger might betide the walls of his native country, left an adventur to he should be abiem in the hazard of the main chance, but himself in his journey toward the City of Rome. Q. Fabius Max, the Pro-dictator aforesaid the same day that he entered his office: assembled the Senate, and began first with matters of religion, and concerning the Gods: and after he had laid open unto the L. of the Senate, that the Conful Pirminius had toad more in the neglect and contempt of Divine ceremonies, and the Artificers, than in otherwise in rafiness and for want of skill in feats of war; and that the Gods themselves were to be consulted about the purging and expiation of sins and offenses, and what might appease their wrath: gained and obtained this one point. That the Decemvirs were commanded to repair unto the books of Sibylla; (a thing not usually decreed: but when strange signs and prodigious wonders are reported) who having perused the books of delitines, made relation and informed the Senators, first: That the vow made unto Jupiter for the good success of that war, was not performed with due complements, and therefore ought to be accomplished anew, and in more ample manner: also, that the great Games and Plateis should be vowed unto Jupiter, with Temples likewise to Fortis Erycina, and to *Men. Moreover, that a solemn supplication and a Lictor should be celebrated, and a sacred Spring vowed, if the Gods granted them an happy end of war, and

By the Common-weal to remain in the same state, wherein it stood before the war began. The Senate gave order, that forasmuch as Fabius was to be employed in the wars, M. Ambius the Preor, should have in charge to see all the prelimes performed with all good speed, according to the will and mind of the Colleague of the Bishops or Prelates, These Ordinances of the Senate being enacted, Lucius Cornutius Lentulus the Arch-priest, with the advice of the whole Colledge of the Prelates, thought good and gave advice, that first above all other things the opinion and pleasure of the people (as touching the sacred Spring) should be known, for that without the voices and content of the people it could not be vowed: And in this form of words was the bill propounded unto the people, *Pleadeth you, that this grace may pass the thing done with your consent in this wise? if the face of the people of Rome and the Quirites for five years next ensuing, cons-

Fume safely preserved in these wars, at I defend it should, then that the people of Rome, and Quirites, perform an oblation and gift vowed and promised, namely, in the war between the people of Rome and the Carthaginians: and in the wars with the Gauls this side the Alps to wit, that the excess whereof the spring shall yield and afford one of sheep and fowes, goats and kine, and all things that shall be prophane, be sacrificed unto Jupiter, accounting from that day that the Senate and people shall order: Item, that be which shall sacrifice, may do it when he will, and in what manner he will: and in what sort ever he shal sacrifice, that it may stand for good and rightful. If haply it die, that should be sacrificed, let it be counted propitiously, and not as weakness: if any make lame or maimed shall the same not make, let it not be imposed upon him as a criminal. If any person conceal away the same or hide it out of the way, let it not be imposed for wickedness unto the people, nor to him from whom it shall be solden or hidden, if one chance by ignorance to sacrifice upon an unlucky & disastrous day, let it be accounted good and lawful the hour by night or day, whether bond or free (bull sacrifice let it be taken and held good. If before in the Senate, and people shall ordain these sacrifices to be done, or bull sacrifice, let the people be affisted and disburdened freely thereof. And for the same purpose, were the great games (before vowed) performed with the expense of 333333 Ases and one third part of an Asse beside the sacrifice of 20 Oxen to Jupiter, &c. of white Oxen and other sacrifices, unto many other faines. After these vows pronounced and made accordingly, the supplication was proclaimed & in procession there went with their wives & children, not only the multitude of the City, but also of the country, to many as had their private affairs, any way depending upon the public. The Lexiferni likewise was prepared and trimmed, and continued for three days: and the Decemvirs displayed their holy ceremonies had the ordering the court. The sacred beds were openly to be seen, one for Jupiter and Juno, another for Neptune and Venus: a third for Mars and Venus: a fourth for Apollo and Diana: a fifth for Vulcan and Venus: a sixth for Mercury and Ceres. Then the Temples vowed unto Venus Erycina, Q. Fabius Mar. the Dictator, vowed one Temple, For so it was delivered from out of the books of deftinies, that he should vow it, who had the sovereign rule in the City, and unto * Mem. Attius the Priest who vowed another. Thus when Church matters touching Religion were finished the Dictator proponnd concerning war and the State: namely, with what Legions and how many the Senate thought good to withstand the victorious Enemy. And a despotised that, he should receive the army at the hands of Cn. Servilius the CoL and enteft beside of the citizens and allies, as many horsemans & footmen as he thought convenient: and that he should do and order all things as his own discretion, for the good of the Common-weal, Fabius said: That he would adjoin unto the army of Servilius two Legions more: which being levied by the General of the horsemens, he proclaimed that they should meet together upon a certain day at Tyburn and when he had published a proclamation. That whatsoever inhabited within any Towns or Cables untended, should depart into places of safety: and that all should remove out of the villages of that country, through which Amabil was to go (but first to let on fire their houses and spoil their corn, that he might find nothing there when he came); he then changed to the high way or canley Flaminius, to meet with the CoL and the army. And when he had discovered them, marching about Otriculum to the river Tyburn, and saw the CoL with his horsemens coming forward to him, he sent a Sergeant, to give warning to the CoL for to come within the Limits to the Dictator, who obeyed his commandment. And as their meeting together, represented an exceeding great shew of the Dictators unto citizens and allies both, who by reason of discontinuance so long time, had wellneer forgotten that government: behold there came letters from the City importing news, that certain ships of burden transporting victuals from Hophia into Spain for the army there were, by the navy of the Carthaginians boorded and taken about the sound or haven of Catana. Whereupon immediately the CoL was commanded to go to Hophia to take up all shipping at Rome or at Hophia to furnish them with paylers, and man them with fouldiers, and to purifie the Armado of the enemies, and to keep the harbours of Italy. A mighty number of men was levied at Rome. The Libertins also, who had children, were of lawfull age to serve, were allegiance unto himself, to be his true fouldiers. Out of this army of citizens, as many as were under 35, years of age, were shipped; the rest were left behind toward the City. The Dictator having received the Conuls army at the hands of Publius Flaccus the Lieutenant, went through the Sabines Country, and arrived at Tyburn, whither he had commanded the new fouldiers to repair at a day. From thence by crofs wayes he returned into the high way or canley Latium, even to Prenestus: from whence (having marched diligently by his epilals, all the wayes) he led forward toward the enemy, purposing in no place to hazard the fortune of battall, but upon necessity. The very first day that he encampèd not far from Arp, within the light of his enemies, there was no hoo with Amabil, but without further delay, he came forth into the field in battall array, had him battall, and offered fight. But seeing his enemies quiet, and no stirring in the camp, he fell to taunting and reviling them saying: That now at length yet, the martial hearts of the Romans were daunted and tamed, and seeing they refuted fight, they confessed plainly, and granted themselves inferior unto him in valor, prowess, and glory: which said, he receipt into his camp. Howbeit, chasting and fretting secretly in his mind for anger that he had to deal hereafter with a Captain, far unlike to Flaminius and Sempronius: and that the Romans now so late, being chocked and taught by their own hands, and to their great cost, had fought out and got a Captain to match Amabil; strife wayes he began to leare the wisedom of the Dictator, and not his force: but having had as yet no trial of his constant resolution, he fell to dignify his mind, and to tempt him with often remov- ing his own tents, and waiting the fields of his allies even under his nose; one while he seemed to march away space out of all sight, another while he would a sudden sallay, and lie close in some by-place and corner, out of the way, to spoie when he could take him in some plain and even ground. But Fabius adde his army, and Marched above on the higher grounds, a prey distaunce off from the enemy, as neither he would let him go clean and abandon on him, nor yet encounter with him. He kept his fouldiers for the most part within the camp, fave only when necessity otherwise conained. For purveyance of forage and fresh, they were neither few in number, nor stragglers attender. The wards of Horsemen and thole that were lightly armed, standing always in order of battall, and ready prepared and furnisht for faddan imprestions and tumults, yielded both security to his own fouldiers, and also danger to his enemies, as they ranged all abroad and coraged the Country. In this manner never was the main chance put to the venture all at once of fortune: and the small triais of light cufling and skirmishes (begin in safety and security, by reason of the recource of refuge (to me not) injured and heartned the fouldiers, frightened with former fails, and made them at length to distruft either their own valour, or fortune. But Amab-

Aments violent and haftly; and of tongue intemperate. And first indirectly among some few, but afterwards openly in the hearing of all men, he termed Fabius, instead of a stayed and sober man, 'ow and dull; in stead of wary and heedful, timorous and fearful; attributing unto vertues the names of vices of near resemblance; and having a singular dexterity to debate his betters and inferiors, exalted himsolf thereby: a cunning cat, of all others the worst; and yet hath mightily prevailed and sped too well in many that have used it. Arnobius from Arpi paleth into Samianus, with the country of Beneventum, winneth the City Telema, and till provoketh (of forfeit purpose) the Roman Captain, if haply he could incite him by to many indignities and lotties of his allies, and so draw him to fight on even hand.

B Amongst a great number of Italian confederates and allies, whom Arnobius had taken prisoners at Tresiumeum and disimfified, there were three Campian horsemens, whom Arnobis even then had toke up, and allureth with gifts and fair promises to win unto him the hearts of their countrymen. Thise brought word unto him, that incaut he would lead and bring his army into Cappadocia, he shoul son be Lord of Capp. And albeit the thing in it self seemed greater than the quality of the persons that counselled him thereto: and therefore stood in moving, one while in good hope and assurance, another while in fear and distrust: yet they persuaded him at last to remove out of Samianus into Coniannia. After he had admonished them very often, to see that they made their word and promises good by deed, and commandeth them withal to return unto him with some of their principal Citizens and Country-men, he sent them away.

C Himself gave commandment to his guide, to conduct him into the territory of Caesariana being advised by thole that were skilful and acquainted with the coasts of those parts, that he could gain aforesaid that safe and forest, he might exclude the Romans from coming to reduce and subdue their confederates. But the antiquity of the name, and the Carthaginian language far differing from the Latin, caused the guide to mistake Caesariana for Cappadocia; and to milling of his intended journey, he came down through the Aeserni, Colani, and Caucasus Countries, into the plain champain region of Stella. Where seeing all the coasts environed round about with Mountains and Rivers, he called the guide unto him, and demanded where he was: and when he answered, that he should that same day lodge in Caesariana, then and not before, the error was found; and he knew that he was far out of his way, for that Caesariana was distant in another Country far off. And after he had beaten the guide with rods, and hanged him up by the head, for an example to terrifie all others, he forthwift himsolf within camp and tent our. Arnobius with the Horsemen into the Falern Country, to fetch in booties. So they waited and spoiled as far as the waters of Sumeus. Much harm did these Numidians, but the flight and flight of the people was greater. And yet notwithstanding that great fear, when all was on a light fire as if were, and nothing but war, the Roman allies continued still firm in their faithful allegiance: and the reason was, because they were ruled under a just and moderate government, and neither reluted, nor thought much to be subject unto their Roman betters, the only bond of loyal fidelity. But so soon as he had pitched his camp by the River Vulturnus, and that the most goodly and pleasant Country of all Italy was on fire, and the Villages every where burned and smoked again: whiles F Fabius led his power over the ridge of the Mountain Maffens, the fedition was like to have broken out again, and certain Captains of the multitude began to be emboldened afresh. For there had been great quietness, and all was still for some few days: because seeing the army much rather than their usual manner was, they fappoed verily, that they made more speed and hastened, to give Campania from being spoiled and waited. But when they were come to the ford and edge and point of the Mountain Maffens, and that the enemies were within light, burning the dwelling-houses of the Coloners and inhabitants of Sumeus, and likewise of the Falern Country, and all this while not one word of battell? And are we come hither indeed quoth Minutius, to behold only and to see? and feed our eyes with looking out our allies, continued and waited with fire and sword? and if we hath at nothing else, can we for theme abide to see the Calamity F of those Citizens here, whom our fore-fathers planted in Sumeus as coloners there to inhabit, to the end that all this tract and coaste should be late from the invasion of the Sabins? But behold, it is true a neighbour enemy (the Samite) that fireth it a forrein and alien, even the Carthagman, who from the farthest and most remote parts of the world (whiles we hand at a

G trell off still and for laziness do nothing) come forward even hither unto us, And are we for to degenerate (with sorrow of heart I speak it) from our progenitors and fathers, that along which coast they thought dittrorable unto their empire, for the Carthagman Armadoes, and ships to flote, fall, and ride; we should see the same now pelted full of enemies, the Nymids and Moors are: We who ere while taking soal heart and great disdain to see Septemtriones besieged, called not only upon men, but also upon the faith of alliances and the Gods to withe. Pel's hand still gazing upon Arnobius marching against the walls of a Roman Colony, and ready to affust it. The smoke of the villages and the fields now on fire, is ready to put out our eyes, and to choke us up our ears resound and ring again with the pitious cries of our allies that weep and lament and call other unto us than unto the Gods for help, and we here lead our army as if they were a flock of sheep, over the shadowy foressts, and hills out of the way, hid among the clouds and thick woods to keep them from the heat of Sun. If Furius Camillus had been of mind, by ranging and wandring over hills and foressts in this manner, to win against the City out of the hands of the Gauls, as this our new Camillus tofooth (fought out of purpose to be our only Dictator in this our disirets and hard estate, goeth about to recover Italy from Aemulus, Rome had been French at this day: which I learne, if we go thus boldly to work, our ancestors have too, and received to often, for Aemulus and the Carthaginians. But he, a brave man, and a Roman indeed, that very day when word was brought to Vetti, that he was chosen Dictator by the suffrages of the people, and approbation of the senators, although Jannicium was high en ough, where he might have let him down and beheld the enemy at ease, defended into the plain and even ground, and the same day in the very mids and heart of the City, where now Caecuburn or Pons Callicus handeth, and the morrow after, between Rome and Callan, flew the Legions of the Gauls. And what should I lay of that, which hapned many years after, when at the weights of Cumdium we were put under the yoke by the Samitns our enemies? Whether I pray you, did L. Papirius Cursor seek out the mountains of Samnium, or rather lie hard upon Luceria: and believe it, provoking and challenging the victorious enemies: and thereby shook off the yoke from the Romans neck, and laid it upon the proud Samnites? And what other thing else of late days but expedition, gave the victor to Cnilius Labienus? Who the morrow after that he discovered the enemy, set upon his fleet heavily fraught with victuals: and overcharged as it was with her own munition, furnitures and provision, sunk, and destroyed the same. It is meer folly to believe and think by fitting tills by bare prayers and vows, so vanquish and subdue the enemy. Our forces must be put into arms, and brought down into the plain that man to man may cope and buckle together. By adventuring boldly, by action and execution, hath the Roman Empire grown to this height: and not by these counsels and devices, which fearful towards K term the wary politics of war. As Minucius spoke these words in preaching war, a number of Roman Colonels and Horsemens came flocking about him. Yes, and these lusty and rash ipeches of his, came even unto the ears of the Fountaine. Toulpe, it had lien in the voises and election of the soldiery, out of all question they were to prevent Minucius before their General Fa ciies. But Cnilius again regarding always with good eyes his own men, no less than his enemies, carrying a resolute mind, invincible ever bestride of any other: albeit he was well, not that only within his own camp, but also now at Rome, he heard ill for his temporizing and flow pro ceedings; yet drew he out the rest of the summer, and held on the same course and purpose: and never altered his former manner: until that Anguif was being clean disappointed of long desired bat tail, being struck upon him anon and looked about for some places of winter abode considering, That L the country where now he was, rather yielded plenty for the pretense, than more for long conti nuance: as standing upon saunteries and Vineyards, and all things planted, rather for fruits of plea ture and delight, than for necessity and profit. Intelligence hereof being given to Falcius by his ex tants, for that he knew well enough, that Aemulus was to return through the same straights, by which he had entered the Fafer countries: he holdeth and keepeth till the Calpula, with suffi cient garrisons and likewise Clusium, a City divided by the river Falcinda, and parteth the Falen and Camparre countries almofter, Himself bringeth back his power through the same hills, having sent out to discover and eipe 400 Horsermen of confederates, under the conduct of L. Hoftinus Manlius, who being one of the true and lusty youths that oftentimes heard the General of the Horsemens giving out abroad brave words and stout speeches, as fiift went forward in manner M of an eipiel, to discover and see the enemy from a place of safety and security: and when as he saw the Numidians ranging all about the villages, and drew some of them about who he took at a vantage-light-ways his mind wholly possefixd and set upon: and to forget the charge and direc tion of the Dictator, who had commanded him to go forward as wary and as closely as he prifibly could, and to retire himself again before he came within light of the enemies. The Numid ians charging and recharging him affectionate, and flying from him another while drew him almost into their very camp when as both horie and man were outweared, From where C Castra, who then had the conduct and command of the Cavalry, set out against him liuitily upon the flpar and before they came within direct shot put the enemies in flight, and followed them contin ually in chase almost five miles, Minucius seeing neither the enemy to give over pursuit nor any N hope to o of away exchausted his men, and turned head upon them overmatched as he was very way: where he himself and his chiefest Horsemens were before found and flain: the other taking themselves again to flee for life, first cameto Colers: and after through by-lanes and difficult ways, to the Dictator. That day, as hop was, Minucius had joined himself to Falcius, having been at fent to keep with altrong guard, the foresal or pale, which above Terracina, growth into a nar row galler, and reacheth to the sea; for fear left it the advence of the way Appio, were without defence. A. n. b. Imitge enter and invade the country of Romans: When the Dictator and the Gener al of Horsemens had joysted their forces together, they encompassed upon the very high way, that Aemulus was at peace with his allies. Now were the enemies two miles off. The morrow after, the Carthaginians took up with their army all the way between the one camp and the other, O When as the Romans were quartered even under their very tents and rampiers, in a place no doubt of great advantage yet for all that approached Aemulus with his light Horsemens: and to provoke his enemies, fought by ilars and sates, charging upon them: and retiring back again with great nimbleness. The Romans kept still their standing, embastled as they were, The fight was cold and lingering to the mind and liking of the Dictator, rather than of Aemulus: and wh ere there were of the Romans part 200 slain, there dyed 800 of the enemies. Then seemed Aemulus after, to be beleaguered and shut up as it were and besieged within C Clusium, seeing that Capua, Samnium.
A Samnium, and many rich and mighty Nations confederate with the Romans, were on their backs to furnish them with store of victuals. And Annibal contrary-wise was like to take up his wintering place, within the crags and rocks of Formiæ, amid the Sands of Litternæum, and the moaty standing pools. Well wilt Annibal now that he was laid unto hardly, by the tame cunning Hциuagis, that he had used himself. And therefore when he could not escape away by Callistium, and seeing that he must needs to the Mountains, pass over the top of Calliæcula: for fear lest that the Romans should set upon his army enclosed in the valleys between the Mountains, he devised a stratagem, by way of a ridiculous illusion, to beguil the eye-fight of his enemies, and to frustrate and deceive them of their expectation: by means whereof, he purposed in the beginning of the night, to closely and by stealth to gain the Mountains. The manner of this crafty device was this. He caused to be gathered out of all the villages thence many fire-branches: when he took certain bavins or small fagots of brake-wood, dry sticks, and such like trash, and tied them fast to the horns of the Oxen, whereof he had tame and wild, a great number that he drove before him amongst other prizes gotten out of the country: so as he might make well near two thousand head. To Annibal he gave in charge, that so soon as it grew to be dark night, he should drive those Oxen with their horns set a fire toward the Mountains, and especially if the poHsie could, to the very frights and gallet which the enemy kept. It began no sooner to be dark, but Annibal with great silence dextrous and removed his camp, and the Oxen store afterward were driven a good way before the enigns and the army. When they were come to the foot of the Mountains, and to the frighten passages, immediately the signal or watch-word was given to set the Oxen horns, and to chafe them up against the Hill. The beasts, what with fear to see a light fire blazing over their heads, and what with pain to feel the heat now come to the quick flesh and the roots of their horns, fell running up and down, as if they had been mad. By this their gadding thus all at once every way, all the coppices and springs thereabout were set on a light fire, and seemed as if the whole woods and hills had burnt withal: the flashing of their heads also to and fro without light, made the blaze greater, and gave new and temblance of men running from one place to another. They who were appointed and set to keep the passages of the frights, so soon as they saw certain fires upon the tops of the Hills, and over their heads, supposing themselves to be surrounded and enclosed with fire on every side, abandoned their hold, and kept their standing no longer: and whereas the flame soon molt out, thinking that to be the least way, they left them thither, even to the top and ridge of the Mountains. Then and there, they light upon certain of the Oxen wandering afar from their company, and at first seeing them afar off, but not well discerning them, they imagined that they spied fire, and breathed the biz bazing flames out of their mouths; and wondering at the strange sight, stood still amazed and astonished. But when afterwards they discovered the device, and found it out to be a jubilous and deceitful invention, proceeding from man brain, they mistrusted withal some secret trams and an uhit, and with an exceeding noise fled away as fast as ever they could, and flambled upon the same rulers of their enemies, that were lightly armed. But they were afraid as well of the one side as the other, to begin any skirmish in the night season, and layed until day light. In the mean while, Annibal having conducted his whole army through the frights, and killed some of his enemies in the very pale, encamped himself in the territory of Alsfai. Fabius decreed this tumult well enough, but doubting some privy ambush, and avoiding utterly all night battles, kept his men within the strength of their rampiers. At the break of day there began a skirmish on the side of the hills in which the Romans as being far more in number, had environed on every side the light-armed vanguard of the enemies, and soon defeated them, but that a band of Spaniards, sent back of purpose from Annibal, came to rescue them: who being better acquainted with the Mountains, and more light and nimble in running among the crags and cliffs, by reason of well of the agility of body, as the falcon of their light harness, easily in that kind of skirmish, avoided and shunned from their enemy, heavily armed at all pieces, and used to high upon the plain, and so stood firmly and keep their ground. Whereupon in the end they parted amongst one from the other, but nothing near on even hand: for the Spaniards in a manner all, went clear away unhurt, the Romans lost some of their men: and so on both parts they returned to their camps. Fabius likewise removed, and having halted over the frights of the forest, encamped in a high ground, and strongly intrenched even over Alsfai. Then Annibal making as though he would march through Samnium toward Rome, returned back, waiting and insulting the country as far as to the Peligni. And Fabius hovered hill upon the Hill tops between the army of his enemies and the City of Rome: leading his host to, as neither he departed far, nor yet encountered and confronted his enemy. Then Annibal turned his way, and departed from the Peligni, and retired himself into Apulia, until he was come as far as Geryon, a City abandoned and forlorn of the inhabitants, by reason that a part of their wall was fallen down, decayed and ruined. The Dictator forthis his camp in the territory of Larinum. Now was he lent for home from thence to Rome, by occasion of certain solemn sacrifices: whereupon, he conferred and dealt with the General of the Cavalry, not only by way of absolute commandment, but also with advice and perquisites, yea, and as one would say, by prayer and intercession. 'That he would trust more upon confident counsel, than doubtful fortune, and be directed and guided rather by him, than follow the flees of Sempronius and Flaminius: and not think there was nothing done and effected, and make no reckoning of this. That the enemy had been dallied withal, and trifled out, mocked and defused almost all the summer long. Why, even H Physicians (quoth he) many times do more good to the sick body of the patient, by giving reft and repose, than by frying and diluting the humors therein. And no small matter is it, that we are vanquished and overcome no more, at an enemy's hands to oftentate to victory. And after continual toils and overthrows, to have had reft and a time of breathing. Having in this wise admonished the General of horse aforehand (but all in vein) he took his way to Rome.

In the beginning of this summer, wherein their exploits were performed, war began also in Spain both by sea and land. After this to that number of ships which he had received ready rigged and well appointed of his brother, joined other ten. To Humi he gave the charge of a fleet of forty sail: and so, looking from Carthage, whilst his ships kept near to land, he conducted his army along the River upon the strand; ready to give battle to the enemy, however he should hap to encounter him either by land or sea, Cu. Seiso after he had intelligence that the enemy was removed out of his wintering harbour, at the first had likewise the same intention and purpose, but afterwards doubting to encounter by land, upon the exceeding great report that went of new aids, he embarked his belt and most choice foiards, and with a fleet of 35 sail, let forward to meet the enemy. And the second day after that he had looked from Tarace, he came to the rode distant ten miles from the mouth of the River Tiber. From whence, two hundreds of the Masilians were sent out afoot, and brought word, that the Carthaginian Armada rode in the mouth of the River, and that the tents were pitched upon the bank. And therefore to the end that he might surprize them at unawares, and unlooking for them, with all the fearful terror at once, that he could possibly, he weighed anchor, and set sail toward the enemy. In Spain there are many Towns standing upon high grounds, which leave the inhabitants of the country in good stead, both as watch-Towers to discover, and allowances to withstand Thieves and Rovers.
From whence the enemies ships were defrayed full, and a signal given to Aferubal: in such fort, as the trouble and trouble arode upon the land, and in the camp, before any was seen on the Sea and amongst the ships; as for yet neither noise of oars, nor any ordinary thing like of mariners, was heard; nor yet the capes and promontories between suffered the fleet to be seen. But then, all on a sudden, certain Horfemen lento from Aferubal one after another; commanded the foiards (who either wandred along the strand, or rate quiet within their pavilions; looking for nothing lefe than flight that day) presently in all battle to go abroad, and to arm for that the Roman fleet was not far from the haven. This commandment the Horfemen that were lento, gave every where. And within a while Aferubal came in perton with the whole army. All was on a hurry, and full of jardy alarms; whilst both mariners and foiards, made halt to be shippid, rather like men that fled from land, then went to fight. scarce were they all embarked; when some of them loded from the shoal, and plucked up Anchors, others out the Anchor Cables, for that nothing should stay them: and all that they did, was with much haste; that what the foiards were occupied in making themselves ready to fight; the mariners were hindered in their busines: and whilst the mariners made speed, the foiards were kept from taking their armour, and fitting themselves therewith. By which time Seiso was not only approached near, but also had marshalled and ordered his ships ready to fight, So as the Carthaginians were troubled as well with the heavy body and tumult of their own people, as with the assail and battle of their enemies. And having (by a truth) made an assay and proffer of fight, rather than begin any indeed, they turned away their fleet, and fled. And indeed, when they were once put to flight (by reason they were parted stouter all abroad, and lay open to so many of their enemies, following them up the poone all at once) that they were ready and easy to be bunged and pierced, they rowed on all hands to the shore. Some were faut to wade to Land; others leapt on drye ground; one fort armed, another fort unarmed; and to escape to their company, embattal-ised along the strand. Howbeit, in the very first encounter and onset, two Carthaginian ships were taken, and four sunk. The Romans, albeit they law the enemies, masters of the Land, and might behold them stand in battall array all along the River face upon the banks, yet made them no offay, but chaled the fearfull fleet of their enemies: and to so many ships, as either had not creash-pired, divided, and broken their items, with dashings upon the shore, or were not run a ground, and luck fell by their keels in the shelves, thote they drew up, and warped into the deep; with ropes fastned to their poops; and to of thirty they took five and twenty. And yet, the taking of these vellots was not the beat and goodliest work of their victory: but this polluted all; that with one light skirmish they became L.L. of all the Sea along the coastes. And therefore striving with their whole navy before Honoset, they landed their men, won the City by terrible assall, stuck it, and from thence went onward toward Carthage. And after they had foraged and visitd all the territory about, at the last, they fired the very houses thatjoynd to the walls and gates of the City. From thence the Armada laden now and charged with rich pillage, sailed as far as Longiosa. Where they found great store of Sparr [to make Cables] provided: and laid up thereby Afer-ubal to serve the navy: and when they had taken three of so much as they needed, they made a light fire of all the rest. Neither coasted the Roman fleet along the continent and main only; and scoured those parts which lay out into the Sea, but pasted also into the Ile of Ebusur: where they alluded boldly for two days space, the head City of the land, with much ado, and small effect. And when they perceived, that they spent time in vain, and were past all hope to win it, they fell to rob and spoil the country, and alter their had rived and burned certain villages, and got a greater booty & pillage than they had out of the main, they retired themselves to their ships: and thither came Embassadors from the Islands Balares unto Scipio giving peace. From there he came back with the tinct, and returned into the bither part of the Province, whither retorted unto him the Embassadors of all the Nations that inhabit about Iberus, and of many also from the farthest part of all Span. But of States that absolutely came under the obedience of the people of Rome, doing fealty and homage unto them, and giving hostages for assurance of their allegiance there were above 150. Scipio therefore, taking himself strong enough in land forces, went on as far as the bond of Cassius, and Africanius retired himself into Ialba, near the Ocean sea. Here upon the rest of the Simpson was likewise to quiet: and quiet had it been, for anything that the Carthaginians did to the contrary. But, over and besides the natural disposition of all Spaniards mutinous, base and evermore dexterous of novelties and alterations, Magnanimous a Nobleman, who before time had been the Lord and Prince of the Hereteges, seeing the Arians retired so from the forest toward the sea-coast, flared up the the people of his country, and invaded the peaceable Territories of the Romans aloof, for to spoil and waste the same. Again whom there were sent from Spo three thousand Romans, besides certain auxiliary soldiers also, lightly armed: who in a sight skirmish discomfited his forces. (as being a power gathered in haste,) and discomfited (few many, took some prisoners, and disarmed the greater part of them. Nevertheless the rumour of this alarm caused Africanius as he departed to the Ocean, to toils the river iberothabka again, for the reside and defence of his friends and Allies. The Carthaginians were encamped in the territory of the lie. sionian, and the Romans near the new Armoda, when sudden new disquieted the war another way. The Prince of the Ceitiberians, who had sent them from their country, and hostages unto the Romans upon a meagler dispatch into them from Spo, arose up in arms, and entered the Province of the Carthaginians with a strong and proficient army, won three towns by assault, and afterwards, in two battals which they fought with Africanius, right valiantly flew 15000 enemies, and took 4000 prisoners, and many military ensigns they bare away.

While Span and other in these terms, P. Scipio came as I. Deputy into that Province, continuing till his government a ter his Consulship expired, and was sent from the Senate with thirty ships of war, eight thousand footiers, and great store of victuals. This great fleet, in regard of many miles and ships of burden which accompanied it, was Kennedy and discovered afar off, to the great joy both of Romans and also of their friends and associates, and arrived within the port and haven of Tartusio. Where the three diers were disembarked, and Scipio joined with his brother: and from that time forward they agreed together, and with one accord managed the war. And whiles the Carthaginians were amused with the Ceitiberian war they made no stay, but penned over to Scipio, & seeing no enemy they marched on toward Saguntum; for that the fruit went, that the hostages of a Span were delivered unto the custody of Aendoza, were kept there in hold within the Castle, but with a small guard about them. That was the only pledge which the Romans in the Cities of Spain, whose minds were well affrighted and enline to entertain league and society with the Romans, but they feared lest if they should revolt, it would cost the lives of their children. This bond which held Spain in awe one man could them of, by means of a device and practive more witty and subtiler than honest and loyal. There was at Saguntum, one Accedus a Noblenman of Spain, a native and religious detest time unto the Carthaginians: but then (as the nature is for the most part of their Barbarians) as fortune altered her countenance, so changed he his allegiance. And supposing that he should fall into the enemies, without performing memorable treason and delivering into their hands one thing or other of great importance, he should be good enough to be a vile, base and infamous creature, he could not know that he might wind himself into their new Allies, and win them by some good service, unto their bell and greatest behefh. And considering all the means that Fortune might bring within his compass to effect, he employed himself especially at the length to let free and deliver those hostages thinking that the only way to win and procure unto the Romans the amity of all the Princes and great men of Spain. But knowing assuredly, that without warrant from Boffer the Connubile of the Calle, the keepers of those hostages would do nothing, he fetched in hand and cunningly goeth to work with Boffer himself. Now lay Boffer in Camp without the City by the water side, to impeach the Romans enquiring the haven. Thither came Accedus to him, withdrew him apart into a secret place, and declared unto him as a man ignorant, in what state things stood. Namely, "That it was fear and nothing else that kept the Spaniards unto that day in obedience, because the Romans were so far off; but now the Romans were encamped on this side iberothabka, as a fire for the keep and place of refuge unto them, if they minded any innovation and change of State: and therefore seeing they could not long be kept by fear they were to be obliged and bound unto Aendoza by some favour and good turn. When Boffer marvelled and demanded, what sudden accident this might be: and of so great consequence, Mary, (quoth he) send back the hostages into their own Cities. An acceptable present that will be both particularly to their parents, who are of greatest calling and reputation in their own countries, and also generally to all the Cities and Nations. Every man (you know) is defirous to be trusted: and for the most part credit given frankly unto one, bindeth him thereby to be more faithfull. The ministry and charge of conducting the hostages home to their own homets, I will require to have mine own self, that I may further a plot and device of my own, with mine own proper service and employment: and the thing which of it fell in nature is acceptable, I will in what manner can grace and commend the name, and make it more meritorious. Having thus perfwaded the man, being not altogether to wily, as other Carthaginians naturally are, he went by night secretly as far as the Corps de guard of the enemies, and after he had met and talked with some Spaniards that were auxiliary soldiers in the Camp and by them was brought before Scipio; he declared unto him his whole intent and designment, and the cause of his coming. And after they had given and received faithful promise mutually between them, and agreed of time and place for the delivery of the hostages unto Scipio, he returned again to Saguamum. The day following, he sent with Dick, in receiving Commission from him, for the execution of this matter. And thus being dimined and having his dispatch, he purposed to go in the night to the end that he might (forsooth) avoid the watch and wards of the enemies, the Romans: and at the hour appointed he raised those who had the guard and custody of the children, and put himself on his way; and (simple man he) as if he had been altogether ignorant of that which hapned, brought them within the compacts of an Ambushment, forelaid beforehand by his own wily and crafty devices: and so were they brought into the Roman Camp. All other points besides concerning the rendering of the hostages, according to the agreement and appointment with Dick, were performed in the same order, as they found have passed, in cafe all had been done in the name of the Carthaginians, and to their behoof. But the Romans won much more thank, and gained greater favour thereby, than the Carthaginians could have attained in the like untell. For the Carthaginians (whom in their prosperous success the Spaniards had found by experience to be rigorous unto them and proud) might have been suppos'd if they had done it now, to have been mollified and made more benign and gracious through adverse fortune and fear: but Scipio the Roman General, at his first coming, and unknown beforetime, began with a notable example and testimony of clemency and liberality. And *Actaeon besides received a wife and prudent man seemed not without great reason to have made exchange of his Allies and Friends. Whereupon they all desired with one accord to revolt and presently they had taken arms indeed and rebelled, but for the approach of winter which forced as well Romans as Carthaginians to betake themselves to their winter hiber.

There were the occurrences that fell out also in Spain, in the second summer of the Punic war: whiles in Italy the wise and wary delays the indulgent temporizing of Fabius in the manner of his warfare gave the Romans some repit and incumbrance of their foes and overthrows. Which as it wrought in an *Aerial no small trouble of mind and perplexity, to see that the Romans at the last had chosen for their General a man who managed war by circumspection and guidance of fouldiers and not by adventure of fickle fortune: so it was displeased of his own Citizens, as well those that were armed abroad as those at home: & namely when during the absence of the Dictator, there hapned to be a field fought through the rashness of the General of the Cavalry, with more joyful success (to speak truly) than happy and fortunate. Two other things there were besides, that caused the Dictator to be worse thought of, and in great disgrace and obloquy. The one through the delicate and wily policy of Annibal: who being envoyed by certain Idiotic Traitors (that fled from Rome unto him) which were the lands and possessions of the Dictator, gave express commandment when he had destroyed the country about, and made all even with the ground, to forbear all kind of hostility there only, and to touch nothing of his, either by fire or sword: to the end it might be thought there had been some packing between him and Annibal; and that this was the hire and consideration agreed upon between them two. The other arose from an action of his own: namely, about the exchange and conveying of certain prisoners or captives: which peradventure at the first appearance might have seemed doubtful and fitful (because therein he had not for to have the Commission and approbation of the Senate) but in the end and up-shot it turned no doubt, to his singular praise and commendation. In that entrecas above said it was capitulate between both Generals, of Romans and Carthaginians, (like it had been afore in the first Punic war) That whether ride received more Captives than they gave again, should yield for every one soldier two pound and a half of silver. When it fell out therefore that the Roman Dictator Fabius, had received more prisoners by 247 than Annibal, and the payment of the silver for those due; after much debate in the Senate house, (because he had no direction therein from the E.L.) was delayed, and no order taken therefore; he sent his Ion to Rome of purpose, to make sale of his lands, which had not been eumdammed by Annibal; and to his own cost and out of his private purse did discharge a publice debt.

Annibal now lay in larger before the walls of Gerion, a City which he had won and set on fire, and referred a few houses standing, to serve him instead of barns and garnerers for his grain. From thence he sent out two third parts of his forces to survey country, and remained himself in guard with one third part, ready in arms, (but lightly appointed and without any bag and baggage) in a meet and convenient place; both for defence of the Camp, and also for discovery of all the oaths about that no affall were made upon the purveyors. The Roman Army lay then in the Territory of Larimian, and the Captain General was M. Aemilius. Commander of the horsemens because the Dictator (as above said) was gone to the City of Rome: But whereas these had usually encamped before upon some high hill and strong place (of security) now they began to draw down into the vale and the plain ground, and to devise crafty means and strategies beyond the natural reach of the Commander himself; namely, how they might affall either the purveyors as they straggled about the country, or set upon the Camp of their enemies, left with a small power and guard to defend it. Ambibal was not ignorant, that together with the General, the whole manner and conduct of their warfare was changed: and that the enemy would fight rather more rashly and hastily, than wisely and warily. And himself (who would have thought it, considering the enemy was approached nearer) sent out a third part of his fowlers to provide corn and forage, and kept the other twain with him in the Camp: he removed also his tents nearer to the Romans, almost two miles off from Capua, to a little hill within the sight of the enemies, and for the end they might know he was minded and ready to receive and defend the purveyors, if happily they should be charged upon. Then eipped Ambibal another hill nearer, and standing even over the very Camp of the Romans. For the gaining whereof, (seeing that if he should have gone by day time openly, he had been no doubt presented by the enemies, who would have seized it first by reason it was nearer unto them) he lent certain Numidian horsemen, who inspired it and kept it. But the Romans making little or no account of their small number, drove them the morrow after from thence, and thither removed their own tents: so that there was but a little distance between one Camp and the other, and the same, in a manner wholly taken up and replenished with Romans: and withall, at the same time, the horsemens of the Romans with certain footmen lightly armed were sent out at a poltern gate of the Camp (which opened now upon the CARTHAGINIANS) against the foragers, whom they discomfited, put to flight, and flew a great number of them. Neither durst Ambibal line forth to skirmish; for, having to few about him, he was hardly able to defend his Camp, in case it had been assaulted. So he was driven now to use the policy and shifts of FABIUS, (for part of his forces were away) and managed his war, sitting full as it were, and keeping the enemy at a bay and at arm's end: and so retired with his fowlers to the former Camp, under the walls of Capua. Some write, that there was a field pitched, and a tent built, and with banners displayed, wherein Ambibal at the first encounter was discomfited and chased to his Camp: but from thence they issued forth who were within, and so the feant turned upon the Romans, who on a sudden were put to the worst: but by the coming of Numerius Decimus (a Samnite) with succour, the fight was reconciled and renewed. This man, not only nobly defended, but also of great power and wealth, as well in Campania his native country, where he was born, as throughout all Samnium (by order and commandment from the Dictator) came with a power of 8000 foot, and 300 horse toward the Camp; and being eipped by Ambibal on the backside, gave both parties good hope of fresh and new aid. But when the voice went, that Fabius at the same time was coming also from Rome, Ambibal for fear of being entrapped within some ambush, retired back with his own men, and the Romans made pursuit after him: and with the help of Numerius the Samnite, won in one day by force two fortresses. So there were 6000 enemies slain, and 3000 Romans. And yet as equal in a manner as the loss was of both parts, the renown ran to Rome of a brave victory, with letters also in post from the General of the Roman full of folly and vanity. Much arguing there was and debate about these matters, both in Senate, and before the people sundry times. And when all the City besides was joyous, and the Dictator alone gave no credit either to the brunt that was blazed, or the letters laying withal,

That if all were true yet he feared more the fawning than frowning of fortune: then M. METELLUS a Tribune of the Commons stepped forth and said, "That this above all was not to be little red: that the Dictator, not only while he lay in Camp opposed himself against all goodness, and stained all valorous services: but also being absent from thence, refrained and discharged that which was well done and worthily achieved: and that he, of purpose, drew the war in length and prolonged the time to the end he might continue the longer in government, and be the man alone to command all both in the City and abroad in the Army: for one of the Consuls was slain in battle, the other under a pretence and colour of pursuing the CARTHAGINIAN fleet, was sent out of the way, far enough off from Italy: as for the four Pratores, they were employed both in Sicily and Sardinia: and yet neither of those two Provinces had any need of a Deputy there. And M. MINUTIUS General of the horsemens, was kept prisoner as it were, and might neither see enemy, nor do any martial exploit. And hereupon it is (quoth he) that not only S. MINUCIUS (whereof the possession was surrendered unto the CARTHAGINIANS, as it were a territory lying beyond iterum) but the Campane, Calene, and Falern territories were utterly overrun and wasted, while the Dictator abode still at Cafelium, and with the legions of the people of Rome defended his own lands and possessions only. And when the Army and General of the Cavalry were desirous of battle they were kept back enclosed in a manner within the compass of the Camp: & their weapons taken from them, as if they had been captive enemies: & at length when the Dictator was once departed from them, they issued forth of the Camp, like men delivered from siege, & so discomfited & put to flight their enemies. In consideration of all these things, (he said) the Commons of Rome were of that courage, as sometimes they had been he would boldly have put up a bill for to deprive C. Fabius of his government. But now for this time, he would propose a more in different & reasonable law, by virtue whereof the Commander of horsemens may be made equal with the Dictator in authority and power. Yet so as that Q. Fabius might not be sent unto the Army, before that he had furnished & ordained another CoI, in the room of C. Flaminius. The Dictator forbade altogether to come into any of these assemblies of the people, as a man in action and pleading nothing popular, and who framed not himself to the humor of the common people: Neither was he in the Senate house heard with patience, at what time as he either magnified and extolled the valour of the enemy; or rather spoke of the toasts and toasts received for The two years space, through the relations and unskilfulness of the Commanders: and said, that the General of the horsemens was to answer and give account for fighting against his edit and express commandments. Moreover (quoth he) if I were in place of sovereign rule and government, to do all according I thought good, I would effect and bring to pass within few days:thar men should know, that a good warrior was to make small reckoning of fortune but wisdom, wit, and counsel were to guide and direct all. And for mine own part, I deem it a great honor & glory of to have preferred an army in a time of trouble and danger from shame and ignominy, than to have many thousands of enemies. After he had made these and much like speeches & reasons in vain, and created for Col, M. Attius Regular: for that he would not be present to debate the question concerning the right and authority of his own government, he departed by night facion forward the army; even the very day before that the foresaid law should be propounded. The morning came, and the commons were assembled to an audience: wherein men seemed rather feer cently in their hearts to make the Dictator & to affect and favour the General of the horsemens, than dunt come forth and be keen to persuade and set forward that which pleased them all in common. And notwithstanding the bill was exceedingly well liked of, yet there wanted one to give some credit and authority thereunto. At length, one stepped forth to let it on foot, namely, C.

Terentius Varro, who the year before had been Prator, a man not only of obscure degree by calling, but also of vie & base parentage defended. His father was (as they say) a Butcher, who kept shop and sold meat himself; and trained up his son as his apprentice in the same mechanical and servile occupation. This Varro being a young man, and well left by his father (who was grown rich, and beginning greatly by his trade) gave his mind and conceived some hope to live more gentlemanlike: and took a great liking to the common place, and pleasing at the bar: exercising himself in entertaining causes of bale persons, against the estate and name of honest Citizens, and of good reputation: by means whereof he grew to be known among the people; and afterwards was advanced to place of worship and honour. And having been Treasurer of the City, and born both Edileships, as well that of the Chair, as of the other: and at length gone through one Pratorship, he aspired now higher in hope to be Consul; and craftily waited his time and sought to wound himself with the favor of the people: by men of all kinds of opinion and hard covertly had of the Dictator. & thus he alone went away with all the first and utmost love of the Commons.

all men that were either at Rome or in the Army, both the public and had, in general (excepting the Dictator himself) received and admitted the bill; as made to his disgrace and shameful reproach.
But he with the very same gravity and constancy of heart endured these injurious course & dealing of the people raging against him, wherewith he beat upon his adversaries flattering & charging him before the multitude: and having received in the way as he journeyed, letters importing the decree of the Senate, for dividing his authority equally with the General of the horsemens, and being affured that notwithstanding his commission were parted and communicated with another, yet his skill and sufficiency of conduct and command remained full with him self: with a mind invincible as well against Citizens as enemies, he returned to the army. But Minmius, who before that time was hardly to be endured, both for his fortunate successes & also for the favor of the M commonFortnow very beyond all measure and bounds of modestly, wanted and gloried in that had conquered & got the mastery over Fabius as well as over Annibal. What Fabius [Tay] who in time of difficulties, the magnanimity of heart and Captain that could be found out match Annibal: that the superior Magistrate was by the content & approbation of the people, (a thing never to be found in any record of Chronicles) made but even equal with the inferior of: to wit the Dictator with the General of the horsemens: and in that City, wherein the Commanders of the Cavalry were wont to quake and tremble at the rods and axes of the Dictator.
The Car

or till continuedinging in flesh and blood, condemned in the judgment both of God and N man, Wherupon the very first day that he & Fabius were met together: he said that they were above all things to determine & set down in what sort they might order this their equal authority of government. He for his part thought it best, that each other day (or if longer time between were imposed better) they should one after the other alternatively have the full and whole command of all for the time in their several turns: that if any occasion of fighting a battle were pretenced, they might be able to counter the whole enemy, not only in coniell, but also in power and strength. Q. Fabius liked not of this imposing that whatsoever lay in the hands and disposition of his staff colleague must needs be subject unto the arbitration of Fortune: Saying moreover unto him. That he was indeed to impart unto him government and rule but not wholly to depart therefrom, and shun himself out. And therefore he would never willingly fall (to his power) O manage by counsel and discretion one part or other: neither would he divide with him either time or dates, but the forces and armies that Minmius might have one moiety, and himself ano-other; & since he might not preserve by his own counsel & policy, yet he would endeavour to as far as he could, to love somewhat. And so much he prevailed, that they parted the Leagions between them, as the manner of the Consuls was. The fifth and fourth fell to Minnius, the second and third to Fabius. In like manner they divided the horsemens number for number, and the auxiliary foundiers of Allies and Latines, The General of the horsemens would needs likewise that they should be encamped alonther.

Annibal
Annius conceived hereupon a two-fold joy, (for he was not ignorant of all that was done among the enemies, partly by intelligence given him thence by fugitives, and partly by means of his own agents and spies,) for he made this reckoning, both that he should deal well-enough with the Latin臺南 of Minimus, and handle him in his kind; and also that the prudent policy of Fabius was abridged and diminished by the one half. Now there was a little hill between the Camp of Minimus and the Carthaginians: and no doubt there was, but that he who could gain it aforesaid should have the advantage of the enemy, in regard of the ground. That hill Annius was not to deliberate to get without skirmish, & yet it had been a matter of good importance, as willing thereby to give some occasion of fighting and skirmishing with Minimus, whom he would very well be at alway's and enough to encounter him and make resistance. The plain all between, seemed at the first sight nothing commodious nor good for men that would lay an ambuscade, because it was neither over-grown with any woods, nor yet in any part roughy over-spread and covered so much as with briers and brambles. But in very deed the ground was naturally made for to cover and hide an Ambuscado: and the kind, because in to naked and bare a valley, none would have imagined and inspected any decent lines, and forelaying of war. And yet there were in divers mounds and corners thereof certain hollow rocks and caves, and some of them sufficient capacity to receive 300 armed men. In these lurking holes there were betwixt 5000 of horsemen and footmen one with another, some in one place, some in another, according as they might commodiously lie there closely hidden. And yet, let that the firing of any one that might chance to go forth undetected, or the glittering of armour, should bewray the trains in open a valley, Annius by sending out at the break of day (some few for to seize the afore-said hill, withdrew the eyes of his enemies another way. The at the first view were depilated of the Romans for their small number, and every man was deeming to be doing with them, and their fingers itched for to set the enemy's back, and drive them from thence. The General himself Minimus, as fool-hardy and forward as he was most, founded the army and commanded to go to the winning of the place, bravely and threatening of the enemies fully vainly. First, he sent forth his light armed men to skirmish, but afterwards, the Cornets of horsemen set close and jointly together in array; and at the left, seeing the enemies encloosed with new maccoues and supplies, he advanced forward himself with his Legions in order of battle.

Annius had his wherefore, he perceived his men to be disordered, made out continuance steps aside one another, both of horse and foot, ever as the front encreased and grew hotter: to as now, he had his wherefore, he perceived his men to be disordered, and continued them, flanking them on both sides and charging withall behind, that neither their enemy served any of them to fight, nor their hope remained to fly and escape away. Then Fabius hearing the first cry, and knowing thereby that they were in great fear, and seeing besides a far off of their battal disordered and in disarray, "I thought it would be better for me to remain so that I feared, it is taken out: Fortune I see well, hath over-routed foot-hardnesh and taken it tardy. The man, forfooth thou must needs be made e-

In this sort, and all the rest, and none but the enemies were to be feared and sought, and the Romans" were disbanded, and altered anfder about all, advanced again speedily upon all parts, and rallied themselves to the entire battal: the rest who by whole troops had turned their backs, made head again upon the enemy; and one while giving ground and retiring by little and little, another while having in a ring and round together led off, kept this order by turns: so as now, both they that were discomposed, and those that were routed became reduced into one body.

Since that we therefore are not so happy as to attain unto the highest degree of wit, and pertection of nature, let us content our selves with the second place, and keep a mean between:

and whilsts we learn to rate, let us lettle our selves and relrive to obey him that is wiser than our selves. Let us joy in Camp with Fabius, and when we have preserved our selves and our enigns before his pavilion and tribunal, see that when I salute him by the name of Father (as is becomming his excellent majesty and the benefit by us of him received) that ye also call those foolish your Patrons, whose valiant hands and trusty arms were really protected you: that this day may give us yet, if nothing else the honour and name of thankfull persons. Having thus said, he gave commandment to pack up bag and baggage and to disilodge and as they marched in good array toward the Camp of the Dictator, they struck both him and also all about him into a wonder and admiration. And having pitched their enigns before the Tribunal: then Multus, the General of the horse went forth before the rest: and after he had greeted Fabius himself as his Father, and the whole Army likewise called those about Fabricius, by the name of Patrons.

To my parents (quoth he) O Dictator, unto whom I have made you equall in name only (as much as my tongue will give me leave) I am bound and beholden for my own life only and no more; but to you I am indebted for saving both my life, and all these here. The Act therefore and ordinance of the Commons which hath been a clog and burden to me rather than an honour, here of my self I renounce, revoke, and aboliit; and (that which I pray God may prove to the good both of you and me) of mine army and yours, as well that which is preserved as that which is the preserver) to submit and surrender again myself under your command and government, together with these enigns and legions thereto belonging; believing you pardon me, and to entertain me in the room of the General of the Cavalry, and thole here with me, every man in his former place. Then interchageably they gave their hands one to another: and the fouldiers

(after the assembly dismissed) were curteously invict, and friendly entertained, as well by them that were unknown unto them as of their acquaintance, and so the day, dolorous, heavy, and almost dimfand and accursed, turn'd to be joyful and festival.

So soon as tidings came to Rome of these occurrences, and the fame confirmed as well by the letters of the Generals themselves, as also by the common voice of fouldiers from both Armies, every man the best he could, prais'd and extolled Maximum, up to the sky; whose honour and reputation was as great in the opinion of Annibals and the Carthaginians, as then and never before, they found that they had to deal and war in Italy, and with Romans. As for the two years space before, they let to light by Roman Captains: and fouldiers that they could be hardly perwaded that they, warred with that Nation, whereof there went to great a fame, and of whom their forefathers had reported alwys wonders and terrible things. They lay alfo, that Annibal as he returned out of the field, gave out these words, that the cloud which settled on the hill tops, hovered so long in the wind that it proved a tempestuous storm in the end.

While these things were doing in Italy, Cu. Servilvius Geminius the Consul, having failed about the coasts of Siculina and Coroin with his fleet, and received hostile sails both of the one side and the other, passed over into Affricke: and before that he landed in the continent and firm land, he wasted the Iland Meninx, and having received ten talents of silver of the inhabitants there-about, for fear lest their Territory also should be consumed with fire, and iopolled as well as the reft he came to Affricke, and there let his forces alfo. From thence he led his fouldiers and mariners likeon with one another disband and out of order; as if they were to rob and iopol some deart lands, unpeopled and void of Inhabitants. Whereupon they fell unavoidably into an ambush, and being unskilful of the country, and therewith but few and scattered, they were soon ecloned among many, and with much slaughter and flamefull flight were driven and beaten back to their ships. The fleet thus having lost a thousand men, and one Treasurer of the Army among them called Sempronius Blastus, looted in great haste from the shore (which now was overspread by enemies) and held their course for Sicily, and at Cytheraus was let over and delivered to T Otacitus the Praetor, for to be brought back again to Rome, by P. Sarchis his Lieutenant, Cu. Servilvius himself journeyed through Sicily by land, and crost the narrow seas into Italy: for both he and his Colleague M. Attius were lent for by the letters of Fabius, to receive the Army at his hands, now that his six-months sovereign government was well near expired. All the Annals in a manner do record, that Fabius was the man, who during his Dictatorship, fought and waged war with Annibal, Callin wrote also, that he was created Dictator by the people. But both Callinus and the rest, either knew not or else forgot, that the Consul Servilvius, who then was far from Rome, and in the Province of France, had the lawful right and authority only to nominate a Dictator:

and because the City was affrighted, by reason of that notable overthrow could not stay so long, they were driven to this hint, That there should be created by the people a Pro Dictator or Di-tator his Deputy. But the noble acts and glorious renown of that General, together with the O title of his Image, which might recommend his house more honourable to posterity, gained eafily this point, and caused the Pro Dictator to be reputed Dictator, and so called.

The Consuls, M. Attius Regulus, and Cu. Servilvius Gentilus, having received the army (as beforefaid) fortified in good time the places for winning harbour (for it was then the Autumn season) conducted and managed the wars together in great concord, and followed the fame polit-tick course that Fabius had done before them. For as Annibal made res seats any time to purvey corn, they would meet him just at every turn, in fundry places, and either cut off the tail of his

A men, or intercept and catch them as they went flattering, but never hazard all in one's field: the only thing that the enemy shot at, by all the means he could devise, and to near driven was Annibal: and to those terms of want and scarcity, that but for very famine (left by his dilatoriness and departure he might be thought to fly), he would have retired back into Gallia, as being out of all hope to maintain and sustain his Army with victuals in those parts, in case the new Conuls who next succeeded, should hold on till the same policy and manner of warfare, Winter now approached, and all the war that was continued and rife about: Serious at what time there arrived at Rome Embassadors from Naples, who brought with them, and presented into the Council-House, forty fanlie boles of beaten gold: and withal delivered this speech, and said,

B That they knew full well, how the Treasure of the people of Rome was wasted and confirmed by long wars, and forasmuch as the said wars were maintained, as well for the defence of the Cities and Lands of allies, as for Rome, the very head, mother City, and principal City of all Italy, and for the sovereign dominion and Empire thereof, the Neapolitans thought it meet and reason, that what store of gold their ancestors had left unto them, were it for to adorn and deck themselves, or to relieve them in time of need and necessity, with it they were to aid and help the people of Rome in their adversity. And if they could have bestowed themselves of any other means besides, wherein they might prevail and befriended them they would as willingly and frankly have made presentment thereof: saying, moreover, that the Senators of Rome should do them a high pleasure, if they would make account of all that the men of Naples had as their own: and judge them worthy, at whose hands they would vouchsafe to accept a present; much greater, and more precious in regard of the mind and affection of the givers than the substance and value of the thing. The Embassadors were highly thanked, as well for their liberality and munificence, as for the care they had of them and that bolt was only received which weighed least.

About the same time, a Carthaginian spy, who for two years space had walked unknown and unsuspected, was detected and apprehended now at Rome: and after his hands were cut off, was suffered to depart. Five and twenty slaves were crucified for a conspiracy contrived in Campus Martius. The informer was made free and had 3000 pounds of brass bullion given him for a reward.

Di That they had also sent Embassadors to Philip King of the Macedonians, to demand Demetrius Phalaris, who having been vanquished in plain field, was fled into him. Others likewise were dispatched to the Ligurians, as well to expostulate with them and complain, that they had succoured Annibal with men, money, and other munitions: as also to hearken and learn (seeing they were so near) what the Boians and inborians did or went about. Besides, a third Embassage was addressed as far as Libyrians into King Ptolemus, to enquire and call for the Tribute, whereof the term was expired and past: and he was minded to take a longer day, that to receive hollages and pledges of him for security. See how careful the Romans were, and what a provident eye they had, notwithstanding the great war which lay heavily upon their necks and shoulders, to their other affairs: inobloquy as no one thing in the world, how distant and remote forever, was by them neglected. But as concerning religion, and Church matters, they made some truce of conciliation, that the Temple of Concord (which L. Manlius, L. Deputy in Gallia, had vowed two years before to build by a donation of a legation and mutiny of soldiers) was not yet set out to workmen or to be built or edified accordingly. And therefore two Domus were for that purpose created by Emilianus the Praetor, or L. Governor of the City, namely, Ca. Popul. et Ca. Quintus Flaminius who gave order, that the Temple should be built upon the Capitol hill. The same Praetor, by sentence of a decree of the Senate, sent his letters into the Conuls, importuning this much, That if they thought good, one of them should repair to Rome for the creation of new Conuls; and that himself would summon the Parliament against that day which it should please them to appoint. The Conuls wrote back again according to the premises, That they might not depart far from the enemy without damage of State: advising them to hold an assembly for the Election aforesaid, by authority of an interregent, rather than that one of the Conuls should be called away from the wars. But the L. of the Senate thought it better to have a Dictator chosen by one of the Conuls, for the holding of that high Court of Parliament. So L. Vettius Plauno, was nominated Dictator, and he chose for Generall of the Hollemen M. Pompeius Mabro. But these men being not only and lawfully created were commanded, the fortunates end to give over their places, and then the matter grew to an Inter-reign. The Conuls had their Commision for government and conduct of the Army, continued and confirmed for one year longer. The Senators named for Interregency, with Ca. Londrin. Coms, the son of Appius, and after him P. Cornelius Afer. During whole Inter-reign, the Parliament was held, with much contention and debate between the Nobles and the Common.

G That the vulgar people endeavoured to advance unto the Comitialship C. Terentius Varro, a man of their own cost and condition, one crept into good liking and favour with the common sort by opposing himself and contending against great personages, and by other popular practices and courses that he used to win grace among the people; as namely, by abusing the greatness of Fabius, and the Majesty of the Dictatorship: for nothing was there elie in him, to commend him to the world, but a malicious mind to bring others into disgrace. The Nobles withstood the Commons all they could to prevent this mischief; That men should not take a cullome to be their equals, by means of inveighing and making head against them, Bibilius Heroicus a Tribune of the Com.

...and kinsman to C. Terentius, blamed and accused much not only the Senate, but also the Hugers, in that they forbade the Dictator to finish and go through with the election: and by drawing them in hatred, sought to put him in a false and credit into Terentius his Candidate, who (hoped to be Consul. First, guord he, whereas the Noblemen for many years together, sought occasions of war and trained Amalphi into Italy, the same persons craftily have made a long war of it when it might have been brought to a final end before now. Also, when it was well seen that they might have fought a battle with the common power of four legions all together, seeing that M. Memmius in the absence of Fabius had a lucky day: two legions only and no more, were offered and exposed as it were to the enemy to be taken in pieces: and then afterwards, they were refused and lived from massacre, and the very edge of the sword: to the end that Fabius I. might be called Father and Patron: even he who to say a truth, first impeached the Romans for vanquishing the enemies, before that he faced them from being vanquished. Moreover, the Consuls that succeeded, following the same course and artificial letters that Fabius practiced before them, drew out the war fill on length, when they had good means of victory, and might have fully finished it, A complot (no doubt) contrived and concluded among all the Nobles. And never will they fee to make an end of war, before there be a Conful chosen, a meer Commoner indeed, to wit, a man never seen afore, and of the first head. For those who are of Commoners now made noble, are all alike and of the same profession: they draw all in one line, and have learned one lefion; and ever since that they have let to be concerned of the Nobility, are alien to depile and disdain the Commonalty. For who seeth, that in seeking K have an Intention their only purpose and reach was that the Election might be full and wholly in the power and ordering of the Nobles? That was the thing which the Consul aimed at, in having behind in Camp with the Army & afterwards when there was a Dictator created against their wills for to hold the great assembly for the Election, their drift was, and they wrought for, and brought it about in the end, that the Angurs should give it out and pronounce, that there was an errour committed in creation of the Dictator. And therefore faith he, the Commons cannot not of all things away with their Intensions: and truly, one of the Consulships (at least) appear of right to the Commons of Rome, and no doubt the people in their free election would more willingly make choice of one to be Conful, and confer the dignity upon him, that loved rather to win the victory at once, than to continue commander in the Army a long time, When L. the Commons were once enkindled and set on fire with their speeches and remonances, whilst three of the Partitii were competitors namely, Publ. Cornelius Merenda, L. Menius Volpa, and M. Emilianus Lepidus, and two new Noblemen, who were already familiar and acquainted with the Commons, to wit C. Atilius Serranus and Q. Fulvius Nabo, of whom the one had been High Priest, and the other Angur: yet at length was C. Terentius only created Conful to the end that the election should be in his power, that he might choose unto him a College at his pleasure. Then the Partitians having a sufficient trystall, that their Candidates and Competitors were of small force and not able to prevail, urged and put forward L. Emilianus Plutus, who sometimes had been Conful with M. Lelius, in the condemnation as well of himself as of his companion, escaped the peril of being burnt and was well fished and forthed, as it were in the fire: a man of all M others most mucilugiously bent against the Commons: him they urged, I say to stand for a Confulship notwithstanding he refulded a long while, and alledged many reasons against it. And to the next Comitall or Parliament-day, by occasion that all the concurrents and competitors foresaid that flood with blood, gave place and left off their suit, he was chosen to match with the Conful elect for to thwart and crost him, rather than to be affilet unto him in the government. This done they proceeded to the election of Preotis, wherein M. Pomponius Mathes, and P. Furius Philus were created. Unto Pompeiun fall by the jurisdiction within the City of Rome, and unto P. Furius Philus, between the Citizens of Rome and forreiners, Two other Praetors besides were chosen, M. Claudius Whatever, to be sent L. Deputy into Sicily, and L. Publius Ambius into Galla. All were created in their abilience, and excepting Terentius the Conful only, there was no Meruiuiact written upon any, who had not aforetime born and exercised the face: for divers valorous and hardy men were pasf over and left out, because in such a time of trouble, it was not thought good to prefer any man to a government, wherein he was raw and unexperienced. The Armies also were augmented: but to what proportion they arose, either in Cavalry, or Infantry, I dare not set down any thing for certaintie: fo greatly do authors vary both in the number and quality of the forces. Some day, there was a new supply of 100000 soldiers enrolled, Others, that to the five legions there were were adjoynd four new besides, to the end they might employ nine legions in the wars. Also, that the legions were increased in number both of foot and horse: to wit, with the addition of one thousand footmen and three hundred horsemen in every Legion: for sometime before, a Legion contained 4000 foot, and 500 horfe, cal•ed Quarta legio: whereas at first Romans ordained it to be 2000 of the one, and 300 of the other jfe as a Legion contained now of five thousand foot, and three hundred horse: and that the afo. should double the number of horsemen, and find even proportion of footmen with the Romans.

Some Historians have written that at what time as the battell of Cannae was fought, the Romans were in Camp 87200 strong. But in this they all agree, that the Romanswarred with greater preparation, and more force and fury than in years past, because the Dictator had put them in in good hope, that the enemy might be vanquished and subdued at once. But before that these new Legions advanced under their ensigns and banners out of the City, the Decemvirs were commanded to go and peruse the books of Sylla; by reason that men were commonly put in fear, and terrifed with news of strange sights and prodigious tokens. For the rumour went, that both at Rome in the Aventine, and also at Aricia, it rained stones, much about one time; and that in the Sabine Country (which no doubt portended a great massacre and slaughter) there issued out of a certain fountain, waters hot, with much blood: and men were more terrifed therewith, because it did in many times together. Besides, in the street called Fornix a toward Campus Martius, divers perons were bluffed and smitten to death with lightning from heaven. The prodigious

B signs were expirte and purged with due remedies out of the foreold books. Embassadors also from the City of Pifam, brought unto Rome a present of massive boles of beaten gold. Thanked they were, like as the Neapolitans before them, but the gold was not received.

At the same time there arrived at Offia from K. Herom a fleet of ships, ready rigged, and furnished with scores of victuals. The Syracusan Embassadors were brought into the Senate house, where they declared, "That K. Herer lo soon as he heard of the death of C. Flaminius the Consul, and the defeat of the Army, took it to heavily, that no proper calamity of his own or of the enemy was more likely to befall him. This, on the contrary, he should think would spare him, and that there was nothing to dread." Whereupon C. Flaminius was immediately sent to the front, and with his forces brought into Sicily; to the end that he might first subdue the enemy, and then proceed to Rome. But for much which it was supposed, they had expected, they were ready moreover to bring in more, according as they should need, and to what place they thought fit.

Sen. 1000 Archers and Slingers, a great and competent power to match with the Balearics and Mores, and other nations that lie there, and to carry their enemies off. Over and besides those gifts and presents they sent, they did assiduously let the Lord Deputy of Sicily know that his City had ples with his fleet into Africa, both to find the enemy work, and give him his hands full of war at home: and to auger him least repose, and worse opportunity, to end aid and succour unto Ambrak. The Senate returned this answer again unto the King: That King Herer had done the part of a right good man, and had behaved himself and allies so that ever since he was entered into amity with the people of Rome, had held on the same constiluite, in keeping his faithful alliance, and never failed, but at all times and in all places factored and advanced the State and Empire of Rome, with all bounty and princely munificence: which the people of Rome took most thankfully, as in right they ought. As for some other Cities likewise had brought and offered unto them, in accepting only in good worth their kindnels received it not, but the Image of Victory, and the happy peace and love observed thereof, they gladly accepted: and for that blessed Saint they appointed and dedicated even the Capitol, and Temple of Jupiter, Min. to be the fest and thirne thereof: that being consecrated in that City and highest temple of the City of Rome, it might be propice and gratious, and remain firm and fast to the people of Rome. As for the slingers and archers together with the corn they were delivered to the Col, Fif, and twenty gallies, with five ranks of oars to a side, were joined to the Navy which was under the conduct of T. Dacius the Pro-prutor in Sicily who had commission, if he thought it good and expedient for the commonwealth, to pass over into Africa. The Consuls having finished the mutineers and levied soldiers, divided a few days until their allies were come with aid from the Latines. Then were the Soldiaries particularly (a thing never done before) by their Colonels, put to their corporal oath, and sworn to make their repair at the Consuls commandment, and without their leave not to depart: for until that day there passed nothing but a sacramental pledge, and in general: For whenever the horsemens referred to their Deputies, and footmen to their Centurions: both they of the Cavalry in their Deputies, and all of the Infantry in their Centurions, were (after a sort) voluntarily among themselves, that they would not abandon their ensigns by way of flight or upon any fear, nor go out of their ranks, unless it were to fetch either some offensive armure onto them, or to save the life of a Citizen, which having been aforetime a voluntary covenant and accord between themselves, was now by the martial Tribunes of the Colonels reduced to a formal and solemn oath, and bound the soldiers to observe them, of necessity. Yet before the ensigns set forward and marched out of Rome, the Consul Varro dealt many hot words and brave orations in the assembly of the people, intimating & purporting thus much in effect: That the Nobles had called for war in Italy where it was like to remain long enough, and to file close to the ribs of the common-weal, if the were served with many in the Generals as Fabius was. As for myself (quohe it shall I know) I vanquish the enemy, the first day that I set eye upon him, yea, and fince the war at once for ever. But his Colleague P. Aulus made but one only speech, even the day before they were to take their leave of the City: which was not so well taken of the people for the present, as it is proved true in the end, Wherin he gave Utrum to H hard words, nor girded at him otherwise than thus: That he marveled much, how any Captains, before he had experience either of his own army, or of his enemies, and knew the situation of the place and ground, and the nature of the country, sitting as yet within the City in his gowm, could perfectly tell what he was to do in the field, and in arms: and be able to foretell and set down the very day, wherein he was to encounter and joy in ranged battle with the enemy. For his own part, he would not cast thus beforehand, nor plot his designs and counsels before due time & feason, which present occurrences are wont much more to minuter unto men, than men to fit them to the occurrences that shall happen. This would be with all his heart, That the enterprizes taken in hand warily and with discretion, might prove as lucky and fortunate. As to I considerat ratlines, besides that it implieth folly, hath ever to that day speed but ill. Thus it was well seen, that this man of himself enlined to prefer late proceeding & success could, before doubtful wares & fool-hardy counsels: & to the end that he might persever in that resolution more constantly. Q. Fabius. Maximus in his departure (by report) bad him farewell, in this or such like manner.

If you, or L. Emelius, had a Colleague like unto yourself, (which I could rather with you) that your self were lutable to your Colleagues, these may words to you were altogether needless and superfluous. For you twain, being two good Consuls, would even without my speech do all things faithfully to the good of the Commonwealth: and conversely ifboth of you were bad, ye neither would vouchsafe to give ear to my sayings nor ponder in mind my counsels. But now, when I consider your companion what he is and your self to be a man of that quality & worth, K you are he to whom alone I am address'd to direct my whole speech: to you, I say, whom me thinks I foresee already, like to be in vain and without effect in honest man and a good Citizen. For if the Commonwealth be halt and lame and one of side as great sway and authority will bad projects & lead course carry, as the good fage and whatsoever Counsell. For you are far out of the way and much deceived. L. Emelius, if you think to be left troubled with Ambush than with C. Terentius. And I not well not, but I greatly fear that you shall have a more cumbrous adversary of the one, than a dangerous enemy of the other. For with Ambush you are to fight in the field and in time of battle only: but with Terentius you shall have to do in every place, and at all hours. Against Ambush his Legions you shall make head, and have the help of your own Cavalry and Infantry; but General Verre will affall you even with your own tools. But L be from you in any illence the late remembrance of C. Flaminius. For I love no such unlucky prelaging. Howbeit, he began his mad fits when he was once Consul and never before: when he was in his Province with command, & in the Camp with his Army, and never else. But this Verre, even before he sough the Conulship, and all the whilees he was a tutor therefore, and now likewise, that he is Consul, before that he feeth camp or enemy in field is horn-mad, and talketh like a man besides himself. What foul work then (think you) will he make, when he shall see himself with armed youths about him in the Camp, who now amongst peaceable Citizens in their gowns and long robes within the City, stirreth to great storms and tempests, cracking and vanning at every word of nothing but fight, skirmish, and battle? What a coif, I say, will he keep there, where no sooner a word spoken, but a blow given: and when upon direstiton, on presently enlutch execution? But in case this man (as he faith flatly he will) fall immediately to strike a battle, either I know not what belongeth to Art military, and have neither skill how to conduct this kind of warfare, nor any experience of the quality and nature of this enemy, or else there will be another place more noble and memorable by our defeat and overthrow, than was the Lake Trasimeno. But it is no time now to stand upon these terms, and to glorifie my self in comparison of this one perfoun who have loved (as it is well known) to exceed and go beyond all measure in delifting glory & honour, rather than in deriding and coveting the fame. But the truth is this & so it will be found in the end that the only way to war against Ambush, is that which I took and alwayes used. Neither is it the issue and event alone (for that is matter and teacher of tool) which theeweth & proveth this unto us but even resound it self which hath, N and will be still the lance and immutabile, as long as things in the world hold on as they do. We war, (you fee) in Italy, at home, in our own ground and place of residence all quarters round about us, full of our own Citizens or friendly Allies: who daily help us, and will be ready till to furnish us with armour, men horse, and victuals. Sufficient proof and testimony of their faithfulness have they given us already in our hard distresses and adversity. Space and procefs of time maketh us better stronger, wiser every day than other, and more constant and resolute. Contraswise, Ambush is in a strange and foreiin land, in his enemies country, in the midit of all things that are croes and adverse unto him, far from his home and home far from his native soil, having peace no where, neither by sea nor land. No Cities receive him and give him entertain-ment no wals he hath with in which he can retire himself in safety. Nothing theft he, wherefoe- ever he goeth, that he can lay is his own. From day to day, from hand to mouth, he liveth of ra- pine and spoil. Scarce a third part hath he of those forces, which he transported over the river I- lbertus. Hunger and famine hath wasted more of them, than the edge of the sword: and for this small remainder that is left, he is hard and kant provided of food and suffenance. Make you any doubts then but we shall vanquish him, whiles we sit still and take our ease, who day by day de- caieth sensibly, and waxeth old and seacle, who neither hath thore of victuals to maintain an army, nor supply of men to make up his broken bands, nor mais of money to entertain them.

"How long was he fain to fight for Carmus, a poor little Castle in ypula, as if it had been for the walls of Carthage? It fell: Neither will I boast and magnify my defeat at all before you O Amphilus.

Do you but only consider how Ca. Servius and Attius the last Comitis, played mock-holiday with him and deceived him, Thence the only way of safety O Lucius, which I fear our own Citizens will make difficult and dangerous unto themselves, more than the enemies can. For you shall have your own for diet and your enemies both of one and the same mind. Pero the Roman Consul, and Amphil the Carthaginian General will aim and reach at one and the self-same thing. And you, being but one man must make account to rend two Captains and reft them you shall well enough. If you will stand firm and hold your own against all birutes and speeches of the people, if neither the vain-glory of your fellow that shall be blazing nor the insinuous suspicions that shall be so blown abroad to your disgrace, shall entice you from your constant resolution and maintenance of the truth, O dial; there be indeed common provis. That right and true-dealing may well be sick but it shall not die: it may be bleeding but shall not mictar. And he that will depile vain-glory shall attain in the end to true glory. Let them call you and spare not careful; cold and low for wise and considerate, an ill fouldier and ignorant for a skilful warrior and expierc. ed. But be not you dismayed: I had rather hear a wife and soberer enemy to feed you than lee foolish and brain fick Citizens to praise you. Advenire all things boldy, Amphil will concern you: enterprise nothing rashly, he shall dread you. And yet my purpose is not, neither speak I this that you should enter into no action at all:

But my meaning and advice is, that in all your doing be guided and directed by fear reason not hald and carried away with blind fortune, Order the matter so, that all things be within your compas, and at your disposition: Stand ever armed and upon your guard. Have your ey about you till, and keep good watch. that neither you lose any opportunity that shall present itself unto you, nor yield unto the enemy any occasion for his advantage. Take time and leisure, your shall find all things, less plain easie, and certain, Contrariwise, hall makethe wofe:

The Comian answered these speeches, with no light from cheer and gladiome countraende, as corning. That all he spake was rather true in substance, than ease in execution, "For said he) if the General of hoisen men were so violent, and not to be endured of you, who were his Dictator and ooreign Commander: what course shall I take, what flift may I make, what power and authority suffic.ient, am I to like to have to lavy against my feditious, quarrelsome, and heedle Colleague? For mine own part, in my former Comilship, I hardly escap'd a courting, and much ado I had to pass through the light fire of the flaming peoples doom and heavy ceniture, wherein I was well orched and half-brunt, I wish all may be well in the end Howbeit, if any thing shall fall out other wise than well I had rather hazard the pikes and darms of the enemys and leave my life behind me among them; than put my self to be tried again by the voices and images of angry and tety Citizens, Paulus had no sooner delivered this speech, but (as the report goeth) he went forth on his journey and the chief L. of the Senate accompanied him. The other Commoner Comil was likewise attended of his favourists the Commons, more looked on & gaz'd at for their multitude and number, than regarded for the worth & quality of their persons.

So soon as they were arrived at the Camp, and that the new army was intermingled with the old, they divided the whole army into two camps & ordered the matter so, that the new which was the leffer should be nearer to Ambial., and in the old the greater number and the whole strength and flower of the main forces should be quatered. Then they went away to Rome M. Attius the Consul of the former year, who excused himself by reason of his old age, and desired to be gone. But they gave unto Ca. Servius the charge and conduct of one Roman Legion, and besides of two thousand horsemen and footmen of their allies in the lesser Camp. Amphil, notwithstanding he well perceived that the power of his enemies was re- enforced by one half more than before, yet wondrous joyful he was at the comming of these new Comils. For not only had he nothing left him of victuals, which from day to day he purveyed for, to serve his present need and no more; but also there was no more to be had, and nothing remained for to fill his hands with; by reason that after the territory was not safe to travel in, the corn from all parts was conveyed unto the strong walled Towns, and there laid up: so that (as afterwards it was known for certain) he had scarce corn enough for to serve ten days: and the Spaniards, by occasion of the dearth and want, were at the point to revolt unto the Romans, they might but easily a good and commodious time therefore. Over and besides, to the inward rathnes and over-haft nature of the Comil. Fortune also minified matter to confirm him therein. For in a certain tumultuary skirmish (to stop and impend the torrages and Plunderes of Ambial,) and which began rather by chance, as the soldiers hurst upon one another than

Upon any considerate counsel aforesaid, or by direction and commandment from the Generals the Carthaginians had the foil, and went by the world: for of them there were 17000 ftoin: but of Romans and Converedates, not passing 100. And when in the train of victory they hortly followed the chase in diapary the Comil Paulus, who that day had the absolute command (for they governed by turn each one his day) restrained them, Utroch their hart chaced and fretted, crying out aloud. That he had let the army escape out of his hands: and if he had not thus given o'er the pursuit, the war might have been ended at once. Ambial took this loss and damage nothing near the heart, but rather made him reckoning, that he had caught

(as it were) with a boat & Reft the auda founds of the fool-hardy Conflid and of the new foilders especially. For he knew as well all that was done among the enemies, as in his own Camp; namely, that the Generals were not fuitable nor forcing one unto the otherand that of three parts of the army, two in a manner were but raw, fresh, and untrained foilders. And therefore supposing he had now got pace and time favourable unto him, to convince and compafs some firft age, the night following he led forth his foildiers, carrying nothing about them but their armours; and abandoned the Camp full of all things, as well private goods and furniture as publicke provision: and beyond the next hills he betowe secretly in ambush his foildemen well appointed and in ordain of battell on the lefthand: and the horsemens on the right: and convened all his carriages into the midle between two flanks: to the end, that whiles the enemy was bated in rifing I and ran taking the tents: (as it were) and for_inicio bly the flight of the owners and matters, he might surprize him laden and encumbered with bag and baggage. He left behind him in the Camp many fires burning, to the end that the enemies should very think and be greatly under a pretendedื่y; on an army in Camp his purpose was to hold and keep the Confuls amazed still where they were, whis is himself in the mean time might in more ground and escape further away: like as he had paid by Falones the year before. When day-light was come, and the Conill, saw, first that the standing guards were gone, and perceived (as they approached nearer) an unwonted silence, they marcellled much. But after they divedcertainly that the Camp was abandoned, and no person remaining behind: there was running of all hands who could run fleeto the pavilions of the Conill, with news that the enemies were fled, in such force, as they left K their tents standing entire, and had quit the Camp wholly: and to the end their flight shoulde be more secret and not defdried they had let light fires burning in every place. Then began they all to cry and call upon the Conill, to command the standards and ensigns to be brought abroad and to lead forth in pursit of the enemies and without any title to make spoil and havock for their Camp. And in truth one of the Conill, was no wiser than the commonfoilders. But Paullus replied, and told them ever and anon, that they were to be cirumfept and wary, and to look about them what they did 'tare of an ambush. Yet seeing in the end no remedy, and that otherwise he could neither try the mutiny, nor rule the Captain thereof: he sent out M. Scipio (the Proconsul) with a troop of Lucanfoildemen in equitall, to discover the coasts and sea all were clear: who having ridden hard to the gates and given order to all the men to fly without the fortifications, himself with two horsemens besides entred within the empire, and having looked and searched every where advisely, he retired and made relation. That pafl all perdid contrary there were knives abroad and a piece of treachery was in hand: for why, there are fires made (quoth he) on that side only of the Camp that looked toward the enemy; the pavilions stand open and all things of profit and value which they set more three by are left at random even to fit our hands: and we have been beside to divers places, tile plate and join attacted along the way here and there, as it were a beggarly and Também to a booby. These circumstances reported, of purpose to withdraw their minds from censures and greedy desire of pillage; set them on and kindled them the more. And the soildiers had no sooner tried aloft, that unless the signals were given, they would set forwards without Commanders: but they had a captain firstly at hand to lead them M the way: for immediately Vostrorum'the man, Paullus who of himself made his bowfull, and perceived besides that the birds in taking the Amphilope approved not this enterprise nor gave good tokens of happy peace: gave order straightways, that his Colleague should be adverfified of the un-lucky Amphilope, who was ready now to set out of the gate with his standard & that in any wife he should stay. Whereat albeit Vostrorum was not well: content yet the acceptance of FLuminius, and the memorable overthrow at sea of Charesi ( & Pulcher) Conill in the Punic war, wrought some fimplicity of converse and fear in his heart. But it was even the fair grace of the gods (if a man may to lay) and nothing else, which put by and deferved rather than impreffed and inhibited the danger and distraction that here over the Romans heads. For as good hap was it changed at the very instant that the Conill command the ensigns to be brought into the Camp & the foildiers would not obey him that two Soilders who fled sometime two hoildemen the one a Formian, and the other a Sicilian and who in the year when Servilius & Attalus were Conills among other foilders were taken prisoners by the Numidians made an escape and fled that day to their old masters again. Who being brought before the Conill, adverfified them confidently, that the whole army of Anna left lay within ambush, so on the further side of the mountains. The coming of these bordelines to right and jumpest as they did, caused the foildiers to obey their Carol. Whereas the one of them by his ambitious courting and seeking unto them at the firft for a Confilship, and afterwards by his unctuous indulgence and pleasing of them, had lost all his majesty and reputation among them.

Amphilope when he saw that the Romans rather began to stir without advice, than still to run rashly on head to the full, and that his army did he was disloped and took no effct, returned again into his Camp. Where he could not for want of corn make abode many dies: and besides, not only soildiers (who were not all one mans child en) but a confufed mixture of all Nations began day to plot and enter into new defenfions, but also their Captain himself was of many minds. For whereas they began with muttering and grumbling and afterward is with open mouth, to demand and call for their due wages complying first of the death of vicitals, and in the end, of meer hunger and famine: and withall a rumour ran, that the mercenary soildiers, and
A and the Spaniards especially, were minded and intended to give him the slip, and to turn to the enemy: Annibal likewise thought himself otherwhics as it was laid, how he might flee into Gaul, but so, as he would leave his Infantry behind him at six and leven, and to be gone with his Cavalry alone. As I say, this was purposely and devising, when he received a length to dislodge them, and to remove into the better counties of Apulia, where the host was more timely considering withal, that the father he went from the enemies his foundiers who were by nature light-headed and inconstantine, would not to easily catch and fle from him. So he took his way by night, and made fires likewise, and set a few tents standing in fight, that the Romans leaving the fear trains and ambuscades as before, might keep in and not tire abroad. But when

B as the late events thereon, having flourished all the coast, both beyond the camp, and on the other side of the hils, and brought word that he had divided the enemies after off discharging them, he began they the morrow after to think and consult of making after him with her pursuice. But altho both Consuls continued, as ever before, the same men still, that is to say, diligently minded, and perceiving in their several resolutions: but so, as all in manner accorded with Varro, and none agreed unto Paulus; but only Servius the Consul of the former year: yet according to the opinion and counse of the maj. par, they went both together (for what might heeld that which late an easy drivel to make Caius much renowned and famous for the notable overthow and defeat of the Romans. Near this village Annibal had encamped under the wind Vulturinus, and had it on his back wind, when the fields are for sick and burnt with drought, is wont to bring with it clouds (as it were) of dust. Which as it was good and commodious for the very camp itself, so it was like to make in special stead, when they should range their battle, and order, and with the wind blowing on their back, against the enemy, whose eyes the dust was ready to put out, flying with the wind full in their face, so abundantly.

The Consuls having diligence [ly] foretold the ways and tried the passages ever before them, followed Annibal hard, and so soon as they were come to Cumea, had him in fight: where they formed two camps, of like distance almost alunder, and divided their forces just as before. The river Apulus ran close by both these camps, and yielded wating places according as either oftentimes had occasion and need, but not without some kindling and skirmish. But from the lefter camp, which lay on the farther side of Apulus the Romans had more liberty to water, because upon the farther bank there was planted no fence nor guard of the enemy. Annibal having polished himself of a good plot of ground to his mind, commodious and meetor the service of horsemen (in kind of forces he was invincible) ordered his battalions in array, by putting out certain Numidian light horse, made a bravado, and bade the Coriell barn. And even then it fell out, that both the Roman camps were disquieted and troubled anew, what with the mutiny of the footiers, and what with the disarrangement and jarring on the Consuls' sides: whiles Paulus laid hard unto Varro, and let before his eyes the raffines of Senmomand Plebians; and Varro again hit him home, and twixt him with the example of Faesius, which made to goodly a fresh in the eyes of fearful, idle, and cowardly Captains: both of them fell out to protesting and calling God and man to witnesse, the one giving out that the fault was not in him that Annibal was

E now Lord well-ner of all Italy already, and why? because himself was kept short and tied fast enough by his Colleague, and the foundiers whose hot blood was up, and who were eager of fight, had their weapons even plucked out of their hands: Annibal on the other side complaining that he ought should have amifs up to the Legions thus betrayed, and offered willily and unconsideredly to the danger of doubtful battle, notwithstanding he were not blame-worthy but innocent altogether; yet should he be the first that started, and be partaker of the mischiefe and misfortune: and yet he would gladly see, whether they who were so ready and lusty of their tongue to speak, would be as nimble & active of their hands to fight, when the time came. Thus whiles they spend time in choppings of Logick & quarrelling one with another rather then in good & other conjunctions, Annibal who had food arranged a good part of the day ready to fight, mindings to retire his other forces into his camp, left for certain Numidians out of the battel to charge upon the Romans on the other side of the river, who from the lefter camp went for water. There being a disordered & conjoined multitude were not fully lanced on the bank, but with the thought only & tumult of the Numidians, they were discomfited and put to flight: whereupon the enemy rode farther, even to the standing Corps as guards, quartered before the rampart, and hard at the very gates of the Roman camp. The Romans who were an indignity offered to the Romans, to see themselves how now braved and beaten even in the very camp by the auxiliary foundiers, and the real forces of the enemies. that there was no other thing played the Romans from passing the river presently, and embattelling themselves, but only this, that it was Paulus his turn that day to have the sovereign command of all. And therefore the morrow after, it came to Varro his counse for to rule, without any advice of his companion, he purposed forth the signal of battel, and with all his forces put in order of battel, went over the river. Paulus also followed after him as one who might well enough mislike and disallow the purpose of his Colleague, but otherwise could neither will nor chuse, but for ord and him, and take part in the execution. Being once over the river, they joined also the forces which they had in the smaller camp, unto the others: and in this manner they organized the battel. In the right point which was neerer to the river, was arranged the Roman Cavalry, and after them the footmen. The left point on the outside, was flanked with the horsemen of the auxiliaries within flood their infantry: but in the middle part were bestowed the Archers and loose shot, close to the main battle of the Roman Legions; and of all the rest of light armed auxiliaries, confounded the van-guard. The Consuls led both the points, Terentius the left, Asinius the right; Cn. Sertorius had the conduct of the main battle. Now Annius by the break of day, having left before the Balleare slingers, and his other light armor, passed over the river, and marshalled them in battle array, ever as they came to land, the horse as well Gauls as Spaniards, he opposed in the left point, near to the bank, even against the horsemen of the Romans: the right confounded of the Numidian light horse; and the main battle was strengthened and fortified with his infantry; but in such manner as the Africans flanked both, in manner of wings and between them were belotted the Gauls and the Spaniards in the midst, A man that had seen the Africans, would have taken most of them for Romans, so armed were they with Roman armor, if gotten much of it at T reclus, but most of all at Thrasymenus. The Frenchmen and Spaniards had targets nearest of one fashion, but their swords were unlike and far differing. Those of the Gauls were very long and not pointed. But the Spaniard, whole manner is rather to fight with the thrust and to fray, then to slash and strike edge-long, had handheld short curtilaries, and sharp at the point. And after this first flood were two nations armed before the rest (terrible to behold, both for the bigness of their personas, and also for their habit and attire.) The Gauls all from the navel upward naked: the Spaniards with linen waistcoats or jackets, glittering wondrous bright, bordered and embroidered with purple and scarlet. The completest number of all, as well here as footmen, that first commenced, amounted (as they report) unto forty thouland foot, and ten thousand men of arms. These Captains had the leading of the two points, to wit, Asinius comman ded the left, Maburral the right, Annius himself in person with his brother Mago, conducted the middle battle. The Sun shine upon the flanks both of the one and also of the other army, very indifferent and commodious to both parts, were it that they were so placed and marshalled of let pupefe, or chance at adventure to to hand: the Romans with their faces full south, the Carthaginians into the north, But the wind which the inhabitants of that country call Quintus arose and blew full upon the faces of the Romans, and raised such flore of dust, and drove it in upon their eyes, that it took away their sight and prospect: The cry and shout began on both sides, and the Auxiliary foinders put themselves forth first to skirmish, and charged one another with their right shot, Then the left point of the Gauls and Spanish men of arms encountered and rancul upon the right hand of the Roman Cavalry, nothing at all after the order of horse-service for they were of necessity to affront one another straightforward, as having no room left about them to fling out and ride at large, being flanked on the one hand with the river, and enclosed on the other with the battalion of footmen. Whereupon they, were forced to charge full butt from both parts, directly before them, so long as their horses stood close and thrust together: but at length when they began to stir and wince, the riders, man to man, fell to take hold and clasp one another, and every man to pluck his enemy besides his horse, so as now they were driven much what to foot. This conflict was rather sharp then long: and to be short, the Roman Cavalry was dill omitted and put to flight, And anon, as the horse made an end of their fight, begat like skirmish of the foot also. At the first the Gauls and Spaniards equal to their enemies both in force and courage maintained the conflict right hard'y, and kept their order and arrays. At length the Romans call about and devised on what side, and with what form of a close battle, to force back that pointed squadron of the enemies, ranged very thin, and by form the weaker, and bearing out withal, from the rest of the battle, Now when they had once driven them to retreat, and give ground the Romans pressed on full at one instant; and with the same violence pierced through them as they fled for fear headlong, until they were entered as far as to the very midst of the vanguard and main battle: and finding none able to stand in their way and make resistance, they gained in the end the very rearward of the Africans: who having drawn in from both sides their skirts and wings, stood together strong and firmly kept their ground. The Gauls and Spaniards continued full in the midst, somewhat advanced without the rest of the battle, Now when this pointed squadron was driven in by the Romans, and made even and equal fight with the front of the battle, and afterwards upon farther encouragement, gave way for them to pass in here through the midst thereof, so that they not the Africans charged upon their flanks and whiles the Romans unwarily were engaged over far within them, they came about them on the skirts, and within a while having stretched out and spread their wings, enclozing the enemies round on their backs also, Thenupon the Romans who had performed one battle and conflict in vain, were forced to give over the Gauls and Spaniards, whom they had disordered and put to flight, and were to begin a fresh fight with the Africans; and that to their own great disadvantage: not only because they being enclozed and pent up in a strait room, were to deal with them that had compassed them all about and were at liberty, but also because they being wearied, were to maintain a new skirmish with those that were fresh in heart, and lusty. And now by this time, in the left point of the Roman battle, where the horsemen of their allies were marshalled to affront the Numidians they were first to close fight: which at the first the Numidians began but coldly and faintly, after the deceitful manner of Carthaginians. into whom they were fast and near neighbours. For so, of them or thereabout, having besides their usual javelins and darts which they commonly carry, short daggers or skeins hidden under their cuirass and harquebus, in the semblance of riding away from their own companies, and riding to the Romans, with their bucklers at their backs, all of a sudden dismounted from their horses, and throwing their bucklers, targets, Not without reason, men of Italy, was Gaetulicus when he heard of the defeat of the Numidian horsemen, who fought but coldly with those that fled before them, to be withdrawn from the midst of the battle, and sent them to pursue the enemies in the chase. And to the Africani overweeny now with execution and killing, rather than with any other fight, he joined the Gauls and Spanish footmen to assist them. On the other side of the battle, Phileus, being at the very first shock and encounter, he was sore wounded with a bullet from out of a flying, yet oftentimes he made head against Numidia, and kept his battalions close and thick together, and in divers places regained the conflict, and evermore the Roman horsemen guarded and protected him. But at the last they left their horses, because the Consul his strength failed him to rule his own, and tost him. Whereupon there was one brought word unto Aemilius, that the Consul had commanded his men of arms to light at once. Then (quoth Aemilius) the report goeth, Yea, marry: But how much gladder would it be, if he delivered them into my hands bound hand and foot? And surely the horsemen fought so after they were slighted, as if there had been no doubt, but that the enemy had the victory, Howbeit, although they had the worse, yet they chose rather to die in the place, then to flee: and the victors angered at the heart with them for thus laying the accomplishment of the victory, went down with them, and killed outright all those whom they could not make to give ground and yield, and yet a few such as were wearied, with much toil and overcharged with many wounds they enticed to retreat. Anon they were all disbanded and scattered sundry, and as many as could, recovered their horses, and fled away.

On Lentinus's coat, I will liken (as he rode by the Consul) fitting all a gore blood upon a stone. Ah L. Aemilius! (quoth he) whom the gods ought of right to regard and save, as being the only guilless man, and innocent of this day's work and unhappy overthrow, take here this horse of mine, while some vigor and strength remaineth in you. Able I am to mount you upon him, to accompany and protect you also. Come I lay, and make not this battle more cursed and sorrowful by the death of a Consul. Without it, I wot, we have cause enough already, and too much of dolorous tears and woful lamentation. Whereunto the Consul made this answer: I give thee thanks, O L. Cornelius gra-mercy for thy kindnese, and God blees thee in this thy vertue and prowess. But take thou heed to thy self, left by thy foolish pity of me, thou lose that little time which thou hast to escape out of the hands of the enemies. Save thy self, and go thy ways to the L.L. of the Senate, and wilt them all from me in general, to fortifie the City of Rome, and man it well with strong guards, before the enemy follow the train of victory, and come against it. But more particularly

Ely, let Q. Fabius understand, that L. Aemilius yet, was mindful of his whollom precept, all the whites he lived, and now also forgat them not at the hour of his death. And suffer thou me to yeeld unto nature, and let go my last breath, even here among the heaps of mine own slain fellows, that I may end my days and die neither an accursed and guilty person, nor in my Consulship hand up to accuse my Colleague, and to defend mine own innocency, and justify my felie, by the blaming of another. As the Consul uttered these words, first the multitude of his own citizens in the rout, and then the enemies in pursit, ran over him: and not knowing who he was, overwhelmed him with javelins and darts good store. As for Lentinus, his horse carried him a-way to a little hill, then they fled all amain as fast as they could, 7000. recovered the lefser camp, and ten thousand the greater: and upon two thousand put themselves into the village it self of Canuae. But because it was an unwalled and teneblels town, they were immediately environed by Cartulo and the horsemen, and so perished every one. The other Consul made no semblance, that he was offended or displeased with the companies that thus fled, were it of purpose, or as it chance; and accompanied with fifty men of arms or thereabout escaped to Venuca. In this battle were slain of Roman (by report) 40000. footmen, and 7000. horsemen: and in a manner, as many besides of Allies, as of natural Citizens. Amongst whom there was one Consul, two Treasurers, L. Adrilius and Furius Bibaculus, 21. Colonels: Some also who had been Consules, Pretors, and Ediles. Of which number was Cn. Servilius, and Cn. Mucius Nemoriaus, who the year before had been Commander of the Cavalry for some certain days. Besides 80. Senators, or such as were Senators fellows, and had borne those dignities, in regard where, they were to be chosen Senators. G These served as voluntaries and were enrolled among the Legions. There were taken prisoners at this field, as the general speech went, 9000. footmen, and 500. men of Arm.

This is that noble battell, so famous for the overthrow at Cannae, and comparable to that defeat at the river Alia. For like as this was oflfs importance then the other, in respect of that which ensued after the conflict, because the enemy played his hand, and pursed not his victory; so if we consider the los of men and defeat of the army it was the greater, and for the shameful flight more dishonorable. For the running away that was at Alia, as it betrayed the City, fort it saved the Army: but at Cannae, when the one Consul fled, there were scarce 50. of his army that accompanied him.
him, and as for the other Coniul, whiles he lay a bleeding and dying, all his forces to speak of, took their heels.

Now there being a number in both camps, half disarmed, and wholly without their chief Commanders: the Captains of the greater Camp sent a messenger unto the other, willing them to come over thither, that they might march in one entire company together, and depart to Carthage in the night season, whiles their enemies were fast asleep; partly Weavered with long fight and partly charged with wine & good cheer after their joyful victory. This advice some there were that mulified altogether and rejected. For why (say they) might not they come hither themselves, as well as lend us for us we may as soon to join together? Because, I wot, all the ways between are full of enemies, and they chose rather to hazarded the bodies of others, than adventure their own percons in great danger. Others were not so much displeased for any dislike of the motion, as their hearts failed them to take in hand the enterprise thereof. Then spake P. Sempronius Tuditannus a Colonel, 'And will ye, rather chose (quoth he) to be taken captive by a multitude of cruels and cruel enemy? And to have your heads valued at a price? And that Chapmen coming to buy you in open market, should ask every one of you this question, Whether art thou a Roman Citizen, or a Latin Confederate? And so by thy disgrace, reproach, and misery, another man shall get honor, and thy self killed. Ye are (Tee well) like to Lucius Aemilius, who made choice to die valiantly; than to live in shame and obloquy; nor to many other to brave and hardy men, who lie about him dead on the ground by heaps. But before day light surpris us. And greater troops of enemyes befet the passages, let us break through theles, that in disorder and K out of array, make to Ioni no stone at our gates. The point of sword and edge of courage, is able to pats through enemies, and they never so thick and close together. We will make a pointed batailloon in weedy-top, and pierce through their loafe and thin squadrons, as easily as if nothing. 'Well in our way. Go with me therefore as many of you, as are willing to save yourselves and the Common-weal. The word was no sooner out of his mouth, but his sword was out of scabbard, and with a pointed batailloon took his way through the midst of the enemies: and when the Numidian -flanked them, and shot hard at their right side that lay open to them, they shifted their targets to their right arm, and so escaped, to the number of 600, unto the bigger camp, and forth with them, being together to the other greater company, they retired themselves safe to Carthage. These exploits were performed by men unquenched, more upon a present fit of courage, as each mans natural instinct guided, or chance led him, then either any fage advise of their own, or command of other.

Now when all the rest came about Annibal immediately upon this noble victory to concent'ate and rejoice with him, yea, and to advise him, that after to great a battle performed, he should the rest of that day, and the whole night following, both relied himself, and also give rest and repose to his wearied fouldiers: Maharbal, General of the Cavelry, was of mind that it was no giving over thus: Nay (quoth he) that you may know of what conquence this battle is, you shall break your faif and eat your dinner five days hence in the Capitol. Follow hardly with your horseman, that they may see you are come, before they hear that you are coming. No, saith Annibal again, let carriiers on Gods name go afore, and spare not to carry news thereof: Your words are good, M and it is a gay matter and plausible you speak of: but the way there to is longer, and more then I can presently conceive and comprehend: I give you thanks Maharbal, and I commend your good mind and forwardness; but we had need to deliberat and pause further upon this point, Ah (quoth Maharbal) true it is, I see half the way O Annibal, to win a victory, but not the grace to use a victory. And surely, in this one dayes delay, as it was certainly believed, flood the safety and preservation of the City & Estate of Rome, The morrow after, so soon as ever the day began to appear, they minded only and intended the gathering of poiles, and to view that great butchery and slaughter: a pitiful and lamentable fight even to the very enemies to behold. So many thousand Romans lay there along in every place, horsemen and footmen fell mellow, one with another, according as their hap was to meet together, and either to join in fight, or die in flight. Some were seen to arise all bloody from out of the midst of the slaughtered bodies, such as, the bitter morning cold had dipped their wounds, and made them to start up by reason of their smarre, and were by the enemy knocked down again and killed. Other some they found lying along hill alive, cut short by the thighs & hands, who offered their bare necks & throats to be cut & call'd into them to let forth the leafl of their blood. Divers were found with their heads covered within the earth, who as it appeared had made themselfs holes & and gutters in the ground for this purpose; to inter themselves whereinto they thrust their mouths & faces, & being buried with mould cast over them, were stuffed & choked. But above all the rest there was one that drew every mans eye upon him & made them all to wonder, a Numidian with his nose and ears piteously mangled & cropt but yet alive, lying under a Roman dead. For when his bands to wounded as they were, would not serve him to handle a weapon, for very anger he laid mad & lay (to long as he had any breath within him) biting his enemy with his teeth.

After they had spent a good part of the day in gathering poiles, Annibal marched forward to ascult the lefser camp and left and formed he turned aside the arm of the river that flanked them, and so excluded them from the water. But they all within being over-weared with toil, with wading and bleeding of their wounds, yielded sooner then he looked for: and, convened, Imprimis, to deliver up their armor and horses: Items, to pay 500, Quadrigates pieces.
A piece of silver, for every Roman: 200, for every one of the Allies: and every bondman 100 a piece. Hence, that after this random paid, they should depart in their single apparel. Thus they received their enemies into the camp, and were themselves put all in ward: but, Allies and Citizens by themselves, apart one from the other. While they trilled time there, there were about 4000, footmen, and 200 horsemen, even as many as either their strength or hearts would serve, who out of the greater camp fled to Ca.

They used much in trappings and caparisons of their horses, (for loudiers, be yeere, occupied very little silver, either in their own apparel, or at their board,) all the pillage was given to be riddled and ramantacked among them. Then he gave command that the dead bodies of his own men should be gathered together for to be buried. And as men lay, they were to the number of eight thousand, all right valiant and hearty men. Some Authors report, that the Roman Consul also was fought up and in terred. As for those, which escaped to Ca., were by the Cannins entwined only within the walls, and lodged in their houses: but a noble Lady and a wolsely, named Basta, relieved them with some victual, apparel, yea, and money also in their journeies. In regard of that, which bouniful liberality of hers, after the war was finished, the was highly honored by the Senat of Rome,

Now, there were amongst them four Colonels, namely, Publius Max. of the first Legion, whose father had been Dictator the year before; and L. Publicius Biludas, of the second Legion, together with P. Cornelius, Secipio, and Appius Claudius Pulchris of the third Legion who had been Edile but lately since: and by general consent of them all, P. Secipio, a very young man, and Ap. Claudius were chosen to bear the sovereign rule, and to have the absolute command and conduct of the army. But as they sat with some few others, in counsel together about the managing of their main affairs, behold P. Secipio Pulchris, whose father had been a Consul, gave them to understand, that all their confutations were in vain, and that they did but f foolish and cherish a too high hope of an overthrow flats; for the Common-weal was in a desperate case, pait all cure, and remedies, also that certain noble young Gentlemen, of whom L. Cecilius Metellus was the principal, mind nothine else but to take care, and were ready to embark, to abandon Italy, and fly for safer to some Kind or other. This evil tidings as it was most grievious and heavy in itself: to falling out as it did, presently upon other misfortunes to suddenly and unlooked for, put them into their dumps, and wonderfully amazed and affrighted them all. And when they that were present in place laid their heads together, and thought good to call others to counsel upon this point, Secipio a young man, even then predestined to be the fatal Captain of this war, answered: What do we here? (quoth he) Is it no time now to sit confutting in so great extremity, but leaving all discourses, presently to proceed to action, and to do some exploit. As many therefore as are willing to save the Common-weal, take arms and go with me forthwith: for so where are our enemies (to lay a truth) encaps against us more, then where such dispositions are plotting and contriving.

Forth he went with a few following after him unto the lodging of Metellus: and finding there the young Gentleman storelad, close together in counsel thereabout: he drew his sword, and brandished it naked over their heads, as if they in confusion. I swear before you all, (quoth he) I swear from my very heart, and no man urge me thereto, that I for my part will neither forgive the Common-weal, nor suffer any Citizen of Rome to abandon her. And if I fall with ing and willing, then confound me O Jupiter, O Max. and bring a most shameful end upon my house, my family, and all that I have, Swear thou O L. Cecilius after me, as I have done, I adjure thee: and ye all that are here present take the same oath: for whatsoever shall refuse to be thus told, that upon him I have drawn this sword. Hereat they being no less terrified, then if they had the Conqueror himself Ambitius in person, took the oath every one, and yeeded themselves unto Secipio for to be kept in ward to face against Ambitius.

At the same time; whiles these things were working at Carthage, there arrived at Venusia, upon four thousand foot and horsemen together, such as in their flight had been separated among all the fields, and received into the Conil there. The Venusia took order for them all, that they should be gently entertained, and carefully tended, and divided into several horse-squadrons; and they followed upon the horsemen, a side castile, a coart, and *25. Quadrigatus a piece: and gave ten Quadrigatus to every footman: and armor besides, to as many as wanted. And in all other courtesies of hospitality, both publick and private, they gave and endeavored that the people of Venusia should not in any kind of friendly offices, come behind one woman of Carthage. Howebeit in regard of the great multitude, the burden and charge lay more heavy upon dame Butor, the Conil: for now their number was risen to be ten thousand. Then Appius and Secipio desiring intelligence that the other Conil was alive and well, dispatched a messenger presently to advetist him how many footmen and horsemen there were in them all: and to know his pleasure withal whether he would command and the army to be brought into Venusia, or abide still at Carthage. But Varro (the Conil) of his own accord brought his forces together there, and to us all: called the Consuls, il. a chariot drawn with four horses, representing on the one side of the piece.

Confederates together: but that the two Consuls and both the armies were put all to the sword, and hewn in pieces to the last man. Never was there known a greater terror and turmoil within the walls of Rome (and the City still remaining in safety,) I will therefore even at first, sink under my load and crying nothing at all; and never will I go about to recount those things by discourse of words, in which I should make less they were indeed. For were there not now, a flying, rumors first of one, and then of another; to day of this, and to morrow of that; as the year before when the Consul and his army were defeated at Thapsymenides, but manifold overthrows together were multiplied and altogether at once to wit, how both the Consuls were slain, and two Consular armies lost: no camp, no pavilion of the Romans left standing: neither Leader nor Soldier remaining alive: and how Annib., I was now become Lord of Apulia, of Samnium, and well near of all Italy full and whole. And verily, there is not (I suppose) a nation under the cope of heaven besides, but would have been overwhelmed and crushed utterly under the huge heap and heavy weight of so great a ruin & overthrow. Should I compare therewith the defeat and fall that the Carthaginians received at the island Ægates, in a conflict at sea: wherewith they were so quelled, and their backs so broken, that at one clap they lost Sicilia and Sardinia both; and that which more is, yielded themselves tributaries and subjects to the people of Rome. Or should I make comparison of their unfortunate and unhappy battle in Africk afterwards, wherein this very same Annib. gave over play, yielded the buickers, and confedest himself vanquished. Nay they are not any way comparable with this, but only that they were born and supported with few courage, and valour of mind.

Well, to proceed, P. Furius Philus, and M. Pomponius the Pretors, assembled the Senate in the Court Regia, for to consult about the defense and guard of the City: for they made no doubt, but now that the armies were both defeated, the enemy would speedily come to afflict Rome, the only piece of work, and the state service that remained behind undone. But being to seek what counsel to take, and what remedy to devise for redress of these calamities, so exceeding great and grievous, and yet not known to the full, and interrupted and shrewdly troubled besides with the clamorous noises and plaints of women: whereas that in every house almost, they sealed not to mourn, weep, and wail confusely as (because as yet it was not openly and for certain known who were alive, and who were slain.) Then Furius Max. gave his opinion, that certain light horsemen should be made out and sent forth by the highways Ap. L. hastened Latias and to ride along and enquire of them wherein they happen to meet with (which I mean as fled, and were scattered here and there adverse) if happily some of them could report upon his knowledge, what was some of the Consuls, and the armies: and in case the immortal gods have of their mercy and compassion permitted some poor remnant; fell of this miserable and woful Empire, for the Roman name; which if their defect of small forces was what way Annibal took: and whether he was gone after the battle was fought; what preparation he maketh, what presently he is doing, or intendeth to do. His advice was, I say, that they hearken and learn certainly, these promises, certain lusty young men, active and industrious, should be employed. But for the I. of the Senate thus much, that considering there were few Magistrates at home, and those not able to rid the City of this tumultuous and fearful hurlyburly, therefore they should take upon themselves, to debarr the dames and women for coming abroad, and force them every one to keep home, and tarry within doors; to restrain the plaints and outcries of households and families; to confine themselves throughout the City; to take order that all Posts, and messengers of news, should be brought before the Pretors; and that every man should attend at home the tidings, good or bad, that concerned himself, or his own state. Over and besides, that they should set warders at the gates, to see that no person went out of the City; and compel every man to hope for no other earthly safety for himself, but in the preservation of the City, and walls thereof. And when the tumult and hurly is once husht, then (quoth he) may the Senators well be called again into the Council-House, and consult for the defence and safeguard of the City. When all the assembly liked well, and approved of this opinion, and went every man on Furius his side without contradiction, so as the market place, by authority of the Magistrates, was cleared and voided of the multitude, and the Senators were divided and gone sundry ways to appease the up oars: then at last, came letters from Terentius the Consul, importing, that E. Etruria the Consul was slain together with the army: that himself was at Camillus, but in rallying the reliques of so great an overthrow, as it were after a shipwreck upon the sea: and there were ten thousand soldiers of them, or very near, and tho' much out of frame and good order. As for Annib. he sat still now at Canus. bullly occupied about the remainder of prisoners, and intensive to the rest of the spoil and plunder: not making the victory with the mind and courage of a conqueror, nor yet after the guile and manner of a noble warrior and great commander. Then were the pit at and particular losses also divulged and spread abroad through every man his house and family, and the whole City was so filled with sorrow and lamentation, that the Anniversary solemnity of sacrifices to Ceres was feted, because it was not lawful for those that mourned to celebrate the same: and there was not a manor throughout the City, but was in heavines and sorrow for the time. Left therefore other sacrifices likewise, as well publick as private, upon the same occasion, should be neglected and discontinued. there passed an Act of the Senate, by virtue whereof a term was prefixed, to make an end of mourning within thirty days. Now was the trouble of the City no sooner allayed, and the Senators called again into A into the Council-House; but to mend the matter, there were other letters brought out of Sicily from T. Ohiostilici the Vice-pretor, notifying thus much. That the realm of Hiero was much wasted by the Carthaginians; and when he would have escaped him at his earnest suit and petition, there was another Armado ready rigged, decked and furnished, riding by the Islands past, waiting the opportunity of the time, that when the Carthaginians perceived once that he had turned and bent to the defence of the coast and river Syracus, they might immediately set upon Lilybaum, and the rest of the Roman province. And therefore in case they were minded to aid and maintain a confederate King, and defend the Realm of Sicily, they must of necessity rig and man another fleet out of hand. When the letters both of the Consul and also of the Vice-Pretor were read, agreed it was, and thought meet, that M. Claudius, Admiral of the fleet which rid in the harbour of Ofius, should be sent into the army at Carthage, and letters be dispatched withal unto the Consul, willing him upon the delivery of the army unto the Pretor, to repair unto Rome with all speed possible and not fail, so far forth as he might, without any detriment and hindrance of the Common-wealth. Besides these to great looses and adversities, men were put in fear with sundry prodigious tokens: and among others, in that one year, two Vetal Virgins, Optimus, and Florina, were detected and attainted of manifest whoresom: the one of them was buried quick, as the manner was, under the ground at the gate Callac, the other killed herself. L. Cornelius (a Secretary or Scribe unto the Bishop, whom now they call "Maries Pontifices") the party who had committed formation with Florina, was by the chief or high Priest to be eaten with fods in the Comitum, that he died under his hand. This heinous left, and enormous offence falling among so many misfortunes and calamities, was reckoned, I say, (as usually it is) for a portentous sign; and therefore the Decemvirs were commanded to fear and penit the Books of Sibylla. And Q. Fabius Pretor was sent to Delphi, to consult with the Oracle there of Apollo, and to learn by what prayers the supplications they might pacify the gods; and what would be the end of so great and fearful miseries. In the meanwhile, out of the learning contained in those books of delinies, there were performed certain extraordinary Sacrifices among which, a Frenchman with a French woman, likewise a Greek man and woman, were set down alive in the best market into a vault under the ground shod all about: a place sometime embosomed and polluted with the blood of mankind; but here, but according to the ceremonies and religious enterainment of the Romans. When they had sufficiently pacified the gods, M. Claudius Marcellus was sent from the haven of Ofius for the defence and guard of the City, 1500, fouldiers: whom he had levied and enrolled for the richest and grandest of the City, 1500, fouldiers: whom he had levied and enrolled for the richest and grandest."
of them (a man of no Roman nature and disposition) made semblance, as if he had forgotten somewhat behind him, and so to discharge himself (tooth'k) of his oath, returned into the camp, and before night overtook his company again. When word was brought, that they were coming to Rome, there was a Lictor sent out to meet Carthalo upon the way, and to warn him in the name of the Dictator, before night, to deposit out of the confines of the territory of Rome. But the Committees of the Captives had audience granted them in the Senat-house by the Dictator, and the principal man among them, Marcus Junius, spake in this manner.

Right honourable, and my very good LL, of the Senat, There is not one of you all ignorant, that neither any City whatsoever, hath been at lest charge for redeeming of prisoners taken in wars, and made to small regard of them, then ours. But if we be not blind in our own conceit, and think better of our cause, then there is reason we were there any fools that fell into the hands of our enemies more to be accounted of by you then we are. And why? We yielded not our weapons in battell for cowardice and fear, but after that we had ftood well and unillight fighting over the dead bodies of our fellows slain, and so maintained the fight to the very last, then we retired our selves into the camp. The rest of the day and night following, notwithstanding we were weary with travel, and faint of our hurts, yet we manfully defended our rampart. The morrow after, when we were better and invelled round about by the conquerors army, yes, and exiled from water and faw no other hope at all to break through our enemies, ranged to strong and close together, and thinking it not a matter of reproof, and against the law of arms, that where 7000 of our Citizens were slain in field, some Roman fouldiers should remain alive after the battell of Carcase; then and not at we agreed upon a sum of money, that being ransomed, we might be set at large: so we yeelded unto the enemies our weapons, wherein we saw no help at all. We have heard likewise, that our ancestors redeemeth themselves from the Gauls with a sum of gold; and our fathers also, notwithstanding they were most frighted laced, and hardly brought to capitulate and compound for peace, yet sent Embassadors to Terracamp, for to redeem their captives, and both these battels, first in Italy, with the Gauls, and then before Hecatoz with Pyrrhus, were not flognominous and shameful for the losses it fell, as for the fright and beastly running away. But the plains of Carcase are covered all over with heaps of Roman bodies; and we that here have not remained alive after them, but that the enemies strength held out no longer, nor their word would serve to kill any more. And yet there be some of our men also who fled not back in battell: but being left behind to guard the camp, were taken prisoners by the enemy as well as we, at what time as it was surrendered into their hands. Certainly I envy not the fortune, nor regret at the welfare and good estate of any Citizen or fellow fouldier, neither would I be the thoughtfull man, who by debasing another, would seem to advance my self. But even they verily (unless peradventure good footmanship and swift running desire reward) who for the most part fled out of the field unarmed, and never intend before they gain Venitas or Carnuntum over their heads, cannot justly prefer themselves before us nor boast and glory, that they stand the Common-wealth in better stead then we, Find them you shall (I doubt not) good men and valorous fouldiers: to shall you too, yes, and more ready to do true service to our country, in that by your bounty and good means we have been ransomed and restored again into our country. Ye have levied fouldiers of all ages and degrees and I hear say, there be 8000 bondmen in arms. We are no fewer in number our selves, and redeemed we may be as small monies as they are bought, I say no more. but lo, for if should make farther comparisons between us and them, I must do wrong to the Roman name and nation. This is a special thing moreover (my LL.) which in mine advice ye are duey to consider in this deliberation, in case ye be so hard-hearted, as to have no regard of us, or of our defect, namely, in what enemies hand ye leave us, Itis with Pyrrhus peradventure, who used us being his prisoners, like friends and guests. Nay, is he not a Barbarian and Carthaginian? who whether he be more covetous or cruel, can hardly be imagined. O that ye faw the irons and chains, the nalty filthynefs and foul usage of your Citizens. I am affured, you would be no less moved and affected to compaifion at the fight thereof, then if ye behold on the other side your Legions lying slain all over the plains and fields of Carcase. Ye may oblige and behold the sorrowful cheer, and full tears of our kinsfolk standing here in the porch and entry of this Court, and waiting for your answer. And if they fare, and are to penifie for us, and for them that are absent, what heavy hearts have they themselves (think ye) whole liberty and whole life lieth now a bleeding? And in good faith, if so be Amphilib himself would, contrary to his nature, be respective and mercifull to us, yet should we think our lives did us small good, so long as we are reputed of you unworthy to be ransomed and redeemed, There returned in times past to Rome certain captives, lent home by Pyrrhus without any ransom paid, but the returned again accompanied with Embassadors, right honorable perfonages of this City, who had been sent for their redemption. And shall I return unto my country again not esteemed a Citizen worth 300. Deniers. Every man hath a mind by himself, and a fanck of his own my LL. And I wot well, that my body and life is in jeopardy. But I hear more the hazard of honor and good name, left we should be thought condemned and reject you. For the world will never beleive, that you did it to spare your peace, and to have money.

When he had made an end of his paragraph immediately the multitude who were gathered together in the common place set up a lamentable and piteous cry, and held out their hands unto the Council-
A Council-house, beleeching the LL. of the Senat to let them have and enjoy their children, their brethren, and kinsfolk again. The very women also, for fear and necessity, thrust themselves among this pres of men in the market place, But when all others besides the Senators were voided, they began to debate and consult about the matter in hand. Great variance there was in opinion. Some thought it reason, that their ransom were disbursed out of the common chest; others were of mind, that the City should be at no charge at all for their redemption: marry they would not be against it, but that they might be enlarged and delivered at their own cost and expenses. And in case there were any that had not ready coin enough for present payment, the Chamber of the City should lend them money, so as the people might have good security, as well by lierties B bound, as by their good and lands, managed for the satisfaction of that debt. And when T. Manlius Torquatus, a man of the old world for prudence, and as most folk thought too too hard and aulter in this point, was demanded his opinion, he spake, by report, to the cause in this wise.

If the Committee (quoth he) had treated and made suit, for the redemption of them only that are captive in the hands of the enemies, and there flawed; if they had not touched the person of any other besides, I would in few words have knit up my verdict and judgement of them.

For what need I to have done else, but put you in mind, and exhort you, to observe the custom delivered unto you from your ancestors, and to maintain the example good and necessary for the service of war. But now, seeing they have not only justifit, but also (as it were) glorified themselves, in that they yielded unto the enemies, and thought it good reason to be preferred.

not only before them that were taken prisoners by the enemies in the field, but also those that saved themselves, and escaped to Cannus and Campania; yea, and before C. Terentius himself the Consul; I will not hide any thing from you my LL, but a quittance with every thing that was done there. And would to God, that the words which I will utter here in your presence, I might deliver at Cannus, even before the body of the army, the best witness of every man's cowardice or valour: or at least, that P. Sempronius were present alone whom, if these fellows would have followed as he led, they would have foudiers at this day in the Roman camp, and not captives at the devotions of the enemies. For whiles the enemies were wearied with fight, joyous and jocund of their treath victory, and most of them retired into their own camp; they might have had the whole night to fave themselves at their pleasure: and if they were not, yet being ten thousand strong, they had been able to have made a lane through them, were they not so thick, and to have broken away in daylight of their hearts. But neither attempted they so much of themselves, nor yet would follow the leading of another. P. Sempronius Indus ceased not all night long almost, to exhort, to admonish, and encourage them, for to follow his conduct, to take the time when but a few of their enemies were about their camp, whiles they were at repose and rest, and whiles the night lathed favourable unto them, for to hide and cover their enterprise: persuading with them, that before day light they might calmly reach unto places of security, and arrive safely at the Cities of their Allies. Like as in the days of our Grandfathers, P. Decius a Tribun Colonell in Samnium; like as of late time when I was a young man my self, in the first Punic war, Catheimius Flaminius sailed unto three hundred his voluntary foudiers, at what time as he minded to lead them to the gaining of a little Hill, standing in the midst of his enemies. Let us die hardly my foudiers, and by our death save and deliver our Legions, beleat and besieged round about. If P. Sempronius had said so much to you, he would never have esteemed you men of valour nor yet Romans, if no man among you would have born him company, or seconded him in that singular venture, But he showed you a plain and easy way, leading as well to life and safety, as to honour and glory. He offered himself to be your guide, to bring you to your native country; to your parents, your wives and children; yet would not your hearts ferve you to escape and save yourselves. Where had your hearts been then, if he would have had you to die for your country? 50000, of our Citizens and Confederates, lay that very day slain at your feet. If so many examples of manhood and virtue could not move you, nothing in the world will ever move you: it is too great a load and overthrow was not able to make you deplore and set little by this life: none will ever do it. Defere home a Gods name, and long after your native country, whiles ye are free and in safety: say, desire to be in your country, whiles you are your country, and whiles ye are Citizens theretofore. Now your desire and longing cometh too late, being dishonoured, having lost your former estate and right of Citizens, and made your selves bondslaves to the Carthaginians. Think ye for a piece of money to recover your liberty again, and to return to your former degree, from which through faint-heartedness and cowardise ye are fallen? You would not hearken nor give ear to P. Sempronius your Citizen, willing you to take weapon in hand and to follow after him; but anon after ye could listen after Annibal, commanding you to betray and render the camp, and deliver up your armor. But why blame I their lidenefs and dashedly fears? when I may reproye and accuse them for willful and lewd wickedness: For they not only refiied to be ruled by his good counsell and exhortations, but also attempted to hinder and stay him in his intended enterprise, had not right hardy and valiant men with their swords drawn, see these dashedly beasts farther off. P. Sempronius, I tell you, had somewhat ado, to pass the ranks and squadrons of his own countriesmen before he could break through the battalion of his enemies. Longeth our country to have these for her Citizens? who if the rest had been like them, should by this day, have never some a one of them that sought at Cannae, for her Citizens. Of seven thousand armed foildiers, there were found 600 that had the heart to break away, mangetting the enemies, to escape and return with liberty, and with their armor, home into their country, notwithstanding there were forty thousand enemies to resist them: how easily then and safely, deem you, might a power almost of two legions, have palled through them and gone their ways? Ye had this day my Lords twenty thousand at Cannae, of right brave hardy, and loyal foildiers. But now which way can these cowards possibly be reputed true and faithful Citizens (for valiant foildiers, I am sure, they will not think themselves, nor take up on them to be, unless a man could be persuaded and beleeve they were such, who would have impeached and with their old the rest for getting away even when they were at the point to open a passage: or that they rather do not envy now, both the safety and also the honor of others which they have won by provest: knowing in their own I conscience, that their timorousness and cowardliness was the cause of most ignominious and shameful servitude. They loved better to close within their pavilions, and to look for the day light and the enemy together: when in the thick dead time of the night, they had the opportunity to escape. But now then? Although their hearts fail them to break away out of the camp, yet to defend the same manfully, they had courage and valor enough. Beseged they were, straitly beleaguer'd: invested they were day and night for a good time and in their armor forced to stand upon their guard, and manfully they quit them themselves within their rampart, and at length (God wot) when they had slayed and endured all extremities, when all succors failed them for inutilization of this life: so pinched with hunger and so enfeebled, that they were not able to bear their own armor and lift up their weapons: overcome at the last, rather with the necessity of making the best of such a chance as providence could offer them: thereupon they surrendered, and the enemy advanced and approached toward the rampart: and within two hours after, without any trial and hazard of skirmish, they delivered up their weapons and themselves. Thus ye see what their good issue was, for two days together. When they should have stood to it in field, and fought, then they fled back to their tempts: when they were to guard and defend their trench and rampart, they surrendered them to the enemy; good no where, neither in battal nor in battle, I agree to ransom you, you (I say) when you ought to have fall'd forth of the camp, linger behind and stay still: and when need was, to abide by it and to defend it as valiant men, surrender camp, give up your weapons, and yeeld your own bodies to the enemy? Nay, but to speak what I think, my sentence is (my LL.) that there fellows deserve no more to be ransomed, then thence to be delivered unto Annibal, who Issued out of the camp, pick'd through the midst of the enemies, and most valiantly saved themselves, for to do lest another day in their country. When Maelius had fail'd, albeit the prisoners were allied near in kindred to most of the Senators: yet over and besides the precedent of the City it self, which never from the first beginning favoured the redemption of such foildiers, as suffered themselves to be taken prisoners: the ransom it fell, which amounted to a good round sum made them to paufe: because they were unwilling both to empty the publik treasury; (having already burdens great fines, in buying up bond-flaves, and arming them for the wars) and also that Annibal (who as the voice went, was at a very great stand for money) should be enrich'd thereby. When this their enfrver was returned, M to wit, No redemption of captives: there was a new fit of weeping and wailing as added to the former sorrow of the people, namely for the los_of so many Citizens: and so with many a tear that they shed, with fundryplaints and moans which they made, they accompanied the Committees aforesaid, as far as the gate. One of the ten went home to his houle the fametime, who upon a fraudulent and cautious return made into the enemies camp, as aforesaid, suppos'd he had acquit himself and disburdered his conscience of his oath, Which being known and recoumed to the Senat, they were all of mind that he should be apprehended, and attended with a good and sufficient guard at the charge of the City, and so carried back to Annibal. There goeth another report of the Captives, that first there came ten of them as Committees: and when it was debated in the Senat, and doubt made, whether they should be admitted into the City or no; N they were at length received, but so, as that they had no audience in the Senat; and upon longer stay made them then looked for, three others followed after them to wit, L. Scribonius, C. Calpurnius, and L. Munatius. Then by mediation of one Tribun of the Com, a kinsman of Scribonius, the matter was propounded in the Senat concerning the ransom of the captives: but granted it would not be: whereupon the three latter Committees returned to Annibal, and the other ten that first came, remained still behind: who upon a colourable occasion, had made an errand back to Annibal, when they were well onward on their way, to take a note, fortooth, of the names of the prisoners, and thereby seemed to have discharged their conscience of the oath. Allo, that in the Senat there was hard hold, much question and variance, about the delivering of them again into the hands of Annibal and how at last: they who were of opinion have them rendered and send back, failed of their purpose: by reason they came short by some voices and opinions, and that the other side carried it clean away. But by the next Senators that came in place, they were so marked, and branded, with all notes of disgrace and shame, that some of them immediately made themselves away with their own hands: and the rest forbare, not only the common place and market all their life time after, but also came not abroad, in manner, to be seen in the very street, and never looked out of their doors. Thus a man may rather marvel, that authors should so differ among themselves,
The three and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breuiry of L. Florus upon the three and twentieth Book,

The Campus revolted unto Annibal, Mago was sent to Carthage, with news of the victory at Cannae and in the entry of the Council-House, he poured out (on the floor) the golden rings which had been plucked from the fingers of the Romans there slain, which by report exceeded the measure of a Modius. Upon these tidings, Hanno the noblest personage among all the Carthaginians, persuaded with the Senat of Carthage, to fly unto the people of Rome for peace, but he prevailed not, by reason of the Barchins rage and faction, that gain-said him. Cl. Marcellus the Praetor fought fortunately before Nola, in a sally which he made out of the town against Annibal, The Army of Annibal fell to riot at Cepaea, and gave themselves to such profanities, while they wintered there, that both in body and strength, and both in courage of mind, they became much enfeebled, Caulinum was besieged by the Carthaginians, and the inhabitants within were driven by extreme famine, to eat things and leatherings, plucked from off their shields and targets, yea, and to feed upon Mice and Rats. They lived with Nuts which the Romans sent them down the river, Vulturnus, The body of the Senat was defiled by receiving upon them a new supply, from out of the order of Knights or Gentlemen, to the number of 197 L. Pollihinus the Praetor, was together with his army defeated by the Gauls, and put to the sword, Coreus and Publius S. Ipius, were vanquished Afdrubal in Spain, and had the conquest thereof. The remnant of the army fled at Cannae was sent away and coaxed into Sicily, and commanded not to depart from thence, before the war was fully finished. A truce and treaty was concluded between Philip the King of the Macedonians and Annibal, Sempronius Gracchus the Consul, disarmed and flew the Campians. Moreover, this book contains the former exploits delivered by T. Manlius the Lord Deputy in Sardinia, against the Carthaginians and the Sarden: who took the General himself Afdrubal, together with Mago and Hannibal, prisoners. Claudius Marcellus the Praetor was vanquished and defeated in a last battle before Nola, the army of Annibal, and was the first that put the Romans in some good hope of better success, after they had been toiled out with so many foils and losses.

Annibal after the battle fought at Cannae, and the winning and vanquishing of both the Roman camps, dislodged anon, and was removed out of Apulia into Sardinia, being sent unto to come into the Hirpines country. By Sempronius Gracchus, who promised to betray and deliver the City of Nola into his hands. Now there was a Citizen of Cosa named Terentius and the personage and of great name in his country. But the bond and faction of the Cofanes (a family of great power, by favour of the Romans) kept him down and over-weighed him: but after the fame of the battle of Cannae and the coming of Annibal, divided and blown abroad by the speeches of Trebius those Compars abandoned the City and so was it without any conflict rendered unto the Carthaginians, and received a garrison. Annibal leaving behind him there, all the pillage and baggage that he had, divided his army into two parts: giving Mage in charge, to poffeft himself of the towns of that country, which would revolt of themselves from the Romans: or else to force them thereunto, in case they denied and refused to do. Himelf took his journey through the land of Carthage, toward the nether sea, intending to affault Naples, that he might be Lord of a Port Townalso, and have it at his devotion, When he was entered the confines of the Neapoliandrs, he placed some of the Numidians in Amburgh, as cunningly as he could, (and there for the most part, the ways are hollow, and full of clofe and secret nooks and holes) others he commanded to faire a fliew of driving away a body out of the fields, and to ride out braving before the gates of the City. Against whom, seeing to be not many, and those disordered, a troop of horfmen issued forth, but the enemies of purpose giving back and returning from them, led and trained them on, to the place of ambush: and so they were environed on every side, and there had not one of them escaped alive, but that the sea was near, where they fhipped many fisher boats along the flore on the bank side, and as many of them as were skillful in swimming, got unto them, and saved themselves: but in that skirmifh nevertheless certain young gentlemen were slain, Among whom, Hecata allo, the Captain of that Corner of horfemen died in the place, who followed too hotly upon them that retreated & seemed to flee. But Annibal after he had viewed the walls, and saw they were not easy to be won, was disoutraged and starved from giving affault to that City. From thence he turned his journey, and took his way to Carpa, a City flowing in wealth and superfluity of all pleasures, by reason of long felicity, and the favorablc aspect of gracious fortune. But among all corruptions that there reigned, it was infected most with the licentious loosenefs of the Commons, who exceeded beyond a measure, and abused their liberty, frauent Cobustion, a man of noble race there, and popular withall, but one that by lewd and indirect courses became rich and mighty. By means thereof, had both Senate & Com. under his girdle, and might do what he would. This man chanced to be head Magiftrate the fame year that the Romans were defeated and overthrown at the Lake Thriftymen: and supposing that the Commons (who had been a long time maliciously affected to the Senate and Nobility) would by occasion of alteration in the State, enterprize some notable act to wit, (in case Annibal should come with his victorious army into those parts) the murdering of the Senat, and delivering of ope into the Carthaginians hands. This man I say, lewd and had enough wifeifs, but yet not dark enough and wicked in the highest degree: and detefted to lord it, and dominet with the safety of the Common-wealth, rather then with the utter deftruction of the fame: as knowing full well that no State could remain safe, spoiled and bereft once of a publick council: call about and pifert, how he might both save the Senate, and also oblige the fame to be at his and the Commons devotion. He assembled therefore the Senate one day together, and after he had pretendi with a solemn preamble, That in no case he would like & allow of the delegation and intent of revolting from the Romans, unless it were upon necessity and constraint: for as much as himself had married the daughter of Appius Claudius, and had fair issue by her: besides affianced a daughter of his own in marriage unto Livius Rufinus: but yet (quoth he) there is a matter of greater consequence toward, and a danger like to burst out more to be feared then that. For the Commons intend not by way of revolt and rebellion to rid the City of the Senators authority, but are perswaded to massacre all the Senators, and to deliver unto Annibal and the Carthaginians, the Common-wealth, clearly void of a Senat. Of which imminent peril (quoth he) I know how to free you, in case you will wholly trust and rely upon me, and forget all former transactions, and old debates, which have fallen out in government and managing of the Senat. Now when all of them in place, (for fear were forced to put themselves into his hands: I will, quoth he) that you up within the Council-Chamber, and pretend unto them, as though I were one of their complices, both private and party to this intended praife of theirs: and so by soothing them up, under a colourable approbation and allowance of their delighements, which I should in vain crofs and gain, I shall find out a ready way to save all your lives. And for assurance hereof, ask and have of me what bond and security ye will your selves. Thus having made his faithful promise to be leit and true unto them, he went forth, and commanded the Counfell-Houfe to be flint fire, and let warders to keep the gate and entry thereof, that no man without his license and commandment, should either enter in, or come forth. Then after he had called all the people together to an audience, in a solemn and frequent assembly, thus he spoke unto them. That which ye have often wished for (O ye Campians, my good neighbors and friends) namely, to have the power and means to revenge your selves thoroughly of this wicked and unjust Senat, now lieth in your hands to perform with safety at your pleasure. And ye need not by way of an uproar to affault their houses one after another, to the great danger and hazard of your persons, considering how they are defended with strong guards of their vafuls, favorites, and bond flaves: ye have them all at and closely under within the Council-Chamb ers themselves alone. Without company, without armour and weapon. Here you may take them. But fee that ye do nothing basely upon head without due, nor rashly without advisement, I will in compals and bring about, that ye shall give your doom of life and death upon every one of them, to the end that each one may have his delier, and suffer due punishment accordingly. But
"But above all things ye must have an eye and look to this, that ye proceed not too much in "hear and cholera: but that ye have more regard of your own safety and profit, than of life and re"venge, For (Take it) they be the Senators only whole perfons ye hate and detest; and your "meaning is not wholly to put down and overthrow the Senate quite: for either ye must accept
"of a King,(O government abominable) or elie admit a Senat, the only Council indeed of a free
"City and State: and therefore with one blufh(as they say) ye are to go stop two gaps, and to do "both at once, namely, to abolish and depofe the old Senat, and to elect a new, I will command, "that the Senators shall be elected by name one after another: and concerning their life and death,
"I will demand your opinion and refolution: and look what judgement ye give, all inten-rather than said any thing directly befitting the present estate of our fortune, for what have we left us all, after this dishomiture of Cauna, that we should be willing to have that suppli by our allies which is wanting? As who would lay, we had somewhat already. Should we demand of you footmen, as though we were furnished with horse? Should we say that we lacked money, as if money only were wanting, and nothing else? No, no. Fortune hath dealt to hardly with us, that the hath left us just nothing, nor to much as that, which might be made up and supplied by others. Our Legions of footmen, our Cornets of horse, our armor and munition, our Standards and Ensigns, horse and man, money and victuals, all is gone, lost, and perished; either in the battel or the mortuary after in the ruin of our Camp, when we were turned out of our tents and pavilions. And therefore ye are not, O Campans, to aid and help up in this war: but in our behalf, and for us, ye ought to take the whole charge of the war upon your own selves, against the Carthaginians. Call to remembrance how in time past, when your ancestors and forefathers were fearfully driven to keep within your walls, standing in dread and bodily fear, not of the Samnites only your enemies but also of the Sidicins: we took them into our protection, and defended them before Sarchias: and how for your sakes we began war with the Samnites, and maintained the same for the space of an hundred years, and in great variety of fortune, giving and taking furnish the alts all the whiles. Over and besides, call to mind, how we concluded an indifferent and equal league with you, to the disad vantage of neither parts: how we granted unto you the liberty of living under our own laws; and how at the left (a matter, I wot, of right great importance and conference, before this our late overthrow at Cauna) we granted unto a great part of you, the freedom and privilege of Burgel-see and parted with you the franchises of our own City. And therefore ye ought of right (my Matters of Cauna) to repute this loss and misfortune now received, to be as well yours as ours: and to make reckoning to defend the common state and country of both. It is neither Samnit nor Tufcan that we have to deal with, to whom, if we lost and parted with our Empire yet it remained still within the compass of Italy: but the enemy that pursueth us, is a Carthaginian, drawing after him a train of fouldiers, who are not so much as in Affrick, but coming from the farthest and most remote parts and bounds of the world, from as far as the * firesights of the Ocean sea, even from Hercules his pillars: void of the knowledge of all law, right, and dif-tereence of condition, without reason and discretion, and (in manner) without commerce of mans language. Theic fouldiers lo fierce and fell by nature, to cruel and merciless: by use and cutume, their captain hath withall made more wild and savage, by making bridées, cautyes, and high-waies, over heaps of dead mans bodies: and (which I abhor to speak, by teaching them to eat men lea. To fee and endure thefe men to be their LL, whom feeding as they do upon such execrabl4e meats and viands, which even to touch and handle without great horror we may not: to retort for justice as far as into Affrick and Carthage, and to suffer Italy to be reduced into a Province under the Numidians and Moors, what is he that would not decent and abhor, were he but born only within Italy? A worthy honour and immortal glory it will be for you, O ye Campans, if the Roman Empire and dominion, thus growing to ruin and falling donprofitate under the weight of this late overthrow, might by your fidelity and forcible power be laid and upheld, and let upright again, I suppose ye have levied and enrolled already, thirty thousand foot, and fou broth ele. out of Campans: for coin, for corn, ye have drole and plenty: Now if your faith and truth be answerable to your wealth and fortune, neither shall all Amhul find that he hath won the victory, nor the Romans feel that they have lost a journey. With this Oration thus ended, the Consul gave the Embassadors their discharge, and dismissed them. As they returned homeward, one of them, Sobus Virius by name, said thus unto his fellows; Now is the day come (quoth he) wherein the Campans may be able, not only to recover again the lands which in former past the Romans have wrongfully taken from them, but also obtain and enjoy the sovereign rule & Empire of Italy. As for Ambulus, we may conclude, content, and capitulate with him what articles and conditions we lift our selves, to our bell behoof and benefit: And it is all to nothing, that Ambulus, having now disparch, and finished the war, will of his own accord depart like a Conquerour into Affrick, and with draw his forces out of these parts: so as the dominion of Italy shall be left wholly to the peoples of Cauna. Virius had no sooner delivered these speeches, but they all applauded him and accorded thereto. And in like terms they related their Embassage, as all men thought no les. but the Roman Empire and name was utterly perished and extinct for ever. Incontinently the Commons and the greatest part of the Nobility of Cauna emined to revolt and rebel: Yet by the commenne and authority of the Ancients and Elders the matter was stayed and deferr for some few daies. At length, the greater part prevailed, whose opinion was, That the same Embassadors which were sent to the Roman Conful, should be addressed in embassage unto Amhbul. But I find in some Anna records, that before they went, and before their relocale determination to revolt, there was an Embassage sent from the Campans to the City of Rome, demanding thus much, That if they meant to have any help and aid from them, one of their Consuls might be a Campan. Whereat the Senat of Rome took such impat and indignation, that the said Embassa-dors were commanded to void the Council-House, and a Serjeant went after them at their heels, to fet them out of the City: charging them at their peril, to take up their lodging that might without the territories of Rome. But because this demand jumpteth too near to the like that the Latines

A Latines made long before: and both Callius and other Historians have (not without good reason) passed it over and laid nothing thereof; I dare not avow it for a truth. Well, Embassadors there came unto Ammode, and concluded peace with him under these conditions, and covenants:

1. That no General Captain, or Magistrate of the Carthaginians should have any jurisdiction or power over a Citizen of Cypus: Item, That no Citizen of Cypus should be compelled against his will to serve in any wars, or execute the charge and office of a soldier. Item, That the Carthaginians, and their Laws and Magistrates of their own: Item, That Ammode deliver unto the Carthaginians three hundred Roman Captives, as they themselves shall choose; whom they might court and exchange for their three hundred horsemen of the Campans that were in garrison, and offered for pay in Sicily. There were the Articles of the accord. But the Campans stuck not to do more than so, and to go farther than their stipulations: committing divers and sundry outrages. For the Commons suddenly at once apprehended all the Romans in Captivity over the confederate soldiery, yes, and attacked other Citizens of Rome, that were either employed in any military charge, or otherwise occupied in their private affairs; and caused them to be clapt up within the houses and hot-bouses, as in ward and in custody, where their breath being stifled and dropped up with exceeding heat, and stinking vapours they were killed, and died miserably. But there was one Decius Mucius, a man who wanted no means of sovereign authority, but only the sobriety, discretion, and wisdom of the Citizens with whom he lived; who withstood all that ever he could find enormous and audacious counsels, and endeavoured to hinder the Embassage sent to Ammode. And to soon as he heard that Ammode was tending a garrison he reconnoitred unto his fellow Citizens the proud and lordly rule of Pyrrhus, the miserable and wretched thrall of the Tarentines, as preceding sufficient to give them warning. He called not to cry aloud in open place and audience, first, that they should not receive the garrison into the City: then, that being admitted they should either be thrust out again; or rather they would expiate and make amends by some valiant and memorable action for the soulful land part of theirs, in revenging from their most ancient Allies, yes, and kinmen by blood, they then did upon the Carthaginian garrison, and kill them every one and to revenge themselves as again to the Romans. Ammode being of having iniquity of these plots (for they were not a forcing and contriving in a corner) sent certain messengers to summons Mucius to repair unto his presence within his Camp.

After that he seeing he stoutly denied to go, (for he pleaded that Ammode had no authority nor right to command a Citizen of Cypus) he waxed wrath, and commanded the man to be apprehended, and to be bailed person bound unto him. But fearing upon better advice, left by observing such violence some tumult might arise, and in the best of all break forth into an inconceivable fray, he dispatched beforehand a messenger of purpose unto Marcus Curius, the Praetor of L. Governor of Cypus: signifying, that the morrow next following, he would be peremptorily in Cypus: and go with a small guard about him, he let forth of his Camp, and put himself on his journey, Marcus assembled the people together, making proclamation, and warning them to be ready in all frequent solemnity, with their wives and children, to meet Ammode up on the way. They of the adverse side unto Mucius and the Romans performed this not only obediently, but also most effectually, and with great diligence and endeavour. Yet the common force likewise were very forward in this action, as desirous especially to see this great General and brave warrior, so noble and renowned for his many victories. Decius Mucius neither went forth to brave him, nor yet kept his horses, because he would not seem to fear and carry a guilty conscience; but walked up and down in the Market place with one of his lads, and a few of his valets and followers, whilsts the whole City besides was busily occupied, and much troubled in the entertaining and beholding of this great Captain and Commander of the Carthaginians. Ammode being entered the City, in continually required to have audience in their Council-House. Whereupon, the Nobles and principal Citizens of Cypus required him that he would not that day intend any weighty matter of importance, but hint it in person solemnly; set it joy and mirth as an high and festival holiday for his welcome thither. And albeit he was by nature hasty, and ready to fall into fits of anger, yet because he would not seem at his first coming to deny them any thing, he employed a good part of that day in seeing and viewing the City. Entertained and lodged he was and his whole train with the Marcus, Curius, Sestius, and Paesion, the most noble and honourable personages, and the wealthiest of all others, Thither unto him, Paesion (concerning whom I speake before, the principal men of that bend and faction, which reduced the City to the obedience and devotion of Ammode) brought his own son a young Gentleman, and said withall, that the youth kept continually with Decius, and that he was sent to pick him away from his company and train, whole pack he took, and stuck most nightly to him, in maintaining the old society and amity of the Romans, against the new League with the Carthaginians, and that then the binding and inclination of the whole City to the contrary side, not yet the reverent majesty of a father, had yet driven him from his obdurate resolution. And for that time the father laboured with Ammode rather by way of prayer and intreaty, than by excusing and clearing his son, that he would not be discomfited, nor displeased with the young man, so he was overcome with the importunity and the plentiful tears of the father, and gave commandment, that he and his together with his father should be ridden to upper, at which last he purposed to have the company of no other guests of all Cypus, but only of his hostles that have him entertainment, and one Jovellius Tamet, a famous and brave warrior. To supper they went long before day-light went down, and fared at the table not after the guile of Carthaginians nor according to the discipline ofoudiers but after the order of a City and house; which had been nuste a long time to have the boord furnish'd with dainty food, and with all delicate saucers to please the palate and taste. Perhps only the fon of Carthage could not be brought to change his mind and thei himself cheerful and merry at meat, notwithstanding the Malters of the feast, and Ambibal himself! other whilees invited him to bear them company, and sit with them—but he ever made his excuse to his father, that he was ill at cafe and sickly whenever he seemed to examine him, and to know the cause of such wonderful trouble of mind and vexation of spirit. So a little after fun-setting; when his father arose, and was gone out from supper, the followed hard after him: and when they were come into a secret place apart, (a garden it was on the back side of the house) I will tell you a thing father, I have in my hand a policy, and a reedy mean, how we shall not only obtain pardon at the Romans hands for our trepas committed, in falling away from them and turning to Ambibal: but also how we Campans may be in far greater estimation and favour among them than ever we were. The father marcelling here was delirous to know what device that might be: and that the youth cast his gown from off his shoulders, and thew him a good blade girded to his side. I will quoth he, out of hand, establish and fast cure the Roman League with the bloud of Ambibal, I was delirous (father) to let you know of it aforehand, if peradventure you would be willing to be one of the way when the deed is a doing. The old man seeing and hearing this, in a great mullsagery, as if he had been present to see the execution of that which he heard K him to speake of. Now Ibeec the thee, my fon (quothe he) and pray thee of all loves and bonds that bind children and parents together, that thou wilt not before thy fathers face either comit or suffer this to horrible a part fell of allominous wilkendes whatsoever, and not to be named. There are not many hours one that we careve by all the gods and holy holows in heaven, and by joying hand in hand, made faithful promise, and obiged our selves to communci- cate together with him, and to eat at the holy table of feared lands. And are we no sooner departed thuns from our familiar conference and parley, but we smr our urches against him? Art left thou indeed from thy friends guilty board, to which thou wentst thy full a man bind- den of all the Campans, and even by Ambibal, and witt thou stain and pollute that board with the bloud of the principal guest? I, the father ofwile was able to reco.mme Ambibal to my L ion: and can I pacrifie my sonlikewise, and appease his fierce fome against Ambibal? But if their be nothing faced and inviscible, nothing to be trusted in the world, neither faithfull promises, nor religious oath, nor any piety at all and good nature, things so honest and just: then adventure hardly, and spare not to put in execution all actions detestable and not to be spoken, so that besides the note and infamous mark of wilkendes, they bring not upon our own heads present mischief, and utter confusion. Dareth thou alone affile the perfon of Ambibal? What will that multitude about him do the while, so many freemen and bondmen both? All their guard and regard all their eyes upon him alone what servet they for? What will become of so many hands of theirs? Thinkest thou that they will be bennummed and desd at the time of that tranick enterowtie of thine? The grim village of Ambibal himself, whom whole armies of servants tremble to behold: who the people of Rome dread, and for fear of whom they quake. again, witt thou alone abide to fee? And if all other means of help shold fail him, witt thou endure to strike and wound me thy father, putting my body between for the safeguard and defence of Ambibal? And flab me thou milt through the very heat, before thou canst hurt him or run him through. Suffer therefore thyself to be righted from this thy intended mischief, before thou have the folithere, and mist of thy purpose. Let your prayers take place with thee, as once this day they prevailed for thee. With that, he marked his fon to weep and shed tears and embracing him about the middle, and kising him ever and anon, he left him nor, not gave over to pray & entreat him instantly, until he got at his hands to lay off his sword and prom- ise him faithfully that he would not attempt any such enterprise. Then the youth, seeing how the case stood, I will (quothe he) pay unto my natural father that kindnes and love, in which I am bound as a debtor to my natour Country. But alas for you, good father, I am right sorry for your hard hap: who are to answer before God and the world, for the betraying of your country, no fewer times than these already. Once, when you gave counsell and persuaded to forfake the Romans, and to revole from them: again, when you were the principal agent, and advised to make peace with Ambibal: and now this day the third time, when you are the only obstacle and hindrance that Capua is not restored again into the hands of the Romans. O sweet country and native soil of mine, take here at my hands this sword, wherewith cruelly I was girt and armed for dear love of thee and was fully minded to defend this thy chief Caffle and Fortresses, and not to spare, but embrace it in the blood of thy mortal enemy: take it I say, since my own father is ready to writte it from me. This said, he flung his sword over the garden wall into the high way and open streete: and therewith, because he would not grow into any suspicion he flewed himself again to the gardens within the house, and took part of the banquet. The morrow after, the Senate in favour of Ambibal oTowenly met together in great number: in which frequent assembly, the beginning of his speech was very pleasant and gracious: wherein he gave the Capans thanks, for preferring his amity before the alliance of the people of Rome; and among other hail and magnificall behooves to them made, he promised that within a while,
A Capna should be the head City and chief State of all Italy, whereunto the people of Rome, together with other nations, should refer for law and justice. Mary quoth there is one that hath no part or fellowship in the society and league made between the Carthaginians and you, namely, Magnus Decius, who neither was a Campanian nor ought of right to be so called and reputed. him I demand to be delivered into my hands, and in that my presence the Senate should be addressed their opinion concerning his trepans, and an Act presently enter thereof. All of them there subscribed allowed of the motion, and gave their assent in the end: albeit a great font of them thought both the man unworthy of that hard lot, as you and calamity, and that this was but an ill beginning and a very overture to the INTRINSIC of the right of their freedom. The chief Magi gram the Senate then went forth of the Comitille-Chamber, and late in the Judicial Hall or Temple, and commanded Decius to be delivered, and to stand before him at his feet, and there to answer for himself and make his defense. Who persisted still in the same sounds and boldness of spirit, alleging that by virtue of the covenants in the League compiled, he might not lawfully be pressed and forced thus far. Whereupon he had iron clapt upon him, and commandment was given that he should have a Lictor attend upon him, and to be conveyed into the Camp of Annibal. All the way as he was led, so long as he was bare-headed and open-faced, he went preaching to the multitude that flocked about him, and with a loud voice spake and said: Now Capnans, ye have the liberty that ye fought and longed for. In the open market place, at noon-day, and in your "fight, yo how I man inferior to none in all Capna, am led away bound in chains to die. What greater violence could be offered if Capna were won by allaint of the enemy? Go forth, go and meet Annibal adorning and hang the City with its cloths of tapestry. Register in your Calendar, among other holidays this day Ethyes that in the end ye may behold this goodly triumph over one of your own Citizens. Upon the utterance of these words, the multitude seemed disconcerted at the indignity of this fight. Whereupon he was hoodwinked and his head covered and the Sergeant was charged to have him away quickly, and make haste out of the gates. So, he was brought into the Camp, and immediately shipped and sent to Carthage, for fear lest some commotion might arise in Capna, upon unworthy and shameful a deed: and lest the Senate also should repent themselves, that they had delivered and yielded out of their hands a principal personage among them: also to prevent that no Embassie might be sent unto him for his redemption whereby he should either offend his new Allies, or in case he denied them their first request or suffer Capna to have always a base and licentious Citizen ready ever to stir up new troubles; he granted their fair. The ship wherein he was embarked, was by a tempest cast upon Clyra, a port town in the dominion at that time of the KK. There Magnus fled for refuge as to a Sanctuary, unto the Image of King Polonius, and was brought by his guards and keepers unto Alexaner to the Kings presence, and enthrone the King how contrary to the tenor and privilege of the covenant he was in bonds by Annibal. Whereupon he was loosed from his chains, and put to the choice, whether he would return to Capna, or go to Rome. Magnus answered that he could not in Capna remain in safety, and if he went to Rome, at that time especially when there was war between the Romans and the Capnans, he should be sooner lodged there in a prison like a fugitive runaway.

E than entertained in house for a friend and loving guest: and concluded in the end, that he would make abode and live the rest of his days more willingly in no place of the world, than in his highness Realm whom he found already to be the favour of his life, and the redeemer of his liberty and enlargement.

While thence occurrents fell out abroad, Q. Fabius Pistor, tent (as is above said) Embassador to Delphi returned to Rome, and out of a writing he read openly, the answer of the Oracle in these words (now ye must understand, that in this Scripture were certain gods and saints named, unto whom they should make solemn supplication, and the manner also with all ceremonies and compliances thereto belonging) "Then (O Romans) if ye shall do, your state shall prosper and be more happy; you Comman-Celestial shall go forward better to your mind, ye, and victory in the war shall happen unto the people of Rome. But remember that when all things shall go well on your side, and your state shall be fared and preferred, ye lend unto Pythius Apollo a pretence, according to the merit of a divine recompense, and of the silver railed of the pillsage, prizes, and spoils taken from the enemies, do him honour accordingly. After he had rehearsed these words, truly translated out of the Greek Original then he said moreover, That so soon as he was departed from the Oracle, he presently translated unto all the gods with frank incense and wine, Also, that he was commanded by the Priest of Apollo, that like as he both came to the Oracle, and also celebrated sacrifices, crowned with a garland and chaplet of Laurel, so should he in the same manner adorn himself and be embossed, and not lay off the said garland before he was arrived to Rome; finally, that all ceremonies performed most precisely and diligently, which he was commanded to observe, he had laid and bestowed the said chaplet upon the altar, before the Shrine of Apollo at Rome. Then the Senate made a decree, That those sacrifices and supplications should with all speed and carefully regard be celebrated.

whiles these things palled at Rome and in Italy, Mago the son of Amilcar, arrived at Carthage, and brought the first tidings of the victory at Cannae. This Mago was not immediately and directly sent from his brother, out of the field where the battle was fought, but laid certain dates about receiving the homage and submission of certain cities of the Bruttis, which revolted from the Romans. Who having audience given him in the Senate of Carthage, related what acts and and exploits his brother Aemilius had achieved in Italy: namely, That he had given battell to Hys Generalis, whereas four were Commi, and two were the Dictator and Commander of horse-men: That he had fought against six entire Consular armies, in which battell he had lain above 20,000 enemies, taken prisoners more than 5,000. That of thatour Cofi, he had killed twain, oneight for the other two of them was deadly hurt, the other having lost his whole army, was fled accompanied rusty with fifty men: that the General of the cavalry created with full Consular authority, was discomfired and put to flight: and the Dictator (forsooth) because he never wou'd hazard the fortune of a field, was counted the only warrior and worthy Captain: Than the Britth and Aquilans part of the Samnites, and Lucians, were revolted to the Carthaginians. That (as in the city of Camarina only, but after the Romans defeat and overthrow in the battell at Canus,) Aemilius also, was surrendered to Aemilius. For these to many and so worthy victories, he required (meet and requisite it was) that there should be a solemn festival day held and farishes solemniz'd to the honour of the immortal gods. And for the better assurance of these lucky and fortunate achievements, and to unite his words, he caused the gold rings of the Romans, to be poured forth in the porch and entry of the Consul's House. The heap of them was so great, that as some authors affirm, when they measured the fame, they fill'd three Medus and a half. But the constant report went, and founding nearer to a truth, that they were not above one Medus. He added moreover, and said, (and all to prove their overthrow the greater,) that none but knights and men of arms, and those of the better sort, who feared on horseback at the Cities, things needful to wear that ornament. The drift and condition of his K speech was this: That the former that Aemilius hoped to make an end of the wars, the more he ought to be aided and helped with all provision and furnitures accordingly. And why? The latter was far from home in the midst of the enemies land, a huge deal of corn was consum'd, a great mass of money was spent, and as to many battells he utterly swoop'd up the enemies armies, to reckning was to be made, that they had in some measure lefled and impaired the forces of the conqueror. Therefore, a new supply of men was to be lent over and money for soldiers. And paxterga, and corn also was to be transported to bable fortresses, that had done insupportable good service and deserved to well of the Carthaginian nation. Upon these reports of Magnanimity, when all men else were wondrous glad, and took great contentment. Himedes, a man of the Bachi band, supposing he had now good occasion and opportunity offered to carp and check L. Haemo. How now L. Haemo quoth he, what say you to this year? Repent you till and mislike the war undertaken against the Romans? Let us see now give your voice and opinion that Aemilius be yielded: for this now thanksgiving to be performed to the immortal gods, for this prosperous speed and fortunate issue. Let us hear a Roman Senator now to speak in the Council-House. of the Carthaginians. Then Haemo: I would have held my peace this day, my LL. quoth he, for fear to speak ought that in this common and general joy might not be altogether pleasant unto you. But now seeing a Senator bittily put me the question whether I mislike still of the enterprise of war against the Romans? If I should keep silence and say nothing, I might seem either proud and inent, or else faulty and culpable. Whereof the one is the part of a man that hath forgot the liberty of other men: the other a property of him, that thinketh not of his own. Well may I therefore answer to Himedes, that I care not yet to mislike this war, nor never will give over to blame and challenge this invincible Captain and warrior of ours, because I see the war ended and determined, upon some indifferent hand, and tolerable conditions: and nothing else shall thin the mists I have, and quench the longing desire of the old peace, but the making of a new. And therefore these particulars, which Megesewhile so magnified and venerated; I thought I could let the present joyful news to Himedes andcither of that true and the aloud of Aemilius. And to me likewise in some measure they may acceptable tidings in this respect, and that good success and happy speed in war, if we will make the right use and benefit of our fortune, will be a mean to procure us more ease and honourable peace. For we if let slip this advantage and opportunity of the time, when as we may seem rather to give than take conditions of peace, I fear me, that even this present goodly gush of rankness is as maketh now, will runn on to law, and bear no head to hold corn in the end, and yet let us consider now, what a special matter this is. Slatin I have whole armies of enemies: Therefore send me fresh and new soldiers, What could you,(Sir) demand more, if you had been overthrown? Won I have before two strong holds where the enemies were encamped, full and frighted we want nothing to think of prizes and victuals, allow me more corn and money, What would you have requir'd and raised more a day, in case you had been riled, and turned perforce out of your own camp and pavilions? But that I may not marvel alone at these strange Enthymemes and conclusions, now(for it is as free and lawful for me to ask some questions seeing I have already answered to Himedes) I would fain have the See of Meges, I care not whether, to make answer likewise to me, Say, that in the battell before Canus, the Roman Empire was wholly defeated and foiled. Say also, that certain it is how all Italy is at present ready to revolt to me first and foremost, whether any one Nation of the Latin people is lain from them to us? Secondly, whether any one per on of the five and thirty wards in Rome, is run away and fled to Aemilius? When Meges said, And denied both. Why then(quoth he) there be great numbers of our enemy still behind. But I would gladly know what courage, what heart, what hopes that multitude hath. When Meges answered, he could not tell, And nothing(quoth Haemo) is more nice & easy to be known, Sayman, lest the Romans any Embassadors to Ambichol to treat for peace? Nay, had ye any intention to bring into you, that there was so much as one word hinted, or mention made at Rome of peace? When Mago did flay, nay, to that too. Why then (quoth Hannibal) by this account this war will find you work, and keepcuss occupied as much as it did the very first day that

Anna, iet foot in Italy. How many variable fortune was in the former Punic war, how victory went and came irreproachably, we are most of us yet alive that well remember. We never knew better nor had a milder hand, both by land and sea, than before Cato Left him and Annia Philippa; were Consilts, and whiles LPSelius and Ptolemais were Consils, were we vanquished and utterly overthrown before the Ilands Egypt. And inca, now (which God forbid) fore some thousand than to change, and turn her wheel, hope yet to have peace then, being overcome, which now when we are conquerors, no man offereth nor leketh after. For mine own part, if any man should ask mine opinion of peace, I answer, I have, and tender it to the enemies, and accept of their hands. I write not what to say; but if ye would know what I think concerning those demands of Mago, my advice is, that there is no line nor reason to lend aid and supplies to conquerors now if they beat us in hand, decline, and abuse us with a vain and false preservation of conquest and victory, much less a great deal. These remonstrances of his who took small effect with many of them: for, both the less grudge and ran or wish he borne to the Bank he Hone, much impeached his credit and authority, and the Senat that their minds were fully possessed of the present joy, they could admit and abide to hear of nothing, that might offend otherwise to daunt their glad hearts: thinking verily that the war would soon be at an end; and now would it in a little help it forward. And therefore with great consent, there passed an Act of the Senat; That there should be a supply sent unto Ambichol for forty thousand Numidians, forty Hephestis, and many talents of silver. Also the Dictator was sent before with Mago into Spain to levy and hire twenty thousand footmen, and one thousand horsemen, for to make up those broken armies which were in Italy and in Spain. Both these matters (as usually it happens in time of prosperity) were performed but fleshly and at leisure. The Romans conscienciously made more peace, as being by nature more indolent, and besides, such was their ad of fortune and extremity, that they might not neglect their affairs and go slowly about their business. For neither the Conslts was waiting in any affairs that were by him to be managed; and the Dictator M. Junius Brutorus, so soon as he had performed all the complements concerning the religion and religious ceremonies, proposed up unto the people. That (as the usual manner was) he might mount on horseback. Which done, over and besides the two legions of the Romans, which in the beginning of the year had been levied and enrolled by the Conslts, and the bondslaves that were before manners, and certain ignomions gathered together out of the Ptolemais and Gauls country, he proceeded to the last remedy and succour of a distressed and well near desperate state, when as honest and direct counsels must give place unto commodious and profitable policies, and slights from his house, and made proclamation, That whosoever were enemies and condemned of any capital time, or who whatever were imprisoned for debt, and would willingly serve under him, he would take order that they should be exempt from all punishment, and discharged from their creditors. And of such he armed six thousand with the spoils of the Gauls, which in the triumph of Ptolemais were carried in them. Thus he departed from Rome, and twenty thousand strong.

Ambichol having possessed himself of Cepha, and solicitted the Neapolis once again, and founded their minds proposing before their eyes fear and hope, and all in vain, led his forces into the Country of Notis, with this mind, not at first to go roughly with them to work, but by way of open hostility, because he was not out of all hope, that they would willingly come off and yield themselves: but in case they wavered, and answer not his hope and expectation in some good time, he would likely proceed against them in all extremity, and put them to whatever he could endure or last. The Senate, especially the principal of them, being万分 and sure in their alliance with the people of Rome, but the commons (as their mistresses, deforme of alteration, and to see a new world) enjoined wholly to the side of Ambichol; calling many doubts, and fears, that their hands and pollutions should be wished and rioted with blind calamities and indignities, that follow upon hege: neither wanted there heads and ring-leaders of a rebellion. Whereupon the Senate (for fear lest if they should seem to thwart and foil them, they had not been able to withstand the violence of the multitude once upon and drawn to an head) closely dilliberate their intent and purpose, and so by temporizing, prevented a perilous mishie, so having remembranced that they liked well, and were resolved of revolting into Ambichol; but upon what conditions and capitulations they should enter into new league and amity, they now certainly. So having taken a farther time they dispatched in haste certain Embassadors into the Roman Prator Martellus Claudius, who remained with the army at Carthage, adorning him in how great jeopardy the fate of Notis stood, to wit. That Ambichol was already Lord of their lands and the Carthaginians would soon be masters of the City-unles they were overcome and relieved; that their Senat were driven to this step, to yield unto the Commons, and grant to revert whenever they would have them; and by that means to bind them that they rebelled not over hastily. Martellus after he had commended the Nolians, would them with the same dissimulation to protest time and hold off until his coming: and in the mean while to conceal and keep secret to themselves, the dealings and treaties with them, and no cafe to be known known of any hope they had of aid from the Romans. Himself went from Carthage, to Calvicia, and from thence passed over the river Volturnum, and by the way of Satricum and Trebia, journeyed over Sarnia, through the mountains, and arrived at Nola. A little before the coming of the Roman Prætor, Annibale was depauperated and gone out of the Territory of Nola, and drew downwards to the sea-side near unto Néapolis: his teeth watered at the Port-town, and that out of Affright his ship might arrive thither, as to a safe and litle harbour. But after that he heard that Agela was held by a Roman Prætor, M. Junius Silanus (sent for thither by the Neapolitans themselves) and had received a relation: seeing he could not be admitted into Neapolis no more than into Nola he went to Nuceria. Having beleaguered it round a long time, and often assailed it terribly, and afforded to sollicite as well the Commons as the Nobility, but without effect: as the length by famine he forced them to yield, and to become matter of the Town upon composition, that they should depart every man disarmed in their tangle garments. Then, as one that would seemer from the beginning, to reconcile to all Italians, but only the Romans: he made fair promises of great rewards and advancement to honour, unto all those that would tarry behind and leave under. But no man upon those hopes would remain with him. For they all gave him the slip, and went flyndry ways, some to their friends and acquaintance, others to a venture as their mind flew to divers Cities of Campania but most to Nola and Néoples. Amongst the rest, there were almost thirty Senators, and thence (as it is told of) the bell for that came to Capua: but being kept out there because they had nothing against Annibale. They went to Cumae. The pillage of Nuceria was belittled upon the fortunies the City lacked and burnt. K Now kept Marcellus Nola, not presuming more upon the strength of his own garrison, than upon the confidence he had in the great men and chief of the City. But he had the Commons in jealouic, and above all, one L. Banarius, who for that he had committed to rebellion, and therefore flew in fear of the Roman Deputy: one while was pricked and incited to attempt treision, and to betray the City; another while, in case he shou'd fail of that opportunity, and use his purpose, to make an escape and run away to the enemy. A couragious and lusty young man he was, and the bravest Cavalier in those days of all the Roman Conquerors. His hap was to be found lying half dead among the heaps of slain bodies before Cumae: Annibale took order for the curing of his hurts, and when he was thoroughly healed right presently sent him home well and bountifully rewarded. In remembrance of which favour and good turn, and in token of L. thankfulness, he was willing to deliver and yield Nola into the hands of Annibale, to be at his devo- tion. But the Prætor had an eye unto him, and observed how his head was wondrously twisted, and was hurfully occupied to bring an alteration. And seeing there were but two ways to deal with him, either by punishment to keep him short, and cut him short; or by some benefit to win his heart: he thinking it a better course to gain unto him, so hardy and valiant a friend, than only to bereave his enemy of him; he lent for him, and in this manner spake friendly unto him: "You have (quoth he) amongst your countrymen and fellow-Citizens, I see well, many that envy you, as it appears well by this, that there is never a neighbour you have at Nola that hath told me of you, and how many noble exploits and good services in war you have performed. But yet your valour cannot be unknown and hidden, ever since you served in the Roman army. For many there M. be which were fortunies then with you, which have made report unto me of your provos, and what perils you have entered into, and how often you have put your life in hazard, for the safety and honour of the people of Rome: and namely, how in the battle before Cumae you gave not over fight, until at length having bled well near to death, you were born to the ground and lay under foot, overwhelmed with men, horse and armour, falling upon you, and so kept down that you could not rise up again. But be of good cheer man, and go on tillin this thy venture and well-doing; you shall have at your hands all honour and reward that may be possible: and the officer you come to me and keep me company, you shall find it will be more for your reputation and commodity both. The young man was glad at heart for these gracious words and large promises: and so Marcellus gave unto him freely a good brave courser, and commanded the Troes-Nifer to tell him out in money. 500 Bigas of silver, charging his officers and Lieutors to let him have access unto him, at his pleasure, whenever he came. By this courteous usage and humanity of Marcellus, the young man's foot heart was so dulced, mollified, and cafe to be wrought, that of all Conquerors and Allies there was none who bare himself more valiantly, nor maintained more faithfully the State of Rome. When Annibale was approached to the gates of Nola (for he was returned from Nuceria, and came thither again) and the Commons within the town practis'd a fresh to rebel. Marcellus had a little before the coming of the enemies, retired and put himself within the walls: not for fear that he should not be able to keep the field and his hold; but lest he should give advantage and opportunity to betray the City, owing too many of them within disposed and forward the enemy. After this they began on both sides to arrange their barrels in array the Romans under the walls of Nola, the Carthaginians before their own fort. Small skirmishes there were between the City and the Camp of Annibale (with variable event of fortune) because the Generals were not willing, either to deny and debar some few that were to eager and forward to call for fight, or yet to give forth the signal of a general battle. While these two armies temporiz'd thus, and held their <corp de guard> continually, in manner of a solemn fee Assembly, the chief Nobles of the Nolans advow'd Marcellus, that there nere D. to be night-meetings and conferences between their own Commons and the Carthaginians: and A and that it was plotted and set down. That when the Roman host was inlaid in barbel-array out of their gates, the Commons in the mean while should fall to rising their carriages, packs, and trundles within, and then flut the gates upon them, and keep the walls: and having the City and all their goods and baggage under their hands, should from thenceforth receive Ansub into the City instead of M. Vereius. Upon these advertisements, M. Vereius after he had thanked and commended the Senators of N. L., determined before any commotion and mutiny arose within the walls to try the fortune of a battle. At those three gates that stood toward the enemy he ranged his forces divided into three battalions, &c. gave order that all the carriages should follow after; and that the ladies, launders, and other Camp followers, together with the feeble and sickly persons, should carry flaks and pales for the rampiers. At the middle gate he placed the flower and strength of the legions, together with the Roman Cavalry: at the two gates at either hand he belowed the new frontiers the light armed, and the anakyli homen of allies. The Nolians were by frighten commandment forbidden to approach the gates or the walls. As for the baggage and carriages the ordinary guard was appointed to attend thereupon, for fear, lest while the legions were but in fight there should be some flame made upon them. In this order and array allured they were within the gates. Ansub who likewise ready armed flung with banner displayed (as he had done for certain days together) until it was well toward noon,first wondered at it, that neither the Roman army Issed out of the gates nor any frontiers appeared upon the walls: and supposing afterward that their small compasses and conveniences were discovered and revealed, and that for very fear they kept within and in still, sent back part of their frontiers into the Camp, with commandment in all speed to bring abroad into the opened field both before the Vanguard, all the Ordinance and Artillery force to batter the City walls: with lifted confident, e. that if he came hasty upon them, gave them afflack, while they thus lingered and Issed not forth, the Commons would make some tumult and flurry within the City. But anon as every man was busily occupied, running to and fro in hither and thither, about his own charge, before the Vanguard and forepart of his battalions, even at the battalions advanced toward to the walls; all upon a sudden that gate was set open, and M. Vereius caused the trumpets to sound the alarm, and the frontiers to set up a shout, commanding the flower of the army first, and then the horse to tally out, and with all the might and force they could, to charge upon the enemy. Soon after they terraced their main battalions: and an assault was made disorderly and made disorder there, when at the two gates of each side. P. Flacciis, Flosuras and Cum Am- relus, two Lieutenant-generals, Issed forth upon their flanks and wings. The horse, bores, scullions and other the multitude assembled, which was set to guard the carriages, arose up and made a new order, and stationed, so as to the Carthaginians (who conceived them before for their small number especially) they represented all at once a flock of mighty army. I dare not avouch that which some Authors fluke not to write, that of enemies were flux in this conflict 2900 and that the Romans lost but one only man. But what victory ever it was, either to great, or smaller, purely a doughty piece of service was that day achieved & I wont not whether I may truly say, of the generallest conquence that any ever was during the time of that war. For as the time was then, it was a greater matter for the Romans (albeit they were the Conquerors) not to be Evanschied of Ansub than it was afterwards to vanquish him. Ansub disappointed of his hope to win Nola, turned to Acerr a. M. Vereius immediately having flut the gates, and placed the guards and watchmen to keep the time, but no man might go forth, for judiciously in the marketplace to examine, to see what conduct or parting with the enemies: and finding above fifteen guiltiness of this action pronounced sentence of death upon them, as in case of treason, Thoklhe cut shorter by the head and commanded their goods to be confiscat. And thus leaving the government of the City to the Tar whatsoever, departed with all his leers, and above Snob enconomized himself and there abode.

Ansub / being come before Acerr a.slid Admonished the City to surrender voluntarily & without contest: but keeping them obdurate, and willing to resist, he made preparation to lay siege to the town and to assault it. But the Accerans had better heart and courage than might and strength to repel him. Therefore, when they saw themselves like to be intrenched all about, and were palt hope to defend and keep the town: before the enemies had brought all ends of their trenches and lines together they get between the trenchers and rampiers (where they were not finished and flout not close together) in the dead time of the night, and slipped through the lenins and wickets that were flendly looked unto and as well as they could making shift through by-wales and blind lanes over hedge and ditch (as either their wish guarded them or their fear carried them) recovered those Cities of Campina, which they knew for certain were not revoked, but perished true and left unto the Romans, Ansub after he had put Acerr a to the sack, and let it on fire having intelligence, that the Roman Dictator and the legions were received at Cashilus: and leaving left while the enemy lay to near encamped, some should have recoupe also into Contra led his army to Cashilus. At the same time Presebe was held by 500 Prencellins, with a few Romans and Latins, who upon the news of the overthrow at Campina were retired thither, These Prencellins, by occasion that they were not levied and mulcted at Presebe by the day appointed, set out from thence some what too late; and were come as far as Cashi lus, before the rumour was bruited of the defeat before Campina; where they joyed themselves with other Romans and Condurers, set forward from Cashilus, and marched together with a good great company but meeting by the way with with the tidings of that unfortunate field-venture back again to Caesarianum. And after they had pent [pent] certain days there, as well fearing the Campanians as suspected of them again, (for they devised on both sides how to entrap one another, and how to avoid each other's stains) and having received also a certain intelligence, that in Capua there was treating about a revolt, and that Ambitio 28 was there received; they in one night let upon the Townsmen of Caesarianum, and killed them, and got that part of the City which is on this side Velurnus (a river that runneth through it, and divideth it into two parts) and kept it still. Their number was well increased by the coming of a cohort of four hundred and fifty Penguins, who likewise were driven to Caesarianum, by the same report and news, which a few days before had turned the Pretentius thither. And surely there was sufficient almost of armedboldly to man and defend the walls of that part, being off to a small circuit as they were, considering the town was flanked on the one side with the river. And again, for the proportion of corn (whereof they had small store) they were men but too many, Ambitio being now not far from thence, sent before him the Getulians, under the conduct of a Captain named Isiato; with direction that, if he could come to a parlament, he should perswade with the Inhabitants within and by fair words induce them to open their gates, and receive a garrison; but in case they continued still in their obstinacy, then to assaile them by force, and give the attempt to enter into the City one way or other. When they were come under the walls, the barbarous Captain Isiato supposing (because he heard no noise, and saw no business) that they had quitted and abandoned the town, and were fled began to assaile the gates, brake open the locks, & burn the bars. But all at once on a sudden the gates were set open, and two cohorts well appointed and provided for that purpose within, falled forth with an exceeding great noise and tumult, overthrew a number of the enemies and beat them down. Thus when the flinthad the repulse and were set back, Maximil. I. was sent with a greater power to reconquer them, but was not able to make his party good with their equations that falled forth and charged upon him. Left Ambitio himself encamped even before the wall, and with all his power and forces put together, made preparation to give assault to this little town & small garrison. And writes he pressed hard upon them with feath and hot affaile, insinuating it round about the enemies from off their walls, curtains, and turrets, set the fire to hotly upon the assailes that he left, some of his belt & most forward men ther. Once they illused forth of themselves upon a bravery, and minded to bid them bate, but by a couple of Elephants sent between them and home, they had like to have been forth and kept L. out, and to them made halfe in great ter to recover the gates and put themselves within the town again; having left, considering to kill a number, a great part: and more had died for it, but that the night parted the fray, and made an end of the skirmish. The morrow after, the assailes were all of them in despair to give a treath and hot charge, but not before there was a murall Coronet of gold newed, and promised unto him that first should scale the walls. And the General himself cast in their teeth and reproved them for being so long about the shuffling of a small and weak fence, to speak of Justiied also upon a plain: whereas before they had the strongest town of Saggamum. He put them in mind both all and some, of Caenea Thrasyiscus, and Treb. Then began they to set mantiers and pavilions to, and to undertone. Many and many enterprises were attempted, and nothing left undone, that either by one force could be performed, or by art and cunning devised. The Roman auxiliaries against those their engines and structures raised mounted, and platforms: whereas with countermines and cores trenches met with the mines of the enemies; so as both above ground and underneath they impeached all their attempts: so long, till Ambitio for very shame was fain to give over his design for the present. And when he had notified his standing Camp and placed there a mean guard for the defence of it, because he would not seem to have relinquished altogether the enterprise, he withdrew himself into C. post there to winter. There he lodged his soldiaries within the better part of winter; those soldiaries he lay, who many a time and often had endur'd long, and held out against all travels and hardships that can possibly happen to the body of man; and never had been didied to any good keeping, nor acquainted with delights and pleasures of the world. But even these men, whom no calamity, no misery could N tame and overcome, were spoiled and undone with too much wealth and excessive dainties: and so much, that the rather as they more greedily fell thereto; and having not tasted thereof before, gave themselves wholly that way, and were deeply plumed and drowned therein. For sleeping on soft beds, wine and delicate fare, wallowing and basking, flews and hot-houses, idleness and taking ease, which by use and custom grew pleasant and delightsome unto them every day more than other; had in this fort weaken'd their bodies, and made their hearts to effeminate, that from that time forward the reputation and name only of their victories past defended them more than any present strength and vigor they had; insomuch, as expert and skillful warriors judged their Captain Ambitio in more fault, and rather overween in this action, than in not leading his Army back forward to Rome, after the battell before Caenea. For, that day might have been thought to have deferred only the entire and small victory for a time, but this errone and over-sight seem'd to disable him for attaining the victory for ever. So little retained he of his former old diline that I at this time you went out of Caepurn again as if he had led some other Army and none of his own. For, not only they returned from thence most of them intangled and inured in the love of harlots, but so soon as they came again to lie abroad on the bare earth under tents and pavilions covered with beasts hides, to march long journeys, and to taste of other military toil and labour; their bodies so tired, their hearts so faintned, as if they had been raw fouldiers, neare come into the field: in such wise, as all the time of their immener abode in Camp, many of them with license and paiptor, would slip out of the way, and depart from their colours: and thefe thrall-backs had no other place of haunt to lurk in, but some: Now when the winter feaon began to be more mild, and draw towards the Sprin, Annibai brought forth his fouldiers out of his wonting harbours, and returned to Caffinum, where, albeit the affault ceased, yet the fiege had continued fo straige, that the townsmen and the garrifon within the Fort, were driven to extream neceffity, and want of victualls. Now the Captain over the Roman Camp was T. Sempronius [Gracchus] by reafon that the Dictator was gone to Rome to take new Appli-

Ces. And as for Marcellus, who was deterr'd for his part to receive and mount the befieg'd was impressed for coming on them, partly, by the riling, and swelling of the river Pulemaris, and partly, by the inrity of the Citizens of Nola and Accece, who greatly feared the Campans, in the the garrifon were once departed from them. And Gracchus, bying and keeping near unto Caffinum, flirred not one foot, by reafon of the express commandment of the Dictator. That he should attempt nothing in his absence; albeit there came daily from Caffinum into the Campich news, as would have mov'd and provok'd the moft patient man that was. For it was confantly reported, and for certain known, that some of them within the town, no longer able to endure the famine, threw themselves down headlong, and brake their necks: others ftood armed upon the walls, offering their bare and nacked bodies as Butts and mark to the shot of arrows, and others darts, Gracchus grieved much to hear their pitious tidings, yet durst he not for his life skirmish and fight without the warrant of the Dictator: So he saw full well, that if he would come corn and viol,u-als unto them openly, fight he must, there was no remedy. Having therefore no hope at all to lend any, but it fhould be fted, he devi'd to fill many tuns and pikes with corn, that he had gotten together out of the country all about, and withall, to dilpatch a mellemger to the chief Magistrate of Caffinum, adorning him that he fhould in the night ftean the masts of the vefles that came down the river. The night next following, every man watched the river fide, according to the hope they conceived by the forefaid Roman mellemger, and on receiv'd thefe tuns, bullying down the midle of the stream: and the corn was equally divided among them all. Thus did they the morrow after, and the third day alfo, Forver by night thefe vefles were let down into the water, and the fame night they might eafily come unto them: by reafon whereas of the fenfincs and guards of the enemies were nothing were of that which was done, But afterwards, the current growing more twist and rouh, by occation of continual rain that fell, the said tuns were fome of them driven into the channel to the bank fide, even where the enemies were watch'd: and were chip'd away and flemachine upon the willows and fides that grew along clofe unto the banks: whereof Annibai was advertised, And fio from thenceforward they tended the watch more straitly, that nothing fent down the river Pulemaris could ecape them, and pass to the City. Afterwards, there was poured into the water great ffore of nuts from the Camp of the Romans: which flipt down the channel unto Caffinum, and with grated skimmers of wicker were taken up, But at the left, they within the town were driven to this poor fhitl and extremity, for to take their thongs and bride rains, to pluck of the leather from their shields & bucklers, and make them soft in fable water, and prove how they could eat them, Nay, they fared not to much as was, except any other like vermin. Nor there was not a weed nor a root that they could come by upon the banks and terraces under the walls, but they gathered and digg'd up. And when the enemies had turn'd up with a plough all the green-fod of the counter-Carp without the walls, they within call turnip'd upon the monidWhereupon Annibai made a horn at it, and cried aloud: What? All we fit here about Caffinum to tong, untill their rapes be come up and grown: and whereas before that time, he would never have heared to hear of any composition and agreement now at laft he was contented to take reftion, and be conferred withall about the random of as many as were feamen within the Town. And it was covenanted between him and them that they fhould pay for their redemption seven tunnes of gold a piece, So upon faithful promise made, and security given, they yielded themelves: and were kept bound in pri un in all five hundred and feventy in garrison the one half well near, were either by word or hunger confirmed: All the reft, together with their Prefet Marqius, [one who a-foetime had been a frib or Nofirer] returned fate unto Prenefe. In memorial and testimony of this his Statue was erected in the market place of Prenefe, armed in his cufljafe, clad in a long robe, with his head covered: and three other images, with a title or inscription engraven in a plate of Prras, with this tenor: That Marqius had made a vow for the fouldiers who lay in gar-

Grifon with him at Caffinum. And the fame tite alfo was engraven under three other images, let up in the Temple of Fortuna. The Town of Caffinum was reftor'd again to the Campans, with a strong garrison of 700 fouldiers, deducted out of the army of Annibai: for fear left when he was departed once from thence, the Romans shou'd affail them.

The Senate of Rome by vortce of a decree, granted unto those fouldiers of Prenefe double wages, with five years vacation & reft from warfare, And when to gratifie them rather for their valiant service, they made offer unto them of the Burgftle and freedom of Rome, they chofe rather to remain still at home, and would not change their own Country. But what befell unto the Pe-ruins, ruins, is not recorded so plainly: for neither appeareth evidence by any publike monument and if memoriall of their own, nor yet decyee extant of the Romans. At the same time the Petellins (who alone of all the Bruttii remained in friendship and amity with the Romans) were assaulted not only by the Carthagianus: (that were possessed of a great part of the Country about them) but also by the other Bruttii with whom they would not joyn in the compott of their rebellion.

The Petellins not able of themselves to hold out and endure these dangers, sent their Embassa-dors to Rome, to crave their aid and assistance: whole humble prayers and piteous tears (for after an answer receiv'd. That they should provide and shift for themselves; they fell into inamenable mens and complaints, and lay prostrate upon the earth, before the porch of the Councill-House) wrought exceeding compassion and pity in the hearts of the Senators, and also of the people: whereupon the LL, were moved again the second time, by M, Æmilius the Praetor, to deliver their opinion. And when they had cast all about, and well weighed and considered their present state, and what they were able to do: being forced to confess, that it lay not in their power to help their Allies: so far distant and remote from them: they willed them to repair home again; and in case they had performed their fidelity to the full, according to covenant, they gave them leave in this calamity of their: to take that course that they thought best for themselves.
When they were returned with this answer unto the Petellins, their Senat all on a sudden was shaken into such terror, despair, and consternation: that some of them were of mind, and gave advice, to abandon the City, and fly every man wherefor they could: others were of opinion and persuaded, that leesing they were solicen of their old friends they should joyn with the other Bruttii, and by their means, turn to Amicall, and come under his protection. Howbeit, a third side prevailed, who would in no wise that anything should be done over hastily and rashly: but that they might meet again, and in counsel to consider the matter. And so it was put off, and respite given until the next day. Then, after more mature deliberation, and their former intent somewhat alwigned, the principal personages there assembled grew to this resolution, namely, To convey all things out of the Territory about them into the City, and to fortifie both it and the walls.
Near about one and the same time, there came Postes with Packets of Letters to Rome, from out of Sicily and Sardinia. Thes out of Sicily from Otho, the Vice-Praetor, were read first in the Senat-House importing the news: That L.Prunius the Praetor was come out of Africa, and with his fleet arrived at Libanus: himsel observed, dying at point of death: that neithefoudlers, nor sailers, nor mariners, had their money or corn duly paid at the day: neither indeed was there any to be had. for to keep their mouth and maintaine moving and adorning them earnestly to send up thereof with all on eniectoped: and if they thought good, one alto of the new chosen Praetors to succeed after him. To the same effect in manner wrote Cornel, Marminda, the Pro-Praetor, out of Sardinia, touchting that point of money and corn. Anwser was returned to the one and the other. That they had it not, and therefore they were to look themselves both to their Armados and Armies. and to provide for them. Otho, which addressed Embassa-dors unto K. Hiero (the only refuge and stay of us) that the people of Rome had receiv'd for foole: they pay, as much silver as was needfull, and corn to serve months. The confederate Cities M likewise in Sardinia contributed liberally unto Cornibus, and serv'd their turn. At Rome also for want of silver, there were (by a law publish'd by M. Minucius, Tribune of the Commons) created three Bankers, called Triumvirii Mercatoris, to wit L. Æmilius, who had been Conful and Censor; M. Attelius Regulans, and L. Sestius Libo, a Tribune of the Commons for the time being. Two Duumvirs also were chosen, M. and C. Attelius, who dedicated the Temple of Concord. which L. Moltius Praetor had vowed before. Three High Priests also were consecrated Q. Cato, M. Metellus Q. Fabius M. e., and Q. Fabius F. Lucius, all to supply the rooms of P.
Seuatianus late deceased; so L. Æmilius Pa. but the Consul, and Q. Ælius Pius, staid both in the journey of Conors.
Now when as the LL of the Senat had fulfilleth other wants and made up all deceies and breac-ches, which fortune by continuall calamities and offces had wrought and brought them on, so far forth as by any wisdom and policy of man, they could provide for: at length they had respect and regard unto them selves also, even to the delineate estate of the Coun-ill-House and the unfrequent number of Senators assembling to the publike Counill of the City. For soe that L. Æmilius and C. I. Minucius were Censors, there had been hofen no new Senators with out standing that in five yeares space, what with unorinate battels, and what with other particular chances; so many of them had miscarried. And when M. Æmilius the Praetor in the absence of the Dictator (who after the los of Cato was now gone again to the holt) had at the request of them all, propounded this matter; then S. Cato, after he had in long oration complained, not only of the penury, but also of the small choice of thole Citizens, who were capable of Senators dignity, spake unto the point, and said. "That he held it a matter of good importance both for the full repairing and reforming of the decayed body of the Senat, as also for to bind the Latine Nation in a more stong bond of amity, that two Senators out of every State of the Latines (if the LL of the Senat of Rome would agree unto it) should be enfranchis'd Citizens of Rome, and taken into the Senat in place of thole that were deceased. This opinion of his the LL of the Senate would behe with no better ease than in times pstr they accepted the motion and demand of the Latines themselves in that behalf, and there being throughout the whole House a great muttering
A mattering, for very indignation and disdain of those his words, Manusius above the rest brake out into this speech, and said: 'That they were not all dead, but one man yet was left alive of that house and line, out of which a Consul (when time was) threatened in the Capitol, that he would kill with his own hand, that Latin whom ever he saw sitting in the Council-House of Rome.

With that, Q. Fabius: 'Never was there a thing, quoth he, propounded and mentioned in the Senate-house, in a worse and more unanswerable time, than at this present, when the hearts and affections of our Allies are in wavering, their faith and allegiance so doubtful, the very breaking and broaching of such a matter as this, were enough to let them farther out. And therefore this inconsiderate speech of one foolish vain person, is to be upturned and buried professedly with

B the silence of all men, and never once to be spoken of again. And if ever there were uttered at the Council Table, any secret and mystery, which were to be concealed, this of all other ought most to be kept close, hidden and mothered in oblivion, and reputed never spoken at all. So this matter was daft, and dyed there in the very birth. Then they proceeded and a decree, they decreed for the choosing of Senators, one that had been Consul for a time, and of all those who had been Consuls, and were then living, the most ancient, and the next they gave order, that C. Terentius Varro the Consul should be sent for, to the nomination of that Dictator. Who being returned out of Apulia, leaving the camp there with a good guard, and taking long journeys, until he was come to Rome: the night next following (as the manner was) created by authority of an act of Senat, M. Fabius Bute, Dict. for six months, without a General of Horse. When he was mounted up with his Serjeants to the Refraria, which is the place of public audience, for to make a speech unto the people, he said: 'That he neither allowed of two Dictators at one time, (a precedent never seen and known before) nor yet could take himself for a Dictator, so long as he was without his General of Cavalry. I unlike also (quoth he) that the entire authority and power of Senators, should be put into the hands of one and the fel-line man, twice and that a Dictator should have the rule and government for six months, unless he were created for the managing of wars. And therefore (said he) I will not limit him to gage these things, which fortune, occasion of the times, and necessity have made excessive and beyond all measure powerful. Neither am I minded to depose or displace any of those from his senators dignities, whom C. Flaminius, and L. Aemilius late Consuls, have admitted into the Senate: but only, that a transcript and rehearsal be made of their names, for that I would not have it lie in the power of one man alone, to centre, and give judgement of the same and behavior of a Senator: but this course will I take in substituting new Senators in the room of the dead, that it may appear, and be said: That this Order and degree is preferred before that, and not one person before another. So after that the names of the old Senators were copied out and read, then he chose five into the place of them that were deceased, those who after the time of L. Aemilius and C. Flaminius Consuls, had born any Magistracy of State, and of the chair, and yet were not elected Senators. And as according as they had exercised their office one before another in order of time, so were they chosen fifth Senators in their course. This done, he made a second election of those who had been Aediles, Tribunes, Pretors, or Quelters: and left of all, such as could theiposts taken from the enemies of Rome hanging in their houses: or had been honoured and rewarded with a Cunctar rank.

E Thus after he had with right great approbation and consentment of all men, taken into the Senat 177, forthwith he resigned his office, descended from the pulpit a private man again, discharged and put from him the Serjeants, and came and stood beneath among the other multitude that attended their own private business: trilling out the time for the nonce and purpose, because he would not have the people to leave the common place for to wait upon him. Howbeit, for all that lingering and lay which he made, the peoples affection cooled never the more, and so with a goodly train of men he was accompanied, and conducted home to his house.

The next night following, the Consul returned toward the army, which making the Senate privy and acquainted with his departure, for fear he should have been detained still in the City for the solemn election of new Magistrates. The morrow after the Senate decreed, upon a motion propounded by M. Pompionius the Pretor, to write unto the Dictator, that if he thought it were for the good of the common-wealth, he would together with his General of the Cavalry, and M. Marcellus the Pretor, repair to Rome to burglarize and choose new Consuls, to the end that when they were all together in place, the LL. of the Senate might by them take knowledge in what state the Common-wealth stood, and conclude how to provide for every thing. They all came that were sent for accordingly, leaving behind them their Lieutenants for the government and conduct of the Legions. The Dictator spake of himself but little, and with much modestly, affirming the greatest part of the honor unto T. Sempronius Gracchus, and then summoned the general assembly for the election in which were chosen Coll. L. Poillinus the third time (who then was absent, and as L. Deputy ruled the Province of Gallia) and T. Sempronius Gracchus, whose that time commanded the Cavalry, and repaired to Rome with speed. Then were elected Pretors M. Valerius Lovius, Ap. Claudius Pulcher, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, and Q. M. Q. Sempronius. The Dictator after the choosing of these Magistrates, returned to Theannum, where the army was met: leaving the General of the Horse behind at Rome, to the end that he being to enter into his government, within few days after, might consult with the LL. of the Senat as touching the levy and enrolling new armies against the year ending.
The three and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

While they were in their hostile and deep conferences about these matters, news came of a fresh overthrow: thus was the fortune of that year to heap one calamity in the neck of another: for thus, that L. Pompilius the Consul elected, was himself slain, and the army together with him in Gallic, utterly defeated and destroyed. The manner of which misfortune was this. There were in those parts a wide and huge forest (which the Gauls call Liuna) through which Pompilius was to lead his army. The trees there growing on either hand of the path, the Gauls had done, that they might stand upright of themselves so long as they were not stirred, to being forced never so little, they must needs fall down. Now had Pompilius the conduct of two Roman legions; and of after parts besides, from the high coast of the upper sea, he had enrolled to many soldiers, as that he came into the enemies country 25000 strong. The Gauls who had betrothed themselves in ambush round about the shires of the wood, so soon as the army was all engaged within the firesights of the path, threw from them trees (so guided) which leapt next unto them, and they fell one upon another (standing as they did, so thickly of themselves, and ready to totter and come down on both sides of the way) and in the fall overthrow withal and covered over and over both horse and man, with their armour and muniture, so as scarce ten of them escaped alive. For as most of them were felled and trucken stark dead, either with the books of the trees, or the broken arms and boughs, so the rest of the multitude, affrighted with this unexpected and unhappy accident, were killed by the Gauls that belit all the firesights and passages of the road and of that great number, they took few prisoners, who making towards a bridge standing over the River, were intercepted by the way, and stopped by the enemies that kept the advantage of the bridge in which place Pompilius was slain, for he strived all that ever he could, not to be taken alive.

The spoils of this General Captain, together with the head cut off from the rest of his body, the Boians with great joy and solemnly brought into the Temple that amongst them was reputed most holy and sacred. And after they had etcied the head, as their manner is, they enclosed and garnished the skull with gold, and that served as well for an holy vessel to sacrifice and Divine worship and some festival days, as also for an ordinary drinking vessel for the high Priests, and other Prefets of that Temple. The booty also which the Gauls gained of their enemies, was of no less importance than the victory; for although a great part of the beasts and living creatures was removed and kept to death with the fall of the wall, yet all other things, by reason that nothing was shattered and left by flight, were found wholly on the ground, as the soldiers lay along in that order as they marched.

These wonderful stories were reported, the City was for many days in such fear and perplexity, that all shop windows were shut up, and no shouting at all in the streets throughout, from one end to the other, as if it had been might continually. Then the Senate gave the Aediles in charge to all, about, and command the shops to be let open, and to make no more shriek in the City of publick sorrow and heaviness. Then T. Sempronius assembled a Senate, spake comfortably to the L. of the Council, and exhorted them, that as they were not dismayed with the overthrow and confusion at Canua, so they would not be cast down and daunted with lighter and smaller hopes and calamities. For if it might please the Gods rebelee them, and give them good speed (as they hoped no less) against the Carthaginian enemies and Amulius, the war with the Gauls might without danger and inconvenience either be laid aside clean, or put off and deferred.

As for the revenge of this deceitful practice, it should rest full in the power either of the Immortal Gods, or of the people of Rome, to be performed one time or other. But for the present, they were to consult and resolve concerning Amulius their grand enemy, and to grow to some point and conclusion of such forces as were meet for that war. And first himself discoursed and laid down what companies of foot and Horse, what number of citizens, and how many confederates were in the army of the Dictator. After him, Marcellus shewed and recounted the proportion of his own power and their strength. Also, what forces, and of what quality, were with C. Terentius the Consul in Apulia, they were required to declare, who might speak upon their knowledge. Then they proceeded to cast and examine, whether two Consular armies well appointed and furnished, were sufficient to go through and to greatness. Thus for that year, they let Franse alone, albeit they had good cause to be angry, and were provoked that way to follow revenge.
The Dictator his army, was appointed unto the Consul. As for the forces under the leading of Marcellus, confitting of them that fled out of the field at Canua, those they ordained to be sent over into Sicily, there to remain in service so long as the war continued in Italy: and that thither also should be polshed out of the Dictator his Legions, all those soldiers who were able to do much service, there to abide in foordure, without any other limitation of time than that which the Laws in that case provide for. For the other Conul, who should be substituted in stead of L. Pompilius, there were alligned two Legions of Roman Citizens: and order was given, so soon as the Aediles would permit, he should be elected with speed. Likewise it was agreed upon and ordered, to tend for two legions besides out of Sicily: out of which, the Coll. utque whom those Legions aboved the City were allotted, should take what soldiers he thought needful.
Finally, C. Terentius the Conul, had his commission of command continued for another year, without empowering one for of the army, which he had in his conduct for the guard and defence of

Amids these affairs and preparations in Italy, the war went forward nevertheless in Spain, and ever to that day proceeded on the Romans side. F. and C. Scipios divided their forces so,
A. as Cæ. should serve by Land, and Publius at Sea with the Navy. Africulbus, the chief Colonel and Commander there of the Carthaginians, distrusting his own strength both by Sea and Land, kept himself aloof, and far from the enemy, in sure places of safety; unto whom, after long huit and instant prayers, were sent 4000 foot, and 500 horse out of Affrict for supply. Having thus at length, with new helps gathered fresh hope, he encamped nearer to his enemy, and gave order and direction withall, that the Armado should be rigged and decked for the defence of the Islands, and the Sea-coasts. And whiles he was thus beginning hotly to make war again, he was suddenly dis tempered and disquieted with the revolt of the Admirals and great Captains of the Navy; who for their fearful abandoning of the fleet upon Ilerus, having been sharply checked and rebuked, were never after truly and lure, either to the Colonel himself, or to the State of Carthage. These nefte reforms had first practised to raise troubles and insurrections in the Land of the Carpentis, and by their soliciting and instigation, certain Cities were procured to rebel, and one of them they had forced byault. Whereupon, Africulbus turned his forces from the Romans, and then sent wholly against that Nation: and with a cruel army entering the frontiers of the enemies, determined to give the charge upon G.ibus, a Nobleman and renowned thief of the Carpentis, even before the City, that some time before was left, where the said Gibus with a puissant power kept himself strongly evencamped. Having therefore sent out before, certain van-carriers lightly armed, to sustain and draw the enemies to skirmish, he made out withal certain Companies of his Infantry, train ways to over-run and spoil the country, and likewise to catch up and meet with all flaglers, dispersed in the fields. Whereupon, at one time there was a skirmish before the camp: and likewise in the fields, they were either thin, or put to flight. But afterwards, having by divers ways from all parts recovered again the camp, suddenly they shaked off all fear, plucked up their hearts, and thought themselves good enough, not only to defend their fort and hold, but also to bid the enemy battle. They filled out therefore of the camp in good array, shouting, dancing, and hopping after their manner so as this unexpected boldness and courage of theirs terrified the enemies, who a little before had challenged them to fight. Whereupon Africulbus himself withdrew and retired his power for more security to an hill of good height, and for that advantage, with a River likewise between him and his enemies. The light armed van-carriers also, and the forlorn hope, together with the Horiemen that rode at taking abroad, he caused thither to repair for their better safety, and because he trusted neither till nor river, he fortified himself with a trench and rampier besides. In this alteration and incredible fear on both sides, there passed some bickermets: and blows were dealt between. In which, neither the Numidian Horiemen were able to match the Spaniards in that kind: nor the Moros archers could make their part good with the light Carpentis targetiers, who in nimbleness and swiftness were as good as they; and for courage and bodily strength far better. These Carpentis seeing they neither could provoke Africulbus to a battle with all their bravery hard under his camp, nor yet easily by assault win it, they took by force the City Aflea, into which Africulbus when he first invaded the Frontiers of his enemies, had conveyed store of corn and other victuals: yeas, and became the country thereof. And they grew so lusty and audacious, that neither in their match nor within their camp they would be mused and order ed by any means command. This sanguine and careless negligence of their, when Africulbus perceived to arise (as usually it doth) upon good success and prosperity: after an exhortation made to his foudiers, to charge upon the enemies, roving abroad without their colours, he descended from the hill, and marched in battalay array against the camp. So soon as the Spaniards were advertised by the one who came in great haste and fled from the Sentinels and corporde guard that he was coming, and near at hand, with a great outcry they gave the alarm. And as every man could get weapon in hand they ran upon the head to battle, without direction and commandment of Captain without signal, ensign, and order, confusedly. When the formall in the vanguard were joyned in conflict and came to hand-fight, some of their fellows were seen running on heaps and by F troops, and others were not well come forth of the camp: At the first the enemy was terrified with their bold adventure, Afterwards as they encountered thin and loosely stood with the enemies thick and closely ranged together, seeming themself very weak, and not sufficient, so few in number to defend themselves, they looked back one upon another for succours: and being on every side put back, and forced to retire and lose ground, they call themselves into a ring, and thus thrust (as they were) close together body to body and arm to arm with, they were so pent and pestered in so narrow a ground, that they had scarce room enough to wield their weapons; so they were compell'd and environed round with the enemy, and for a good part of the day, were in peaces and muffled, some few of them that brake through by dint of sword, escaped to the woods and mountains: With like fear the camp was abandoned: and the day following, G the whole nation yeelded, and came under the subjection of the Carthaginians.

Long they continued not quiet. For within a while news came from Carthage, that Africulbus should make what speed he could with his army into Italy. Which rumour being blown abroad through Spain, turned in manner all their hearts away unto the Romans. Whereupon Africulbus addressed his Letters immediately to Carthage, shewing what hurt the fame of his departure had done already; and in case he should let forward on his journey, and go out of those parts, all Spain would turn to the Romans; before he were pass'd the river Ilerus. For over and besides, that he had not strength enough to leave behind for a garrison, nor a sufficient commander in head of himself, the Generals of the Roman armies, who had set foot in Spain, were each of them, as he might hardy make head against them with equal power; and therefore, if they had any regard of Spain, he advised them to send one to promise him with a strong power: for he should have his hands full, and enough to do in the province, fell out things as fortunately as they could. These letters, albeit all at the first fight they greatly troubled the Senate, yet because the Italian affairs seemed of more moment and greater importance, they wrought no alteration in their intended course, either for Africns himself, or his forces. Howbeit Africns was sent with a complete and competent army, and a greater Armado, both for the holding of Spain in their allegiance, and also for their defence by Sea and Land. Who, having passed over with all his power, as well for Land as he had the Sea, fortified his camp, drawn his ships ashore, laid them up in three days, and emplaced them strongly all about; himself in person with his elect and most chieftain of arms, made what haste possibly he could, through nations partly enemies, partly doubtful and distrustful, and stayed not either in one place or other (but evermore standing upon his guard) until he was come to Africns. After that he had declared unto him the order decreed by the Senate, and what he had in commission, and taken himself direction likewise from him, in what manner the war in Spain was to be managed, he returned back again to his own camp, in which voyage he travelled by no one thing more than by speedy expedition, for he was ever gone from a place before the people could agree together, and make head against him. Now Africns before that he dislodged and set his army on foot, in these parts, let him take some money of all the cities and states under his jurisdiction: for well he knew, that Africns had paid him five thousand ducats, for his passage through certain countries: and as well he will besides, that the Gauls he was fain to wage for amongst them no money, no men. And if he undertook and entered upon that great expedition, poor and base of other he had never reached so far as the Alps, Thus having in great haste raised and collected his monies he came down to the river Iberus.

When the Romans heard of the proceedings and detachments of the Carthaginians and like- wise of the journey of Africns; both the Generals (laying all other matters apart) prepared to join their whole forces together, to oppose themselves, and to withstand such intended attempts; supposing and considering, that it Africns (who by himself alone was an enemy to Italy, hardly apposable) were once succeeded by Colonel Africns and the Spanish army, the Empire of Rome would soon be at an end. Upon these cogitations being griefed and perplexed, they assembled all their power near to Iberus; and after they had pushed off over the river and long consid- ered whether they should encamp themselves and abide the coming of the enemies to bid them battle, or be invading and afflicting the associate and subject peoples of the Carthaginians, to till the enemy and hinder his intended journey; they resolved at length and made preparation to af- fant Iberus (to named of the river near by) the richest and most wealthy City at that time, of all others in their parts. Whereof when Africns was advertised he for to help his friends, advanced himself likewise to set upon another City lately yeeded to the Romans, and reduced under their subjection. And the Romans after they had begun to lay siege to Iberus, gave over that enter- prise, and made head against Africns himself. And for some few days they lay incamped five miles further one from the other, and without some light skirmishes; but never came to pitch a fair field. At length upon one and the same day (as if they had been so agreed afore) they happened both sides to set out upon the neck of the island, and to come forth with all their power into the plain ground. The Romans stood arrived in three battalions; one part of the Infantry was placed before the hands in the vanguard, another regiment bellowed behind in the rear-guard: the men of arms flanked the sides like wings. On the other part, Africns strengthened his main bat- tle with Spaniards: in the right point he marshalled the Carthaginians, in the left, the Africans. As for the auxiliar and mercenary Hostmen, whom he waged and hired such as were Numidi- ans, he ordained in all the Carthaginian footmen to guard them: the rest that were Africans, he distributed and disposed about the skirts and edges of the battalions. Neither were all the Numidians placed in the right flank, but such as after the guise and manner of Vankers, led two lines of Horces apiece, and used often times in the midst of the hottest conflict, to leap armed as they were from their wearied horse, to another fresh one. So nimble are they themselves, and so trac- cible and well taught to their hands are their Horces. Thus staid they stretched on both sides in order of battle, The Captains of either part for hopes in manner nothing unequal; for neither in number or quality of loudiers was there any great odds between them: Mary, for courage and heart, there was great difference and inequality in the loudiers themselves. For the Romans (notwithstanding they fought far from home) were so persuaded by their leaders, that they fought for Italy and the City of Rome, and therefore as if the whole hope of their late return into their country, were to be tried and decided in this one battle, they resolved either to win the day or to dye for it. On the other side, the loudiers were not so resolved, for most of them being Spani- iards, would have chosen rather to be conquered and overcome in Spain, than with conquest and victory to be drawn into Italy. And therefore at the first shock, when fearlessly the darts and javelins were fired and let fly, their main battle retreated: and so soon as the Romans with great violence redoubled the charge, they turned their backs and fled. Howbeit in both hands the fight was not so hard, The Carthaginians on the one side, the Africans on the other, charged the Romans very hard, and fought sore against them, as if they had them invironed round about within their battalions. But when as the whole power of the Romans were once raidied and gath- ered
A red together in the minds, they were strong enough to remove, and let back the wings of the enemies. So they maintained high in two divers places at once. But both in the one and the other, the Romans (after they had discomfited the main battal in the minds) were no doubt, much better, as well in number, and also in strength and vigour of men. Many a tall fellow was there slain.

And had not the Spaniards at the first when the battle was fiercely begun, been soon as by heaps, very few of the whole battle had escaped and remained alive, The Horsemens fought little or not at all. For the Moors and Numidians, to whom as they espied the battle to fly inland and boldly pretend all on a dead man filled as tall as they could, and left the tails and flanks of the last battle naked, driving afore them the Elephants within. And even after the them, who maintained the skirmish to the very half, escaped with some few out of the thickest battle and execution. The Romans took their camp and railed it. This battle was of much import, and consequence, that it cau led all the Spaniards, who were before out wakening to turn wholly to the Roman grand left after not at all, to pass with his forces into Italy, nor in much as to make wars with Spain. The news hercule being branded abroad and sent to Rome by the letters of the two Scipio's, great joy there was, not too much for the victory, as because after naval was tied by the foot, and halted for coming into Italy.

Amidst these exploits in Spain, * Peticia (a City of the Bruti having ended the siege and many assaults for certain months) was finally won by * M. Valerianus, one of Annual Captains. But that victory cost the Carthaginians much blood, and many a thousand wounded. No force nor violence overcame the besieged Peticians more, than very laurine. For having continued and carried up all kinds of corn, all sorts of four hooved beasts whatsoever; they were driven as length to feed and living on the flocks, fowls, weeds, and roots, tender barks of trees, and the crops of hiers and berries; and they gave not over to long as they were able to stand on their legs upon the walls, and bear their armour. * After the winning of Peticia, conducted his army against * Cornelia, which being not so valiantly defended, was within few days surrendered up into his hands. Near about the same time, a power of the Bruti also, laid siege unto Crotos, a City built and inhabited by the Greeks, and in times past, mighty in men and munition: but now at this time so dilapidated with manif ol and grievous calamities, that of all ages one with another, they were not able to make any D thousand men. And therefore no marvial, if the enemies were few matter of the City, being to be definite as it was of Citizens to defend it. Only the Caile they kept till, into which there were some that escaped in that tumult when the City was taken, out of the mids of the multitude. The Locrians likewise revolted unto the Bruti and the Carthaginians, by reason that the common multitude were fraudulently betrayed by the chief and principal citizens. The Rhinones only of all that country, continued both true unto the Romans, and also at their own liberty to the very last. The same disposition to revolt, was to be seen even in Sicily, to further much as the very honie of * Hiero was not clear and free in all parts from rebellion. For * Seleucus his eldest son, having in contempt both the olde age of his father, and also (after the overthrow of Caunus) the society and friendship of the Romans, turned unto the Carthaginians. And he had, no doubt, made a general alteration in Sicily, but that his death came between and cut him off; which hap made him jump, even when he was arming the multitude, and soliciting his friends to rebellion, that his very father himself was drawn into deep fulmination that he took his life away. There were the occurrences that fell out that year with variable events, in Italy, Africa, Sicily, and Spain.

In the end of the same year, * Q. Fabius Maximus moved the Senat, and made request, that the Temple of Venus Horatia, which he had vowed being Dictator, might now be dedicated. And the Senat made a decree. That * Titus Semp onius, Consul elect, should to soon as he was enter ted into his office, propose unto the people, that they would create two Duxes for the dedication of Temples. And in honour of * Aemilius Lepidus, who had been Consul twice, and Augustus, his three sons, * Lucius, Marcus, and Quintus, exhibited certain funeral games for three days space; and a sheen in the Common place likewise for three days together, of two and twenty pair of tawder-fencers, to fight at thirp to the death. The Curiae * Aediliae, * C. Leius, and T. Semp onius Gracchus, now Consul elect, who in his * Aedilship had been General of the Horsemens, let out the Roman games, which were renewed and continued till for three days. Likewise, the Plays of the Commons, were twice exhibited by M. * Aemilius Cotta, and M. Claudius Marcellus. Now about three years expired of the Punie war, T. Semp onius the Consul, began his government upon the * Isles of Marsch. As for the Praetors, * Q. Fulvius Flaccus, who had afore-time been Consul and Centor, obtained by lot the jurisdiction of the Citizens; and * M. Valerius Corvinus, of the strangers and aliens. To Appius Claudius Pulcher was allotted the government of Sicily: and to * Q. M. Octavius Scævola of Sardinia. M. Marcellus was by the people allowed to have the authority of a Vice Consul, in regard that he above all the Roman Captains, after the defeat of Caunus, managed his affairs and warred prosperously in Italy.

Now the very first day that the Senat was assembled in the Capitol, they decreed upon the first motion, that within the compasse of that year, there should be levied a double tax or tribute: and that one single tribute should be forthwith gathered, for present pay to all the soldiers, saving those that served at Caunus. Then concerning the armies this order was set down: * L. Scævola, that T. Semp onius the Consul, should appoint the two legions of Citizens a certain day to meet at Cales. Item, that six legions should be conducted to the camp of Claudius above easfts. Item, that the legions which there were (and those consigned for the most part of the side of the Cannian army) Ap. Claudius Pulcher the Praetor, should put over Sea into Sicily: and for those that were in Sicily, they should be transported to Rome. Item, unto that army which was appointed to meet by a day at Cales, M. Claudius Marcellus was sent for and he was commanded to conduct the legions of the Citizens to the camp of Claudius. Last of all, to receive the charge of the old army, and to lead in into Sicily, T. Metellus Crassus Lieutenant, was sent by Ap.

Claudius. Men looked at first, and yet they said nothing, that the Consul should call an assembly for the creating of a Colleague unto him. But after that they saw that M. Marcellus was sent out to the way (as it was of purpose) whom above all others they were desirous to be the Consul for that year, in regard of his notable good service whilst he was Praetor, there arose much mattering in the Senate, which the Consul perceiving: "My L. L. quoth he, it was for the good of the Commonwealth, that both M. Claudius should go into Camps to exchange the armies:

and also that the Electoral Consuls, should not be proclaimed, until that he were returned again from thence, with dispatch of that business which he had in charge: that ye might have a Con-ful, such a one as the present condition of the State required, and your selves most desired. So there was no more speech of the election, until Marcellus was come back again. In this mean time were two Deputies created, Q. Fabius Maximus for the dedication of one Chappel to Venus Erycina, and T. Obellinus Craft, of another to the Goddess Mem. Both land upon the Capitol Hill divided slander no more than with one only conduct of water passing between. And as concerning the three hundred Campari Horsemen, who had served out their full time of warfare faithfully, and came to Rome, a motion was propounded to the people, that they should be enterried Citizens of Rome: and in like manner, that they should be reputed as free Denizens of Rome, from the day that the Cannians revolted from the people of Rome and rebelled. The chiefest cause of proposing this act, was this, because themselves denied firstly that they knew, to whom they did appertain, thinking they had abandoned their old native country: and as yet were not enrolled and incorporated into that state, unto which they had retired. After that Marcellus was come again from the army, the solemn day of election of a Consul in place of f.

Ppfevmm, was published. And with exceeding great content of all men, Marcellus was chosen: and forthwith he was to begin his Magistracy. At whole that entrance, it happened to thunder: and the Augurs being called to give their opinion of it, pronounced, that they thought he was not rightfully created. And the Senators gave it one commonly and bluntly abroad, that the Gods were not well pleased therewith, because (tertio) two Coli, were elected of the commonalty (a thing never seen before.) Whereupon M. Marcellus resigned his place, and his house was intublated Fabius Max. the third time.

That year the Sea burned. At Scuttia a cow brought forth a horse folke. And at Larvinum in the Temple of Luno Hospita, certain llamas or images dropt with blood: and about that Temple it rained flowers. For which shows, there was told manifestly, according to the cuttable m"dnner, a Novennial feesth. The other prodigious signs likewise were expat with great care and heed-ful regard. The Consuls then, parted their armies between them. Fabius took charge of those forces which had been commanded by f. Junius the Dictator. Sempronius had the conduct of all the voluntary loudners, and besides of 25000 of Auxiliaries sent from the confederates, M. Va-levco the Praetor had the legions appointed for him, that were returned out of Sicily. M. Claudius the Vice-consul, was sent unto that army, which lay in garion at Neda, above Sestius. And the Pretors took their journey into Sicily and Sardina. The Consuls, whenever they could assemble the Scour, proclaimed that the Senators, and all others that had lawful authority to speak their mind and deliver their opinion in the Council-House, should meet at the gate Capite. The Pretors, those that were Judges in the Court, and to whom the civil jurisdiction appertained, enrolled their Tribunal seats and places of Affizies at the publick Bath-pond, and thither they commanded all writs to be returned, and appearance there to be made. And for that year all pleas and judgements of causes passed there.

In this mean time news came to Carthage (from whence Mago the brother of Him was minded to transport and set over into Italy 12000 footmen, and 1500 horsemen, 20 Elephants, and 1000 talents of silver, together with a guard and supply of 60 galleys.) That in Spain things were untowardly: and that all the Cities of Spain (in a manner) were revolted into the Romans. Some there were of opinion, to withdraw Mago with that fleet and power of his, from the enterprize of Italy into Spain. Considering there was good hope shewed of a sadden, recover again Sardinnia, for that there was but a small power of Romans there: and Cornwallis the old Lord Deputy, well acquainted with the State of the Province, was now upon his departure from thence, and a new expected in his turn. Over and besides, that the Sardinians were weary already of the Romans government, which they had so long endured, as who the year that pait was, had tyrannised over them cruelly, and exercised their authority with oppression, covetously impizing upon them hard exactions and tribute, and levying of them a most unjust taxation and contribution of coin:

and finally they wanted nothing but an hand, upon whom they might relieve themselves. To this effect there was an Embassage sent secretly from the Lords and Princes of the Island. And the principles actor and procurer hereof, was Herfieres, a man in those days of greatest authority and power among them. Upon these tidings aforesaid, happening to just at one time, they were both A. disquieted and also refreshed. So they sent Mago with his fleet, and other forces into Spain: and they chose for the expedition into Sardinia, Africanus, termed Calavium, for the L. General, furnished and appointed with a great power almost, as Mago had.

At Rome likewise, the Consuls having dispatched the affairs of the City, directed themselves to the war. T. Sypprovius appointed Sinneius to be the Rendezvous, where the soldiers should meet at certain day. And Q. Fabius, by an order and direction from the Senate, made an Edict, that all men should before the first day of Ides next coming, gather all their corn out of the countries, and convey the same into the principal walled strong towns: pretending that whatever did not accordingly, their fields he would lay waste; fell on the terrains in part idle at the Iper, and let their farms and villages a fire. Not so much as the Pretors themselves (created for civil jurisdiction, and to decide law matters) were freed and exempted from the conduct of war. As for Varus, the Pretor, he was appointed to go into Apulia, to receive the army of the Thagiones, and when the legion were returned out of Sicily, to employ them especially for the guard and defence of that country; and that the army of the Ligures should, with some of the Lieutenants, and M. Fulvius had as fail allowed him, to keep and defend all the sea coasts between * Brundisium and * Tarentum. The like number of ships was assigned to Q. Fulvius; the City Pretor, for to guard the River Sida, near adjoining to the City of Rome. C. Terentius, the Pretor, had in charge to take up by commotion soldiers in the Punic country, and to guard those quarters. And T. Q. Valerius Graffius, after that he had dedicated the Temple of Men in the Capitol, was sent into Sicily, as Lord Admiral of the Armada there.

Upon this war between two of the mightiest Cities, and most profuse states of the World, there was not a King and Prince nor a Nation under Heaven that was unmoved. Among whom Philip King of the Macedonians, had an eye thereon, and was more intirely, in that he was nearer unto Italy, and only divided from thence by the Ionian Sea. He at the first, when the beaten came to his ears, that Amball was palled beyond the Alps; as he joyed much, that there was war kindled between the Romans and the Carthaginians, so, as long as it was uncertain, whether nation was the stronger, he was apt in mind and was in suspense, whether of the two he should wish to have the victory. But after that he heard once, that in three several battles one after another, Amball and the Carthaginians had gained the better hand, he declined to the fortunate side, and sent Embassadors unto Amball: who falling off, and detiring to avoid the Havens of Brundisium and Tarentum, which were guarded and kept by the Romans fleet, arrived and landed at the Temple of Juno Lucina: and so through Apulia, travelling toward Cannus, chanced to light upon the masts of the Romans warship, and were brought before M. Varus Leumis, the Lord Deputy, being then encamped before Nuceria. Where Xenophos, the principal of the Embassadors, bathed not to lay, that he was sent from King Philip, to treat and conclude a league and amity with the people of Rome, and had commission and direction to the Consuls, to the Senate likewise and people of Rome, to that effect. Varus taking great content to bear this new society and friendship with so noble a King, especially upon the rebellion of so many old allies, courteously intreated and friendly entertained this falls hearted enemy, in need of friendly friend and appointed service to accompany him forward, to dierve him carefully in the ways, and to shew him what places, what pavilions and sitterights were held and kept, either by the Romans, or the enemies. Xenophons with these instructions passed through the midst of the Roman guards, and to the next way arrived at the camp of Amball, and made a league and amity with him, under their conditions and stipulations. T. Sypprovius, that King Philip should with a light fleet Armada (for that he was impedied yet to fer to 200 sail) pass over into Italy, wait and spoil all the sea coasts; and to his power maintain war by Sea and Land. Item, That when the war was finished, all Italy, together with the very City of Rome should be partitioned by the Carthaginians and Amball, and unto him all the pillage and booty likewise would belong. Item, When Italy was thus freed, that they should fall into Greece and wage war with what Princes there they pleased, and that all the Cities of the main, and the Islands was left to Macedonia, should fall unto Philip, and be annexed to his Kingdom. In these terms, and upon these Articles, in manner, was the league concluded and confirmed between the General Amball, and the Embassadors of the Macedonians: and with them they were sent back unto the King for the better ratifying of the said covenants, certain Legates, to wit, Grasso, befor, and Mago, who arrived together at the same Temple storeaid, of Juno Lucina, where there did closely a ship anchor, expecting their return. From whence being departed, they were not to food lanced out into the deep, and had taken the open sea, but they were deterred by the Roman fleet that guarded the coasts of Calcabria. Q. Fulvius Flaccus made out certain Coreys, to pursue and fetch in that ship. Where upon, the Macedonians began to flee, but leaving themselves overmatched in twinitness of sail, and not able to make way with them, they yielded themselves unto the Romans, and were presented unto the Admiral; Who demanded what they were, from whence they came, and whither they were bound. Xenophons who had already been too well by making of a lye, began to cog again, and lay, that he was sent from Philip unto the Romans; that he came unto M. Varus, because to him only he was able to pass in safety, but could not possibly get beyond Cannus, being too strongly kept with vigour of the enemies. But afterwars, upon the flight of the Carthaginian habit and apparel, they began toulpert the Embassadors of Amball: and they were questioned whither, their speech and language betrayed them. Then was their retinue taken apart, and threatened to confests. Letters also were found upon them, sent from Antiobal unto Philip, concerning the peace between the king of the Macedonians and Antiobal. Upon these matters thus detected and certainly known, it was thought good to convey the ambassadors and their company with all speed prisoners to Rome, unto the Senate there, or unto the Consuls whereover they were. To this purpose were chosen five Pinnacles that were most fit, under the conduct of L. Valerius Antias, who had his direction and charge to part the said ambassadors in several ships, and keep them thence afield: and to take good heed, that they neither talked nor conferred together.

About the same time it happened at Rome, that As. Cornelius Mammallus, upon his departure out of the Province Sardinia, made report in what state the land stood: namely, that they all were chidden to rebellion and war; that Marius, who succeeded after him, pretend upon his first coming, by vexation of the ill air and unwholesome water, was fallen into a sickness, not to quick and dangerous, as chronic and tedious, and would not be able long to endure the service of war: that the army there, as it was sufficient to guard and keep in good order a quiet and peaceable Province, so it could not hold out with the war that was like to ensue. Whereupon the LL. of the Senate gave order, that Q. Fabius Flaccus should levy and enrol 3000 foot, and 400 horse, and provide that this legion should pass over with all speed into Sardinia, and fend there with whom it pleased him to conduct and manage the war until Marius were recovered of his disease. For this intent was T. Marullus Torquatus sent Governor; one, who had been twice Consul and Censor, and in his Confulship subdued the Sardinians.

Near about the same time, there was an Atmado sent out from Carthage unto Sardinia, under the leading of Aferusbal (unnamed Calus, and being sore toiled and beaten with tempests, was cast upon the Balear islands: where (in far out of order was not only the ship-tackling, but also the very keels and bodies of the ships to shaken) they drew up the ships to shore, and whiles they lay there about calling and ruminating them again, they spent much time.

In Italy whiles the wars began to flake and was cold, by reason that after the battle of Cumae, the strength of the one part was much abated, and their force decayed, and the courage of the other, well arrayed and made effeminate: the Campians upon their own heads began to contrive, how to reduce the State of Campania under their obedience, first soliciting them to retreat from the Romans: and seeing that course would not speed and take effect, they deviled by a fraudulent parade to compass and entrap them. The Campians use yeatically to solemnize a festival and sacrifice in a certain place called Almate: and they gave notice unto the Cumians, that the whole Senate of Campania would refer their matter: requesting the Senat of Cumae likewise to meet them there, for to confer and consult together in common, how both Cities, the one and the other, might have the same friends and the same enemies, and no other: giving them wuthal to understand, that they minded there to have a good guard about them of armed men, for fear of some f Gdańsk and dangerous attempt from the Romans. The Cumians, albeit they suspected some treachery, denied nothing, supposing thereby to colour an covert their own crafty intended designment. Now all this while, T. Sempronius the Roman Consul, having invered, and parcell his army at Sinusina, at which place he had made proclamation, that his forces should meet together: passed over the river Vulturna, and encamped near unto Linum: where because the Sounder's in the standing camp had nothing else to do, he exercised them to march on the race and skirmish in array, to the end that the raw Sounder's (for such were the voluntaries for the main part) might by use and practice learn how to follow their colours in good order, and in the time of battle know their own ranks and ensigns. In these kinds of training, the special care that the General had, and the only thing that he aimed at, was their concord and good agreement. And for this purpose, he charged the Lieutenants, and the Colonels and Captains, that they should not call in any man's teeth one or other, their fortune and condition aforetime, whereby to breed any discord and heartburning among the companies: and that the old experienced Sounder's should suffer themselves not be equal in estate to the new learners; and those that were born free unto the voluntaries, who had been slaves: reputing them all of birth good enough, and of gentle blood descended, unto whom the people of Rome had vouchsafed to commit their armor and ensigns: laying, that the same fortune which had driven them to do, forced them likewise to maintain the same, and make the bell of it, now was done. The Captains were more careful in giving them good lessons and instructions, but the Sounder's were as diligent to observe the same: and within a while their hearts and affections grew to be linked and united together, that they forgot generally, in what degree and of what condition each Sounder entred into service. While Gracchus was busied hereabout, the Embassadors of Campania certified him, what kind of Embassage came unto them from the Campians, a few days before, and what answer they had returned: advertising him that their festival day was to be helden three days after: that not only the whole Senate would be present, but also the camp and army of the Campians. Gracchus having commanded the Cumians to convey all that they had out of the fields and territories about, into their City, and themselves to keep within their walls: himself the day before the solemnity aforesaid of the Campians, removed his power to Cumae, and there incamped. Now Almate is three miles off from thence. The Campians by this time were assembled there in great number, according to appointment: and not far from the place, Marullus Censor the chief head Magistratus of Capua, was incamped closely with fourteen thousand Sounder's. He, with preparation of the sacrifice, and
A and compelling withal, the deceitful train of treachery, was more busy and careful thereabout, than either in fortifying his camp, or in any other military action. Thus for three days continued this festival sacrifice at Hams. And ever in the night lest it was performed: so, as before midnight all was done and finished, Gracchus supposing that a good time for his ambusc to be employed, having let certain warders before the gates, that no man might go forth to give intelligence, caufed the soldiery between the first and tenth hour of the day, [from noon until four of the clock] to refresh themselves and take their sleep: that in the beginning of the dark night, they might assemble together at the watch-word or signal given them. And about the first watch he commanded to display their Ensigns and advance forward: and thus with a full march, he arrived at Hams by midnight; surprised the hold of the Campans, and entered all the gates at once, being negligently guarded, by reason of their overwatching. Some he killed lying along fast asleep; others, as they returned unarmed from the sacrifice. In this night-tumult there were slain more than two thousand, with Marcus Alfius himself their leader: and 43 Ensigns taken and carried away. Gracchus with the loss of fewer than one hundred of his soldiery, having won the camp, retired speedily to Cumae, for fear of Ambibul, who lay in fort encamped upon Tifata over Capna. And (as he was a provident man and of great force) nothing was he deceived in his opinion. For to soon as this defeat was reported at Capna, Ambibul supposing that he should at Hams find the army of the Romans (consisting for the most part of raw soldiery, and their, bandleys) exulted and lusty above measure, and insolent upon their fresh victory, busied himself to rile their dead enemies thus conquered, driving away booties, and charged with pilage removed his forces in Haiti, and marched space beneath Capna: and encountered with some of the Campans who were fled, whom he caufed between two guards to be conducted safe to Capna, and such as were hurt and wounded, to be let in waggons and carried thither. Himself found at Hams the camp empty and void of enemies and nothing there but the tokens of a fresh massacre, and the dead bodies of his friends and allies lying here and there scattered. Somewhere there were that advised him presently to advance forward to Cumae, and to assault the Town. And albeit Ambibul was willing enough thereto, and falling deliberate (seeing he could not come by Naples) to have Cumae on leaf, a maritime port-Town, as well as the other: yet because his soldiery had brought nothing with them but their weapons, as being led forth to march in such haste, he retired back again to his fort and camp upon Tifata. From whence, at the important prayers of the Campans, the day following he furnished himself with all the Ordnance and Ensigns met for the assault of a City, and returned toward Cumae: and having walled the territory thereof, he empeaked himself a mile from the Town. Then Gracchus, more for fame, that he might not seem to leave his associates in such necessity, (who, craved protection and recommended themselves to him, and to the people of Rome) than for any confidence and fruit that he reposed in the strength of his army, stayed in Cumae. Neither Fabius the other Conful, who was called at Calce, duct it his army over the River Visturinus: as having been butifed first at Rome in renewing the Aepices and bird-flights: and after that, troubled also about the fearful prodigius signs which were reported one after another. And when he sought expiation therefor of his sacrifices, the Sooth-sayers made answer and said, That they could not perceive that the Gods were appeased and pacified for all that he did. Thus whiles Fabius upon these occasions was kept back, Sempronius was besieged, yes, and by this time afflicted, with haizicks and engines of batter. One mighty Great Towre of wood was erected against the Town. Against which, the Roman Conful raised another from the very wall somewhat higher than it: for that he used the wall (which of it itself was of good height) instead of a ground-wall, and planted therein strong poles and piles of timber to bear up the forefaid frame. From thence, at first the soldiery within, defended the Town and Walls with stones, with long poles and perches and other instruments to lance against the assailants. But at length, seeing the other turrets coming forward even close to the Town wall, they flung thereon at once much firework, and something matter at which fires the multitude of armed men for fear kept headlong down the turret: and withal, they of the Town fluffed out at two gates at once, discommited the guards of the enemies, and drove them into their camp: so as that day Ambibul was more like one beleaguered himself, than laying siege unto others. There were of Carthaginians slain about fourteen hundred; forty wanting one were taken prisoners alive, such as about the walls and their

Corps de garde. The Carthaginians were careless and negligent, fearing nothing lesseth than a tally out of the Town, and were shuddering at unwares taken and surprised. Gracchus founded the retreat, and cautioned his men to retire within the Walls, before the enemies after their loud call could be rallied together. The morrow after, Ambibul (supposing that the Conful in his toil for this happy hand, would come into the field to fight a last battle) arranged himself in array between his Camp and

Gates. But after that, he saw no fissing at all from the usual guard and defence of the City, and nothing put to the rath of hazard of doubtful hope, he retired to Tifata, without any good at all done.

At the very same time that the siege was raised before Cumae, Titus Sempronius surnamed Longus, fought fortunately in Lucania before Grammenum, with Hanno the Carthaginian: flew more than two thousand of his enemies, lost himself two hundred and eighty men, and went away with 41 Ensigns. Hanno thus driven out of the confines of Lucania, retired himself back into the country of the Bruttii, and M. Fabius the Pretor, recovered by force from the Heppins, three Towns that had revolted from the Romans. Vercellius and Sicelius the movent and Captains of that Rebellion were cut shorter by the head. More than one thousand captives were sold at the speare in port-sale, to whom that would bid most. All the pillage besides was given to the foildiers, and the army brought back to Camat.

While these things hapned in the Countries of the Lucanians and Hirpins, those 5 ships above-said (wherein were embarked the Embassadors of the Macedonians and Carthaginians as prisoners.) having fet a compass from the upper Adriatic Sea unto the nother Sea of Tuscian, round about (in a manner) all the Sea coast of Italy, hapned to fail along neer the City of Camat; and being not certainly known whether they were friends or enemies, Grenceus put forth out of his fleet two Pinaaces to encounter them. When as by demanding and questioning one with another, it was once certified unto them, that the Consul was within Camat, and the ships there arrived in the haven, the prisoners were brought to the presence of the Consul, and all the letters delivered. The Consul after he had read over the letters, both of Philip and Amhulas, feared them up again sure, and lent them by Land unto the Senat of Rome, but commanded the Embassadors themselves to be conducted thither by Sea. When as both letters, and also the Embassadors were arrived at Rome, in a manner, all in one day, and that (after due examination) words and writings agreed together in one: at the skift the LL. of the Senat were sensible and plunged deepely into cares, considering in how great danger they found a new Macedonian war, who were hardly able to endure the Carthaginian. But in conclusion, so far were they off from being utterly dismayed hereat, and sinking under the water, that forthwith they began to treat and debate, how they might dispose to war with these enemies first, and to stop them from their entrance into Italy. The captive Embassadors they laid up in thence; their train and re- turne were sold in open market: and besides the five and twenty ships, whereof Le Filsno or Plac- eus was Admiral, they took order for twenty more to be rigged and decked: which being pro- vided, furnished and shut into the pool afloat, together with those five bare wherein the prisoners were conducted: there were 50 fall in all, that looked from off and arrived at Tarantum. Quintus Fulvius had commision to embark the foildiers of Varro, who had been under the leading of L. Apollus the Lieutenant at Tarantum, with his fleet of sixty sail, not only to defend the Sea-coast of Italy, but also to hearken and have an eye after the Macedonian war, and in case he could learn, that the design and intent of Philip was iterable to those letters and informations of the Embassadors, then he should by his letters certify M. Fulvius the Pretor for so much; and that leaving with L. Apollus his Lieutenant the charge of the army, he should go to the Armado at Tarantum, and with all speed possible let over into Macedo. and there endeavour to keep Philip play at home within his own realm. As for that money which was sent unto Appius Claudius into Sicily, for to be espayed unto King Hiero it was appointed unto him for the maintenance of his Armado, and managing of the Macedonian war. This money was by L. Apollus the Lieutenant brought to Tarantum, and with it, there were sent from Hiero * 200000 Modii of wheat and 100000 of barley.

While these preparations and doings passed at Rome, one ship of those prisoners which were sent to Rome, chance to singe itch from the other's, and to escape away to Philip: whereby M. he was advertised, that the Embassadors or Commissioners were taken, and the letters intercepted. But he not knowing what covenants had past between Amhula and his legates, and what answer they should have brought unto him, sent forth another Embassadors with the same commission. The Embassadors sent unto Amhulas, were Heracleus named Servius, Cicero of Ber- re, and S. Phelus of Magnesia. These went to and fro between in lately, they caried and recar- ried their rounds: and the summer was come and gone, before the King could enter into action, or execute any enterprise. Of so great moment and importance was the boordine of that one ship at the fall with the Embassadors, for the deferred of that imminent war intended against the Romans.

When Fabius had passed over the River Vulsinus, after the expiation of length of the prodi- gious tokens aforesaid, both Consuls together made war about Capua. Fabius by assault won the Cities, Consolistor, Troina, and Afeistia, which had revolted unto the Carthaginians: and within them he surprized the гар Lion foildiers of Amhulas. Many of the Campans likewise were taken prisoners, At Nola (like as in the year before) the Senat held with the Romans, but the Commonalty took part with Amhulas, and plotted secretly, how to murder the Nobility, and to betray the City. But to stop the proceedings of these mischievous deceptions, Fabius led his army between Capua, and the camp of Amhulas upon the hill * Tifata, and fortified himself upon the mountain * Viterbo, in that fort where Claudius had encamped before. From thence he sent M. Marcellus the Vice-Consul with those forces which he had, into Nola, there to lie in garison.

Likewise in Sardinia, T. Manlius the L. Deputy, began to administer those affairs, which had been seised. By occasion that Q. Marus the Pretor was fallen sick, and lay of a long and lingering disea. Manlius after he had drawn the Gallies afore at Cornedis, and put the mariners and rowers in a train for Land-service, and received of the Pretor his army, was able to make 20000 foot and 1700 horse. With this power of men of arms and footmen together, he entered into the enemies country, and not far from the camp of Her came, pitched his tents. Her came himself was by chance gone then, into the country of the Pellidians (a people of Sardinia) to

A man the youth there, for the mending of his strength: and left his son named Hiero, Ruler over the camp in the mean time. He a lusty hot youth, rashly joined battaile, and quickly was discomitted and put to flight: thirty thousand Sardinians in that field were slain, and upon 10,30 taken prisoners alive. The rest of the army first fled stragling about the fields and through the woods; but afterwards, hearing by the voice that went, how their captain was fled to Corinna the head City of that region, they retir'd theri with. And surely they had in that one battaile, made an end of all war in Sardinia, but that the Amado of Carthage, under the leading of Afrasibal (which by tempet rebellion had been cast upon the Balearic islands) came in time to entertain the LIdvanders, in hope to rebeld. Munda there it was notice abroad, that the Carthaginian fleet was arrived, retir'd himself to Corinna: which gave Hiero good opportunity and overture to join with Afrasibal. Who having landed his soldiery and sent the ships back again unto Carthage, were forward by the guidance of Hiero, robbing and spoiling the Lands of the Roman confederats: and had come as far as Corinna; but that Munda with an army encountered him upon the way, and restrained him from to davish over-running and robbing the country. As the first they encamp'd one against the other nor far aunder; afterwards, they began to put out certain bands and companies, and to maintain in light skirmishes with variable event, until at last they pitched a battle and in full battaile fought for the space of 4 hours. The Carthaginians held our confedel a while, and the victory fell remained doubtful (for the Sardinians were ever to have the field) but at last, seeing every quarter full of the Sardinians either lying along dead, or running away, they also were discomitted: and as they turned their backs and were a-run to flee, the Romains welched about with that win, wherewith they had defeated the Sardinians, and enioy'd them round, and so they fell rather to killing then to fighting any longer. 1,000 enemies were there slain of Sardinians and Carthaginians together, about 3700 were taken prisoners, and 27 military enioys won. This was a noble and famous battaile, memorable especially above all, for taking of these prisoners; namely, Afrasibal the L. General, Hanno and Messa, two noble men of Carthage. Meza was of the Barchine house, next of kin and in blood to Afrasibal. Hanno was the filliactor of the Sardinians to rebellion, and no doubt the principal Author of that war. Neither was this field left famous for the overthrow of the chief commanders of the Sardinians: for both Hiero the son of Hiero, was slain in fight; and also Hiero himself, as he fled with a few horsemen, hearing besides other calamities and losses, of the death of his son, in the night time, because he would have no man come between to stop his purposed intents, he kill'd himself. All the rest escaped to the City Corinna, as they had done before, and there as in a place of refuge fought to save themselves. But Munda following the train of his victory, came against it, and within few days was master of it. After this, other Cities all which had revolt'd, and turn'd to Hiero, and the Carthaginians gave hostages, and yielded by composition. And when Munda had levied of them certain money for the soldiery pay and corn likewise; according to the power and ability or treasurs of each of them, he led his army back to Corinna: and there having put the Gallies on the water, and embarked the soldiery that he had brought with him, he fail'd to Rome, and reconnoiterd unto the L, of the Senat, the utter subduing of Sardinia. The money he delivered to the Treasurers, the corn to the Ediles, and the prisoners unto Afrasibal the Pretor.

B. Much about that time, T. Ocatullus the Pretor, having fail'd from Lippeam into Affrick, and wall'd the territory of the Carthaginians, as he was bound from thence and set sail for Sardinia, whither Afrasibal as the news went had lately rool'd over from the Balearic Islands, he met with the Amado returning back into Africk: and after a skirmish made upon the Sea by his soldiery lightly armed, he took therewith seven Gallies with their oars and mariners: the rest for fear were scatter'd, as it had been with a tempest all over the Sea. And it hapned about the same time, that Bemilea with certain companies of soldiery lent from Carthage for a supply and forty Elephants, and good force of natives came to Locris. For the surpising and setting upon him on a sudden, Ap. Claudius leading his army in hault, and mar. hing to Messana under a colour of visiting the Province, went over to Locris with the tide. Now was Romas-pulled already from thence into the Etrurian country to Hanno, and the men of Locris but the gates against the Romans, So Appius, after much ado and preparation, having effect'd nothing, return'd back to Messana. In the same summer, Marcellus made many rodes from Nida (which he held with a garrison) into the Himipan country, and the Sannin, about Catana, and made inch with there, with fire and sword: that they in Sannin called into their fresch remembrance the old losses and overthrow which they had received: whereupon there were lent immediately from both nations embassadors together, unto Afrasibal, who in this wise delivered their speech unto him. "We have been enemies. O Afrasibal to the people of Rome, first of our own selves, and in our own quarrell, so long as our arm and forces were capable to defend us: but after that our hope therein began to fail us, we drew to a side, and took part with King Pyrrhus. And when he forfook us, we accepted of peace for very necessity: wherein we continued for fifty years almon. even until the time that you entred into Italy. Neither was it your prove, virtue and fortune, rather than your singular courtely and benignity extended toward our country-men and fellow citizens (whom being taken prisoners, you releas'd and sent unto us back again) which hath caus'd us to entertain your amity: in so much that to long as you remain our friend, alive and safe, we would not stand in dread of the people of Rome, nor of the very Gods themselves (if..."

A "the Carthaginians than with the Romans. If both Ceff, were with their armies at Nola, they were no more able to match with Annibals, than they were at Cannae: much les might one Pretor with a few raw and new fouldiers hold out and keep Nola against him. And as for the Nolans themselves, it concerned them much more than it did Annibals, to consider, whether he should win Nola by force, or enter upon it by surrender and composition. For to be Lord thereof, he made no doubt, like as he was Master already of Capua and Nuceria. about what odds and difference there is between the state of Capua and of Nuceria, the Nolans know best themselves, who are feated as we were in the mid way between both. But he was to preget to care much un--

B to Nola, what calamities might befall the City, if it were conquered by attaile; rather yet would he give his word and promise, if they would deliver Murensus with his парти, and yield up Nola into Annibals hand, they should themselves, and none but they set down and capitulate later under what conditions they would entertain alliance and friendship with Annibals. To this motion herencius Baffus framed his answer in this fort. For many years already there hath been continual amity between the people of Nola and Nocera, and neither of both to this day hath repented thereof. As for the Nolans themselves, if they had been disposed to turn with the wind, and to change their faith and allegiance, together with their fortune, they would have done it long before this for now it was too late to start & after. If they had minded to yield themselves unto Annibals they would never have sent for a garrison of Romans; but since they were now come to protect and defend them, they had impared & commincated all their ftre with them already, and would take such part, as long as they had an hour to live. This emergent put Annibals clean besides all hope of gaining Nola by treachery. Therefore he beleagurad the town on every side and invested it round like a giardan, to the end, that in one instant he might gibe the atackle on every part of the walls. When Murensus saw him under the walls he let his people out in bated array within the gate and then with a great noise and tumult he suddenly falled out. At their first shock and onset divers of the enemies were beaten down and slain; but after that, they ran from all parts to bate, and were come together with equal forces the fight began to be hot and sharp, and a memorable conflict it had been and few like it but that raised and poured down to fall and with so many storms and tempests, that it parted both the battels, andendid the fight. So that day having with that final skirmish linded their cornage, and left the blood in heat, they retired back the Romans within the City, and the Carthaginians to their Camp. Howbeit of the Carthaginians there were slain, upon the first sally and charge given not above thirty, and of the Romans not one man. This tempestuous shower of rain failed all night long, and continued till, and never gave over until nine of the clock before noon the next day. And therefore, albeit they were sharp set, and their fingers latched on both sides to be a fighting, yet for that day they kept within their hold and strength. So the third day Annibals sent out certain companies into the territory about Nola, for to forrage and fetch in booties, which so soon as Murensus understood, he presently set his men in array, and entred the field, neither was Annibals for his part behind. Now there was a mile distance, or very near between the City and the enemies Camp. In this space between (for all about Nola is plain and champaign) they encountered and jointed battle, E the front that they set up on both sides, red aimed and confused to return unto the fight already began the recess of those cohorts and bands which were gone a forraging into the country. The men of Nola likewise came unto the Romans, and merced their battal: whom Murensus commended for their forwards, and gave them in charge to abide in the rearward to help as occasion served and to carry forth the skirmish they were sent and wounded, and to forbear fight in any case unless they had a signal and token given them by him. The fight was doubtfull, for both the Generals gave encouragement effectually, and also the fouldiers did their best, and fought right manfully. Murensus was content with his men to press hard and drive fipline upon their enemies, when they had despatched nother days ago, who not many dajes put were put to flight and driven from Capua, and who the year before were beaten from Nola under his conduct by other fouldiers saying, "That they were not all there in the field, but many of them gone ranging abroad in the country for to hate booties and get prizes. As for them that fought they were such as were decayed with rioting and following their delights in Cape, as with wine-bibbing in every tavern, where hunting in every Stews and Brothel-house, all the whole winter, were become embled in body larget and waited natry. As for that lively Brergh and vigour of theirs, it was clean gone; the able and lusty bodies were deciided those courageous hearts abated, wherevith they passed over the Pyrenic mountains, and the high cliffs of the Alpi. There remained now nothing but the relics and shadow of those men to fight with, who are scarce able to bear their very armour, to lift up their arms, and carry their own bodies, F adding withal, that Cape was another came unto Annibals; there died his warlike procws, G therefoe, he his military discipline there was the glorious name of former dates buried: there the hope of future time for ever impresse and filled. As Murensus by reproving them and itch like things in his enemies, animated his own fouldiers: so Annibals rebuked his men with more sharp words and bitter checks. "I know there to be (quoth he) the lame arms and weapons, the very lame emigs and tielder which I saw and had at Trebia at Throfynwen, and last of all at Capua. But fully me thinks, when I went to Cape there to winter, I caried with methiser, other manner of fouldiers than I have brought again from thence. Have ye indeed fo much ado to maintain fight with a Roman Lieutenaat, Leader of one only Legion and cornet:

\textit{Ludus}? What is the edge of the sword dull, and the point blunt? Or are your right hands asleep and benumbed? Or what strange and wondrous accident is betwixt you? Ye that were worst, being few in number, to vanquish many are ye now, being many in number, hardly able to withstand and abide the violence of a few? Ye take big, and gave out great brags and grand words, that if any man would lend you you would win \textit{Rome}, that you would. Behold, now a smaller pie of service. Here I would have you prove your strength, and make trial of it your valour. Let us see now, win me \textit{Nola}, a City in the Campian on a plain, distant ded neither with fea nor rock. Out of this to weakly a City, will I be ready to lead you, laden with rich pilage and spoil, whether ye ever will, or follow you, wherewester ye would have me. But nothing availed either his cheerfull words, or his checking rebukes, to encourage and confirm their hearts. For the Carthaginians being forced on every side to retreat, while the Romans grew more and more animated, not only through the comfortable speeches of their own Captains, but also the Nolans themselves, who with their loud shouting in token of their love and affection, enkindled their courage to hot fight turned their backs, and were driven into their hold. And when the Romans were desirous to affait the fame, \textit{Marciall} conducted them to \textit{Nola}, with great joy and congratulation even of the Common there, whose former were more eminend and affected to the Carthaginians. There were of the enemies single that day above one thousand, one hundred were taken prisoners, nineteen military enigns won two Elephants got alive, and four slain in the conflict. Of Romans there were not killed all out one thousand. The morrow after they spent (upon a truce concluded) in having the dead that were slain on both sides. Of the spoils of the enemies \textit{Marciall} made a great fire upon a row pronounced unto \textit{Vulcan}. On the third day, 1,727 horsemen of Numidians and Spaniards, one with another (upon some plea and anger I believe, or else for hope of more liberal entertainment and commodious gain) fled from \textit{Assoli}, and turned to \textit{Marciall} whole valiant and faithful refresh'd, the Romans in very good head ostenlimes during that war. And after the war was ended, the Spaniards in \textit{Spain}, and the Numidians in \textit{Affilia}, in reward of their virtue and power, were endowed with fair lands and large possessions. \textit{Assoli} lent \textit{Homest} back to \textit{Nola} to the Brits, together with the forces that he came with; heimich went to the winning harbours of \textit{Aphus}, and lodged about \textit{Apulis!}

\textit{Quintus F} being so soon as he heard that \textit{Assoli} had taken his way into \textit{Aphus}, conveyed all the coin from \textit{Nola} and \textit{Nepis} into his Camp, which he had pitched above \textit{Stefalia}; and having well fortified the hold, and left there a sufficient garrison to guard the place for that winter time, removed himself nereat \textit{Capua}, and there encamped; and so waited the Campan Territory with fire and sword, that the Campans little trilling (unto their owne forces, were constrained to shut forth of their gates, and fortifire themselves in Camp before the City, in the open plain, Six thousand they were all. That oftentimes they charged their enemies with their horse, and provok'd them to fight. Among many brave men of arms that the Campans had, one \textit{Fabius} named \textit{Turre}, a Citizen of \textit{Capua}, was the worthiest and best horseman of them all, by many degrees: in short, as he served under the Romans, \textit{Clodius} \textit{Aefflius} only, a Citizen of \textit{Rome}, was at a time with him in an ary of good horsemanship and horse service. This \textit{Turre} when he had ridden about the troops of his enemies, calling his eye every way to see if he could spy \textit{Clodius} at all, enquired at length closely, after they were made, where about he was, and made his challenge unto him. That seeing he was went in words to commend with him for valour and prowess; he should now determine the question by the spear-point and dint of sword; and either he deposed of his glorious armour, if he were overcome, or else gain the fame with the victory. Wherewithal being brought into the Camp to \textit{Aphus} his ears, he made no more to do, but went presently to the Conifer, to know whether he might with his good leave and licence out of his rank fight extraordinarily with his enemy that bad him combat. After leave obtained, he armed himself immediately, mounted on horseback, and rode before the enemies \textit{corpus et armis} oftentimes calling upon \textit{Turre} by name, and bidding him come forth to encounter when ever he list. Now were the Romans by this time gone forth of the Camp in great number to behold this combat: the men of \textit{Capua} likewise filled not only the rampart of their hold but also the walls of the City to see this fight. When as they had made some goodly phanorish sore-hand with brave swords and short speaches, to set out the action: they fat spear in roll, and put spurs to horse, and joddled together again. Afterwards, having gotten the liberty of the ground they daliaced one with another, trifling out the time, and making along piece of work of it, without giving or taking wound, then quoth the Campam Knight to the Roman. This will be but a fight of horses, and not of horsemen, unless we ride out of the open plain ground here into this hollow way, where having no such scope to prick out at large we shall soon come to hand gripes, and close together. The word was not to soon spoken, but \textit{Cheor} turned his horse head, and rode into the forefaid way. But \textit{Turre} a former champion...
A champion in word than deed: Oh take heed of all things (quoth he) how you ride a gelding in a ditch: Which grew afterwards to a by-word used among the country people, Claudius at first had rode in and cut up and down a long time in the lane, and never met with his enemy returned again into the open plain: and rating the cowardice of his enemy, with great joy and gratification, rode back as conqueror into the Camp. Some Annals and Chronicles do record and add to this combat of homemen. a strange and wonderful thing (no doubt) if it be true. As by the common opinion it is reputed no less: namely, that when Vercingetorix fled back into the City Claudius followed hard after him in chase, entered with him at one gate standing open, and rode one clear at the other unhurt. To the great wonder and astonishment of the enemies. Upon this the Blanding Camps were quiet on both sides: and the Cœl., removed backward farther off from the City, that the men of Cœl. might row their grounds: neither did he any harm into their fields, before the corn was come up and to well grown that the plade thereof yielded good forrage and food for the horses: which he gathered and brought into the Blanding Camp and hold of Cœl. above Scipio's, and there he built winter harbours for to make his abode. And he gave order to M. Claudius the Vic. Con. to keep still at Nîmes a competent garrison for defence of the City; and to disbar the rest of the soldiers, and feed them to Rome: that they should neither be compass to their Allies, nor chargeable to the Common-weal. Tib. Guardius also whiles he held his Legions from Cuns into Spain. lent M. Venerius the Praetor from thence to Blandinius, with that army which he had at Luceria, commanding him to keep the sea-coast of the C. Scyntessi Country, and to provide for all things necessary against Philip and the Macedonian war.

In the end of this summer wherein these acts were achieved, whereas I have written, there came a packet of Letters from P. and Corel. Scipio, importing how great and how fortunate exploits they had performed in Spain: but there wanted money for pay: and apparel, and corn to serve both soldiers and mariners. And albeit all these things were away, yet as concerning money, if the City Chamber and common Treasure were not stored, they would make some shift to raise it of the Spaniards: but for all the rest, needs it must be sent from Rome: for otherwise neither could they keep the Army together nor hold the Province in their allegiance. When the letters were read there was no man there but acknowledged that they wrote a truth, and demanded that which was reasonable. But they considered withal, what great armies both on land and at sea they maintained: and what a mighty Armada they must prepare and set out anew, in case the Macedonian war went forward. As for Sicyon and Sardinia, which before the war began, paid tribute, were scarce able to find and keep the garrisons, that lay there for the garrisons of the Provinces: and that they were to crue upon their own revenues and tribute for the maintenance of the charge they were at. But as the number of them that paid rent and conferred tribute, was greatly diminished by so great overthrows of the armies, both at the pool Thracianus, and also at Cuneo: to those few that remained if they were burdened with many exactions and payments, should be plagued and undone another way, therefore it was concluded, that unless the Common-weal maintained not herself by her credit and borrowing money, she were not able to be initially Eined by her own wealth and riches. So it was agreed, That Fulvio the Praetor must needs assemble the people together, and lay abroad and declare unto them the necessity and exigency that the Common-weal was driven into, and to exhort all them that had enriched themselves and enriched their living, by renting and taking to farm the revenues and commodities of the City, and should now do good to the Common-weal, for a time, by which they were grown to that wealth, and undertake the provision at a price, and furnish the army in Spain, with all necessaries thereto belonging, to be contented and paid therewith at the first, out of the common Chests, when they were filled with money. Thus the Praetor made declaration of these matters in the open assembly of the people, and withall determined and set down a certain day whenupon he minded to put forth the soldiers livellies and apparel, and corn to be provided for the Spanish Army, and all things else requisite for the mariners. When the day was come, there presented themselves unto him three companies of nineteen men, for to take this bargain. Who made two requests and demands, the one that for that three years next ensuing there should be no other Publicans or farmers of the City; the other that whatsoever they skipped, the Common-weal would make good against all force of enemy or violence of tempest. Both being granted, they took upon them the matter, and so the Common-weal was served by the money of private persons. This was the demanor, this was the losing affection to their country that went through all degrees of men (as it were) after one sort and manner. And likewise they undertook with great courage to serve the army to with so many idle they performed every thing, in such sort, as there was nothing at all wanting no more than if they had been maintained from a rich treasury, as in times past. At what time as this provision came, the town of Thasus was assaulted by Adonial, Manci, and Anidus: the son of Bonitus: because it revolted into the Romans. Amidst these three several Camps of the enemies, the two Scipio fled into the City of their Allies, that made resistance against, and with great lots of men; and brought corn with them, whereof there was great wine: and after they had encouraged and exhorted the townsmen, that with the same resolution they would defend the walls, as they had seen the Roman army to fight for them, and in their quarrel they left forth their powers to give an assault upon

Hieron. King of the Syracusians (whose grandfather Hiero had been a friend unto the people of Rome) went into the Carthaginians, and for his cruelty and pride, was by his own people murdered. Titus Sempronius Crassus the Pro-Consul, had a fortunate battle near Beneventum, against the Carthaginians and Hannibal their General; through the help especially of the bovadlaves, whom for their good service, he commanded to be made free, Claudius Marcellus the Consul laid siege unto Syracuse in Sicily, which wholly in manner was fall and turned to the Carthaginians. War was proclaimed against Philip, King of the Macedonians, who in a night-skirmish was surprised, discomfited, and put to flight, and with his army well near disarmed, escaped into Macedonice. To manage this war, Valerius the Praetor was sent. This book containeth all the acts achieved in Spain by P. and C. Sipios against the Carthaginians. Syphax King of the Numidians, having entered into amity with the Romans, fought against Malaminia King of the Massilians who stood for the Carthaginians, and being overthrown, paffed over into Spain with a most mighty army unto Sipios, lying over against Gades, where the narrow sea-rump between Africa and Spain, h e Celtiberians all were received into; and by those aids the Romans sent forth, and this was the first time that mercenary soldiers were waged and served in the Roman wars.

The four and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

Annus was not so soon returned out of Campania into the country of the Britons, but by their help and guidance he reconciled to rebellion the Greek Cities which continued the more wily in subversion and alliance with the Romans, because they saw that the Britons, whom they both hated and feared, joined with the Carthaginians. And first he ailed and went in hard with Rhegium, where he spent certain days to little or no purpose. In this mean time, the Inhabitants of Locri were busy in carrying away with great haste the corn, wood, and fuel, and all other necessary matter from the city. Because they would leave nothing for the enemy to prey upon. And daily more and more of them went out of the gates by heaps, so as at last there was no more left in the city, than that some were compelled to repair the breaches of the walls and the gates, and to bring into the turrets and bulwarks store of stores and other sort. Against this multitude the Cortical mixture of all ages, sexes, and degrees ran about the fields, whereof most were altogether unarmed. Amilcar the Carthaginian sent out his Cavalry, giving them direction and charging them to hurt no person. Their horsemen opposed their troops between them and home, only to exclude them out of the city, when they were scattered one from another in flight. The General himself in person encamped on a high ground, from whence he might view the country and the city. And gave commandment to a cohort of the Britons to approach the walls to call forth the principal Citizens of Locri to per; and by making promise of Amilcar's friendship, to persuade and exhort them to yield up the town. At the first they gave no credit at all unto the Britons, whatever they said; but after, when they discovered Hanno and the Carthaginians upon the hills, and heard by some
A few of their own Citizens that were fled back & escaped, now all the rest of the multitude were fallen within danger of the enemies; they made answer, that they would confer and consult together upon the body of the people. So immediately they were assembled together. The most light headed persons were desirous of a change and new alliance; they also, whose kindred and friends were by the enemy intercepted and kept out of the City, had their minds engaged and bound sure enough, as if they had put in hostages and some few who were well affected inwardly in heart & liked of constancy and true loyalty, yet durst not be known thereof, and flew themselves to fland to it; so as they all agreed in outward appearance, to surrender themselves to the Carthaginians. And after they had closely conveighed into the haven, and embarked L. Atilius the Captain of the B garrison, and all the Roman soldiery that served under him to the end, that they might be transported to Rhegium, they received Amilcar and the Carthaginians into the City, with this condition, that presently there should be concluded a league upon equal and indifferent conditions and capitulations between them. But the promise in this behalf (when they had once yielded themselves) was nothing well performed: whilst Amilcar charged the Romans, with fraudulent defiling and letting go the Romans: and they again alleged for their excuse, that they fled away, and made an escape. The horsemen also followed hard in chase by land, if haply either the tide might cause the ships to stay in the current within the strait, or drive them a land. But those whom they pursued they could not overtake; marry, other ships they spied, crossing the firesights from Messina to Rhegium. Roman soldiery they were sent from Claudius the Praetor, to lie in C garrison there, and to keep the town. Whereupon they presently departed from Rhegium.

As for the Citizens of Locri, they had peace granted them by express order and direction from Annibal upon these conditions: Impressus. That they might live free under their own laws: Item, That both the City and the haven should remain still in the hands of the Locrians. The subsistence of the covenant rested and was established upon these terms. That the Carthaginians and Locrians should aid and assist one another mutually, both in peace and war. So the Carthaginians retired from the straits without hindering the muttering and murmuring of the Britons, because they had left Rhegium and Locri untouched, which two Cities they made full account to have sacked and rifled. And therefore they of themselves having levied and put in arms a power of fifteen thousand of their own youth, marched forward to assaile Crotone, a Grecian City likewise, and feated upon the sea. Assailing themselves, much to better their estate, if they could be possed of a port and sea-town, fenced with strong walls and Bulwarks. This only troubled and perplexed their minds, that they durst not, but fend unto the Carthaginians for aid: fearing, lest they might seem to have entered into action and war, without regard of the common good of their confederates, if they called them not: and doubting besides, that if the General of the Carthaginians should prove again, rather an arbitrator of peace, than a coadjutor in war, they should fight in vain against the liberty of Crotone, as they had done before against the City of Locri. Whereupon they thought best to send Embassadors unto Annibal for his warrant, and to be secured in that, if Crotone were recovered by the Britons, it should be subject unto them. Annibal made answer, that this matter required consultation of men present with them in place, and therefore E he put them over to Himon, from whom they received no certain answer to meet unto. For willing they were not, that a noble and rich City as it was, should be spoiled: and besides they were in good hope, that in case the Britons should fail in it, and the Carthaginians all the while not seem, either to allow or help them in their enterprise, the Citizens would the more willingly revolt unto them. The Inhabitants within Crotone were not of one mind, and affected alike. For there was one malady that had infected all the Cities of Italy, namely, the division between the Commons and the Nobles. The Senators inclined to the Romans, the Commoners on the other side took part with the Carthaginians. This division within the City, the Brunii were by a fugitive runaway advertised of in these terms: namely, that Afronomachus the ring-leader and head of the Commons minded to betray the City: that it was a wide, wide, and delate town taking a great circuit of ground: and all the walls being decayed and in sundry places broken down, the Senators and the Commons kept their several guards and watches in sundry quarters far abroad. And look (unto be) where the Commons ward, there ye may enter at your pleasure. Upon this intelligence and direction given by the fugitive, the Brunii environed the City round about; and being set in by the Commons at the first assault were masters of all places,aving the Castle. The Nobles held that piece foreseeing what might happen, and therefore provided themselves of a sure refuge. Thither fled Afronomachus also, pretending that he meant to deliver the City to the Carthaginians, and not to the Brunii. Now this City Crotone had a wall (before Pyrrhus coming into Italy) twelve miles in compass; but after it was laid waste by that war: scarce the one half of the town was inhabited. The river that was wont to run through the midst of the town passed now G along the walls without those streets where the houseth flood thick and well peopled, far from the parts inhabited.

Six miles without the town there stood a noble Temple of Larinia from more renowned than the City it self, as being honoured with great religion and devotion of all the Cities and nations thereabout. A sacred grove there was in that place compiled with a thick wood, of tall fir trees, having in the midst within it divers pleasant and fruitful pastures, wherein were fed beasts consecrated unto the goddes's, of all sorts, without any keeper and officer. And albeit the carreth went forth in the morning by herds and flocks of their own kind, levered by themselves, yet at night, they used to return back again to their own pens and stalls, without harm received either by the wait laying of wild and ravenous beasts, or by deceitful fraud of men. Great encreased therefore and much commodity accruing by those cattel, inmost as thereof was made a maifie Column or pillar of beaten gold, and consecrated in that place, so as the Temple was famous, as well for riches, as holines and devotion. And many times it fallyeth out, that to such notable places there are attributed some strange miracles. For the report goeth, that there flanded an altar in the very porch of the Temple, the sthlying whereupon, no wind was ever known to blow away.

But to return to Craton. The Cattle thereof on the one side flanded upon the sea, on the other side it bendeth and looketh toward the land, Defended in times past it was only by the natural situation of the ground, but after wards fortified also with a wall, not on that part whereas Dionysius the Tyrant of Sicily, having gained the back rocks and cliffs behind, by craft and guile sometime I won it. This Cattle at that time supposted to be strong and safe enough, the Nobles feized and kept, notwithstanding the Bruttii and their own Commons befieged them. At length the Bruttii leaving the Cattle impregnable, by all the forces and assauts that they could make of themselves, were driven of necessity to crave aid of Hannibal. Who having affailed to draw and urge the Crotominias to yield, upon those conditions, To fuffer a Colony of the Bruttii thither to be brought, and there planted; and that thereby a City lying to waife and destitute, might be replenished and peopled again, as in ancient times: could not move and perfwade any one of them all, but Ariflomachus. For all besides, proteffed and laid, they would die before they would be intermingled with the Bruttii, to change their own rites and manner of life, their cufomes, their laws; and within a while their language also for others that were strange and foreign. Ariflomachus alone, feeing that he could not prevail neither by perfwasions to induce them to yield, nor find any means to betray the Cattle like as he had done the town before, fled away to Hannibal. Shortly after, certain Embassadors from Locris, by the licence and permission of Hannibal, entered the Cattle, and perfwaded them to be content for to be translated to Locris, rather than to abide and fland out the extremity: faying that they had sent Embassadors already to that intent unto Annibal, and had got a grant at his hands, that they might do so. So they abandoned Craton, and the Crotominias were brought down to the sea side and embarked, and the whole multitude departed to Locris.

In Apulis the very winter feftion was not quiet between the Romans and Annibal, Sempronius the Conful winked at Lucerni, and Annibal not far from him in Arpi: and as they could by opportunity, or take their vantage of the one side or the other there paffed some light skirmifhes betwixt them. But the Romans had alwaies the better, and every day more than other, became more wary, and fcuried from all trains and deceitful enemies of the name.

In Sicily the Romans found a great change, and all out of order, by reafon that King Hiero was dead, and the Crown translated to his Nephew or fon, Hieronymus: being yet a child, not like to rule in his owne liberty with moderation, and much les to lay the Kingdom and Scepter with discretion. His guardians and friends gladly enterprized the protection and government of such a nature, and were ready enough to plunge him headlong into all vice and wickednes. Which King Hiero foreseeing, was willing (by report) in his latter daies, to have left Syracusa free and at liberty, so that to noble a kingdom, acquired and established by good means, should not under the Lordly dominion of a child to the great obloquy and fhame of the world, be ruinate, and come to nought. But his daughters with tooth and nail croffed this his deignment, and made full recollenting, that the child should only bear the name of a King, but the government of the whole State should wholly reift in them and their husbands, Andronowdus and Zelus: who were the principal guardians, left to overriue the young Prince. And an easie matter it was not for an aged man, now fortifor years old and ten, to hardly laid at day and night, by the fair speeches, and feminine flatteries of his daughters, to keep his mind free, and to apply and convert it to intend private regards and the publike consideration of the State; and therefore he left fifteen under to overriue and govern the child, whom he foresought upon his death-bed, even when he was going out of this world, to maintain entire and unipotted, the faithful allegiance to the "Romans, which he had kept and oberved invaluat for the space of fifty yeares: and to fet to their helping hand willingly, to direct the young Prince above all, to tread in his steps, and to follow that discipline wherein he had been nurtured and taught. After he had given this charge, and yielded up his breath, the guardians came abroad, brought forth the Kings left will and testament, and shewed the young Prince in the open assembly of the people (and well near fifteen years of age he was.) Where some few, such as were fewed here of purpose within the pref of the assembly for to shout and fhev testimony of their joy and good liking, approved with open voice and allowed the Kings will; whereas all the rest fared as Orphans in a City bereaved of their King, and (as it were) become fatherless, and feared all things that might enufe. The King was interred and his funerals solemnized, with the love and kind affection of his people and subjectes, more than with any fludious care and diligence of his owne friends that were nearest to him. After this, Andronowdus removed from about the Prince all other guardians but himself, giving out oftimes that Hiero was pait a child, and able to govern of himself as King. Thus by deposing the Profefforship, which was common to him and many others, he took upon him and usurped the power and authority of them all. Had it even for a right good King and wellgoverned, that should succeed after Hiero, to find favour and win grace among the Syracusians: to heartily they affected and loved King Hiero. But Hieronymus, as if he had been willing and desirous, that by his vices and wicked life, they should have a great misis of his grandfather, and with again for him; at the very first fight, when he shewed himself abroad in open place, place, declared unto the world, what difference and great odds there was. For they who so many years together had never been Hiero, nor his son Cato, either in habit of apparel, or in any other ornaments and port, differing from all other citizens, now beheld him in his purple robes, with his regal Crown and Diadem, attended with his guard and train of armed people: yeo, and other wise, after the manner of Dionysus, the Tyrant riding forth of his Court and Palace, in a chariot drawn with four white steeds. This proud pomp and lily array was accompanied and suited with semblable qualities and conditions. He conceived and despised all men: he scorned most proudly to give audience to humble suppliants: and sent them away with reproachful terms and taunts. And not only strangers, but also his very guardians hardly might have access unto him: and to conclude, his units and delights whereby he gave himself, were new and strange to his cruelty that he exercised outrageous and inhuman. So dreadful and terrible was he to all, that some of his Towns, either by making themselves away, or by voluntary exile were driven to prevent and a void the danger of cruel torments. Of whom three only, who alone had more familiarly recourse into the Court, to wit, Androni orion and Zelius, the sons in law of King Hiero, that had married his daughters, and one Thers, had little or no care given unto them in other matters; but whilsts two of them drew toward the Carthaginians, and Thers to the Roman alliance: with their signing debating and dispute, they otherwise turned the mind of the young King to hearken and give audience to their opinions. Now it hapned that there was a conspiracy intended against the life and person of the Tyrant, and the same detected by one Cato, the companion and play-fellow of Hieronymus, and of the same age: one who ever from his childhood had been familiarly acquainted with him, and inward to all his secrets. This revealer of the conspiracy, could appeal and nominate all the conspirators: only Theodorus, by whom him self was made privy to the treachery, and solicited to be come private therein. The party was apprehended immediately, and delivered unto Andronion orion to be tortured; who at the first without delay, confessed himself to be guilty, but concealed all the rest that were accessaries. At the last, when he had been torn, mangled, and dismembered, with most dolorous torments, and intolerable for any man to endure: pretending and making semblance that he could abide no longer pains; did clothe not for all this the guilty persons indeed, but accused the innocent, and laid fair, that Thers was the first deviler of the whole plot: and unless they had born themselves, and relied upon to fo great an head, to let them on work, they would never have attempted so dangerous an enterprise. He appealeth also some other of the Tyrant his guard and houndhold servants and daily waiters: even such as came into his mind during the time of his dolours and pains, and whom amidst his groans he imagined to be such, as whose lives might be kept spared, and deaths la stanted. The naming of Thers especially made the Tyrant to believe, that the detection found to be a very truth indeed: whereupon the man was immediately led to execution and put to death; and the other innocents, as clear as himself, tasted of the same cup and suffered with him for company. As for the conspirators themselves, albeit one of their fellows was a long while put to bitter and extreme torture, there was not one of them that either hid his head or made an escape: so assured confidence had they in the resolute constancy and faithfull promise of Theodorus; and such power and strength had Theodorus himself to keep close the fetchers committed unto him. Now when Thers was once dispatched out of the way, who only was the means to hold them in, and to bind them to their alliance and allegiance to the Romans: then forthwith they began openly to ensue into rebellion, and sent as Embassadors for the same purpose, two noble young Gentlemen, Hippocrates and Epides into Anibalst: from whom also they were sent back again to Embassage. These were both born at Carthage, but defended in blood from the Syracusians by their grandfather, that was from thence banished: and were themselves by the mothers side: noble Carthaginians. By entrance of these two Embassadors, a League was concluded between Anibalst and the Tyrant of Syracusst. And Anibalst was content that they should abide till as Leigers in the Tyrants Court.

When Appius Claudius the Pretor and Lord Deputy of the Province of Sicily heard these news, he adressed straightwaies Embassadors unto Hieronymus: who saying, that they were come to renew the alliance which they had with his grandfather, had formal audience given them to deliver their message, and were dismissed and sent away by Hieronymus with a trump, demanding of them by way of a scoff: "How they had sped at the battle of Cannae. For I can hardly believe ( quoth he ) that all is true which the Embassadors report of that field: and I would gladly know the certain truth: and then upon deliberate and take counsel, which side I were better to take, The Roman Embassadors said, they would repair again unto him when he could begin to once to give audience with gravity and in good earnest to their embassage: and after they had warned and admonished, rather than praised and entrenched him, not to change, but to stand to the first covenant and promises, they departed. Then Hieronymus sent his Legate to Carthage, for to confirm the League with the Carthaginians, according to the alliance and unity made with Anibalst. In which it was capitulate and covenanted, that when they had expelled the Romans out of Sicily ( which would shortly come to pass, in cause they sent the ships and a power of men ) the river Himera, which ( as it were ) divided the island in the middle, should confine and limit both the Syracusian kingdom and the dominion of the Carthaginians.

After this, being puffed up with the fair flattering speeches of such as were about him, who suggested unto him, to remember and call to mind that not only King Hiero was his grandfather, but also King Parrus by the mothers side: he sent Embassadors unto the Carthaginians, to give them from him to underland, That he deeme med it right and meet, that all Sicily wholly should lie unto his dominion: and that the Empire of Italy only belonged properly to the Carthaginian people to acquire and conquer. This levity and vain glorious humour they neither wondered at, as a strange thing in a giddy-brained young man; nor yet greatly blamed and found fault with, to long as they might entangle him wholly and alienate him altogether from the friendship of the Romans. But all things in him turned to his overthrow and utter confusion. For whiles Hippocrates and Epistolae were sent alone with two thousand soldiers not to found and solicit the Citys rebellion, that were held by the partizans of the Romans: and himself in person entered the country of the Leonists, with all the rest of the forces, which amounted to fifteen thousand foot and horse together; certain conspirators, who thought all to be his own fouldiers, and bare arms under him, poffessed themselves of a vake house, standing over a narrow lane through which the King was wont to go down into the market place of the City: there, when other flood armed and well appointed, and waiting when the King should pass by, one of the conspirators ( whose name was Indigermes ) had given him in charge, because he was one of the squires of the Kings body, when the King approached near unto the door of the said house, to find some occasion or other, in that straight passage, to lay the troop and train that followed behind. And so he effected indeed, and put in execution, as it was agreed and contrived. For Indigermes, lift up his foot, making as though he would losse and flock a straight knot of his shoe-latchet, which hindering his going, whereby he laid the company that followed after, to long, that the King going by alone without his guard of armed men about him, was assaulted mean while, and received many flaps and wounds, before they could K come to relieve and save him. Hereupon arose an outcry and tumult, and divers of the guard let flee at Indigermes, who by this time was ready to oppose himself: and to award all enemies: howbeit he was hurt only in two places, and did escape. The guard seeing the King there lying dead, fled away as they could. The muturers, some of them, lost themselves into the market-place unto the multitude, that rejoiced for the recovery of their freedom: others repaired to Scipio, to intercept and prevent the delignments of Andrachemus, and other favourites and followers of the late King.

Whiles things flood in these uncertain and doubtful terms, Appius Claudius foreseeing war like to ensue, and that very shortly, delivered his letters unto the Senat of Rome, certifying them that Sicil enclosed already, and was at hand to take, with the people of Carthage, and with Amen. But, Himself in the mean time sent all his forces toward the frontiers of the Province and confines of that Kingdom, to withdraw and hinder all the proceeding and enterprizes of the Saca,

In the end of that year, Q. Fabius, by order from the Senate, fortified Puteoli, a town of merchandize, and which in time of wars began to be much resorted unto and frequented, and there he placed a garrison. From whence he was in his journey toward Rome against the grand Electors or Magistrates, he proclaimed the loyal assembly of the people for that purpose, to be the next Comitall day that followed upon his arrival thither: and to it fell out, that he went along the City side immediately upon his journey, and came down into Mars field before he entered the City. Upon which day, when it happened that the Century of the younger fort was drawn out by M. Lucius and had the praetorij and by their voices nominated T. Flavius and M. Emilius Regillus for Consuls, then Q. Fabius after silence made, roll up, and delivered this or such like speech, "It either we had peace in Italy, or war at lease with those enemies, with whom if we dealt neither negligentiy or unadvisedly, the matter were no much, nor importing great hazzard and danger: I would think, that whoseover disturbeth and crosteth your favours and free affections, which ye bring together with you into this solemn place of assembly, to bellow honors and dignities uppon whom ye puttle hath but small and no regard of your liberty and freedom. But since that in this war and with this enemy never any General of ours faulted in the managing of his affairs, but it cost us dear, and we had some great fault and overthrow; it behoveth you, that with what mind and careful regard ye enter the field to combat in your armour, in the same ye N should come hither to this Mars field in your gowns, and so proceed by your sufferages to decy your Comins: and that every one of you should thus say to himself, I am to nominate a Conal to match with General Annal, No longer since, than this very year, when as before Capus, Jufellina, the brave horseman and Valier of all the Campanians defied the Romans, and challenged them to fight man to man, Atellus Claudius, the nobleft Knight of all the Romans, and bel man at arms, was chosen to encounter him. In times past, against a Gaul that offered combat upon the bridge over An[is], our ancients long out Mantua, a courageous, resolute, and patient Champion. Neither can I deny, but upon such another occasion not many yearts after, the like truth was reproved in M. Velterus, who took arms likewise against another Gaul that challenged single fight. And even as we are deare, with to have our foot and head horsemen both, more glorious and hardy than our enemies, or if that will not be, at leastwise equal unto them, and able to countermatch them: even let us be carefull to find out a General of our own comare comparable in the chief commander of our enemies. And when we have chosen the best warriour and Captain in the whole City, then presently without any longer delay, being cast and created for one whole yeare, he shall be sent to match with an old captain, that hath ever smaid in the field, one who is not enclosed within compass of time, nor restrained & gaped within the strict bounds of law, but that he may order & manage every thing, according as the occasions and present occurrences of war do require: whereas, by that time

The Oration of Q. Fabius to the people of Rome.
A few that we can make all ready and dispose every thing in order, and let in hand to begin our affairs, the year is come about and clean gone. Now for as much as enough hath been laid, what manner of Comitis ye ought to create: it remaineth to speak somewhat of them, whom the prerogative Century so highly favoureth, and is much affected unto. A for M. Enylus Regillus he is the Flaminus of Quirinus, whom neither we may take from his munificy of Sacrifice, not yet retain and keep him still, but we shall neglect either the service of the gods, or the due care and regard of the wars. Oclaci us hath married my sisters daughters and hath fair issue by her. But your favours and good turns flowed both to me, and also to my relations, are not of to fill all account and reckoning, but that I ought to prefer the Common-well before all private regards and alliances whatsoever. Every mariner, yea, and every passer is able to feer and rule a ship in a calm water: but when the rolling tender is up and the vellt tossed in a troubled surging sea, and carried away with violent force of the wind, then there had need to be a man indeed, and a skillful Pilot to set at the helm, and to guide the helm. We fail not now in still and quiet sea, but we have been drench'd, and in a manner drowned. With some forms already: and therefore we ought to have exeeding great care and be well adjoyed thereof, whom we have to be the fleers-man. In a matter of its consequence and importance, we have made triall, O T. Oclacilius, of your knowledge and services: and you have not given us yet to good proof of your virtue and promote therein, that we should put you in trust with the managing of greater affairs. A Navy whereof you were Admiral, we rigged and trimmed to your hands this year for three causes: first, to armoy and pill the sea-coast of Africk; secondly to defend and keep to our barks the ports and havens of Italy; last of all, and above all, to enemphe and stay all supplies and new succours together with money munition, and victuall, for being transported unto Annabilis from Carthage. If Oclacilius have performed, I say not all these things, but in any one quit himself well, to the good and benefit of the state, Elect him Comitul hastily; and good leave have you. But if it appeareth, that while you had the rule of the Armada, all things (that a man would have) passed out of the country unto Annabilis, with as great safety and security as if the seas had been open and void of enemies: If, I say, the sea-coast of Italy hath all this year been more in danger, and subject to suetain harm; than that of Africk: what reason can you alledge, wherefore the people of Rome should choose you above all others, to oppose as Captain, to confront their enemy Annabilis. If you were Comitul in place already, we would judge it requisite and good to nominate and create a Dictator, according to the example of our forefathers: neither could you take umfr or be offended, that there should be found in the City of Rome a better warrior, and more sufficient than your self. And surely it concerneth no man more than you: O Oclacilius, to see that there be not imposed a burden upon your shoulders under which you should fall and fall down right. Wherefore I advise and exhort you all as much as possibly I can, in electing of Comitis this day to carry that mind and die that care with full providence as ye would, in case ye were standing armed in battle array; and to choose one of hand two General Captains under whose conduct and government ye should presently fight a field: and make choice of such Comits as whom our children were to take the oath of allegiance: at whole commandement, they shou'd come and assemble together, and under whose charge and protection they might willingly serve asouldiers. The pool/bratamen, the plain before Carra, are heavy examples for us to remember: but yet they served for good precedents unlos to teach us how to avoid the like mischief another time. So the prerogative Century of the younger and junior part, was called again to a new scrutiny, and to give their voices again. Whereas when /. Oclacilius began to cry out aloud and say very stoutly, that Fabius his drift was to continue Comitul still, and therewith grew to be clamorous and troublesome to the assembly: the Comitul commanded the Electors to go unto him, and to lay hold upon him. And forasmuch as yet he had not entered into the City but came down straightforward into the Mars field presently from his journey, he put them in mind that the knickes of the rod together with the axes within them should be born before him. And in the mean time the prerogative Century began afore to give their voices: and by it were nominated Comils Q. Fabius Maximus the fourth time, and M. Marcellus the third time: and all the Centuries besides without any jarring and variance elected the very same. One of the former Prxtrors likewise was chosen again namely Q. Fabius Flaccus. And other new created: that is to say, T. Oclacilius Crawfus the second time. Q. Fabius the Comitul his son, who at that time was Edile of the chair and P. Cornelius Lentulus, After the Election of the Prxtrors was ended and finished, there paffed an Act and deree of the Senate that Q. Fabius should extraordinarily have the charge of the City, and be Praetor there: and that he above all others, when the Comils were gone forth to the wars should be President and Governor of the City of Rome. There fell great rain and much snow that year, whereby the Tiber overflowed the fields, overthrew many houses, and overwhelmed much cattle and people, so as they utterly perished,

Thus in the fifth year of the second Punick war. Q. Fabius Maximus the fourth time: and M. Claudius Marcellus the third time, when they entered their Comislhip, set the City on thinking and musing of them more than usually had been known. For in many years there had not been the like couple of Comils. And old men would talk and lay, that even so were Max. Rebulbus and P. Decius declared Comils against the Galk war: and after them likewise, Papirius and Cornelius against the Samnites and Bruttii: against the people also of Lucania and Tyrrenhm. Marcellus seems was created Consul in his absence, while he was with the Army abroad, and Fabius being himself present and president of the Election, was ordained to continue till in his Consulship.

The occasion of the time the necessity and occurrence of wars, and the peril and hazard of the whole state were in, no man looked nearly into the example and precedent to find fault with, nor had the Consul in any jealous of ambition and desire of rule: but rather every man commended his noble and honest mind, who seeing that the Common-wealth stood in need of an excellent Captain, and knowing himself without all question to be the man, made itself reckoning and account of the envy and ill will of men, that thereby haply might accrue, than of the good and profit of the Common-wealth. The same day that the Consuls began their office, they assembled the Senators in the Capitol: and the first thing they did, was, a decree, that the Consuls should either call losses, or agree together between themselves, whether of them two should assemble the people for the election of Censors before he let forward to the army. After this, all they had their authority prolonged and continued still, who were employed abroad with the forces; and their commissions were renewed and sealed again, for to abide in the government of their Provinces to wit, T. Gracchi at Luceria, where he abode with the army of the Volunteers: C. Iunius Brutus in the Punic country: M. Pomponius in the Province of Gaul (on this side the Alps.) It was enacted also, that of the Prætors of the to most year Q. Münus as Vice-Prætor should govern Sardis: that M. Valerius at Brandunum should scour the river, look to the towns, and have an eye to all the attempts and enterprises of Pyrrhus King of the Macedonians, P. Corn. bus Lentulus, the new Prætor, was appointed to rule the Province of Sicié; and T. Q. Ocellius to be admiral of the Navy, which the year before he had the charge of against the Carthaginians.

Many prodigies and strange signs were reported that year and soon after the more as they were believed to be true of the simple and imperfections of people, Namely that within the hippodromum of the Razes, built their nets. In Apia a green palm tree was on a light fire. At Manibus a pool maintained by the overflowing of the river Marcus appeared red with blood. At Capit it rained chalk, and at Rome in the beating market it rained blood. In a village, called Ilfeus a spring under the ground, brake out and yielded such abundance of water, that it overturned, turbid up and down and carried away (as it had been the stream of a river) divers vessels, as pipes tusks barrels and teraces that were in the place. The open and publick hill within the Capitol: the Temple of Voles in Manibus, a nut-tree in the Sabine country: the high street, the wall, and a gate at Aespis, were all blotted with lightning and fire from heaven. And by this time other miraculous and monstrous signs were common, blown abroad to war, that the spear of Vesi in Frenelle of its own accord, lifted and moved forward; that an ox was heard speak in Sicilia that the Infant within the mothers womb, in the Marcianus country was heard to cry to Ituneph, at Spina a woman turned to be a man. At Hedeas there appeared an Altar in the skie, and apparitions of sheers of men discovered about the same, arraigned in white. At Rome also within the city was seen, now the second time, a swarm of bees in the very market place, as a thing wondrous, because it was rare and seldom known. Some there were also, that avouched, how they descried armed legions on the hill Fontanilla, Whereupon the City rose up in arms and when they were come into the field, they said plainly that there were none there appeared but the ordinary inhabitants of the hill. These prodigious lights by direction from the Aëspirites, (i.e. the Scotti yet were expiate, and the gods pacified with greater sacrifices: and a solemn procession and supplication was proclaimed unto all the gods that were shrined at Rome, and had their chapels there.

After all complements performed, that belonged to the pacification of the gods, the Consuls proposed unto the Senate concerning State matters, and especially about the managing of the wars. Namely what forces should be prepared, what numbers of soldiers levied, and where they should be bellowed severally. And agreed it was Th. there should be eighteen Legions equipped in the wars. Whereof the Consuls were to take unto them two apiece: the Provinces likewise of

N. Gaius Sic. and Sardina should be guarded each of them with other twain. Q. Fabius the Lord Deputy of Aprilis, was to have two Legions under his hand, to command the Provinces, and T. Gracchus other two of volunteers, to keep the country about Luceria; and C. Iunius the Pro- Consul, to have the charge of one, in the Punic country: and M. Aemilius another, for the Navy about Brandunum; and last of all, twain were left behind for the guard and defence of the City of Rome. For to make out this full number of Legions, 20000 of necessity were to be levied new. And the Consuls were appointed with all convenient speed to enrol them; and likewise to provide an Armada that year of 50000 Galleys, together with those ships, which ride in the river along the coasts of Colonna for the defence of that Country. When the matter was done, and the new ships haled and shot into the sea, Q. Fabius assembled the Centuries for the election of Censors: wherein were created M. Attius Regillus and P. Furius Philus.

The rumour still encreased that Scipio was out and up in arms. Whereupon T. Oficius was commanded to go with him with his fleet. And because there wanted pilots, and mariners, the Consuls, by virtue of a decree of the Senate published an Edict, That as many as in the time of L. E- milius, and C. Furius Centors, either themselves or their fathers, were asleep in the Subsidy book from 5000 to 10000 in goods: or who afterwards grew to that worth should find one miner, and six months pay, Item. That whatsoever were rated above 10000 unto 30000 should
A. should be charged with three mariners, and one years pay, Item, that whatsoever were valued in the Centurio book between 30,000 and 1,000,000 should allow five mariners, Item, that those above that proportion should lose out of ten, and every Senat should provide eight mariners, and furnish them with a whole years pay. According to this Edict, the mariners were set out well armed and appointed by their Masters, and having with them ashore and meat dressed and fodder to serve them thirty days, they were embarked. This is the first time that ever the Roman Navy was furnished with sailors and mariners, at the proper charges of private Citizens.

This extraordinary preparation more than usually, terrified the Campanian molt of all other, for
b) the Romans would begin war that year, with laying siege to Caput. Therefore they dispatched Embassadors unto Anabl, requesting him to come nearer unto Caput with his forces.

For why? at Rome there were new armies levied, for to affright that City: and the Romans were not discontented more with the revolt of any than of them. And for him, as this mettle was de-divered in full haste and fear, Anabl thinking it good to make speed, left the Romans prevented him, dislodged and removed from Aspi, and encamped upon Titia over Caput, in the fort, where he kept of old. Then, leaving the Numidians and Spaniards behind him both to guard the Camp, and also to defend Caput, he went down with the rest of his army to the Lake Ater, pretending in this there to sacrifice, but in very deed to sound and foll in Puteoli, and the garrison there for to rebel. Maximus was no sooner advertised that Anabl was departed from Aspi, and in his return to Camp was; but he journied night and day, and never stood, until he was come again, and repaired to his army. And withall, he gave order and direction unto Gregorius, to remove with his power from Lucera, and to draw near to Beneventum; like wise unto Q. Fabius the Prator, (who was the Conul's son) to supply the room of Gregorius at Luceria. At the same time the two Praetors took their journey, and went into Sicily, with the army there on land and Oblactus to keep the sea-coast, and to be defender of the Navy: and the rest spied them every one into their several Provinces. They also who had their authority and government continued ruled the tame countries that they did before.

Whiles Anabl abode at the Lake Avernum, there came unto him from Tarennum, five noble young Gentleman (Roman aforesaid) which had been taken prisoners; some at the pool Tifatums, others at (Cena), whom he had lent home in the same manner of security, as he had shewed ever to all the Allies of the Romans, Thefe Gentleman in rememberance of his favours and benefi-cites, made report unto him, "That they had pernawiad and induced a great part of the youth of Tarentum, to entertain rather the amity and alliance of Anabl, than of the people of Rome: and for this intent they were sent Embassadors from them, to request in their name, that it might please him to come nearer with his forces to Tarennum. For by they, if they might but once lese out from Tarennum his standard and ensigns, and himself near encamped, the City would without delay be surrendered up into his hands. For the younger people had the commons at their beck and commandment, and the commons ruled the whole State of Tarennum at their pleasure. Anabl after he had commended and thanked them, and withheld laden them with many fair and great promises, willed them to return home, to halten and set forward, and effect their intendments, saying, that he would be there in good and convenient time.

With these hopes the Tarentines took their leave, and departed, Anabl himself was wonderfuldy disposed to be Master of Tarennum. He saw it was a noble City and a wealthy, leated also by the sea-tide, and a very commodious Port, looking and lying toward Macedonia: and well he witt that King Philip (if he should pass over into Italy, seeing the Romans were pooreful of Bureagno-na) would arrive at this haven. When he had performed the Sacrifice for which he thither came, and (whiles he made his abode there) forraged all the Territory of Canuts even as far as the Cape of the Promontory Milgynum; sedenly he turned his army and marched to Parredo, for to surprize and give a cast do to the fort and garrison there. There were fix thousand of them within the town: and the place not only by natural fortification strong, but also fiercely fortified by industry of man. Anabl having besieged there three days, and assailed the fort and the garrison on every side, feeling he could not prevail nor effect any thing, went forward from thence, and proceeded to the waiting of the Territory of Naples, upon anger, rather than any hope of gaining the City. The Commons of Nola, who long time were discontented with the Romans, and at deadley fewd with their own Senators, upon his coming into the territory and confines near unto them, begin to rise in a commotion. Whetupon there came Embassadors unto Anabl, requiring him to advance to Nola, upon affirmed promises that the town should be delivered into his hands, But Maccellus, who was sent unto by the Nobes presented this their plot and designd: and in one day he reached to Suggula from Cales, notwithstanding he made some day to ferry over the river Taurum. And the next night he went unto Nola, 6000 footmen, and 300 horse for to aid and Q defend the Senat. And likewise the Conul behifed himself with all speed and diligence, to make Nola, first to him aforeshore, to Anabl contrarywise temporized, being not ready now to credit the Nolans as having twice before given the like attempt, and to no purpose in the end, and therefore he trilled the time and made small hate.

At the same time also Q. Fabius the Conul came against Cadinus, which was kept by the garrition of the Carthaginians to see if he could surprize it, and to Beneventum at one time (as if they had been so agreed) came on the one side, Hannia from the Brunti, with a great power of foot and horse; and on another side, Graceburius from Lucanuria: who entered the town first. From whence to soon as he heard that Hanno lay encamped within three miles of the City, by the river Coloes, and there waited the Country, he himself sallied, and pitched his tents within a mile of the enemy: where he assembled all his soldiers together, preparing to make a speech unto them. He had with him the legions that consisted most of voluntary, who already two years before had been more willing to defend their freedom in silent manner, than to challenge and demand it with open mouth. Howbeit, he perceived when he departed out of the winter harbors, that they began to mutter and grumble in the army when they marched; and to complain in this wise, Whitehead we never serve in the quality and condition of freemen. Whereupon he had written unto the Senate, and thereto added, not so much what they desired, as what they desired to make certain of, that unto that day they had done him good and valiant service: and wanted nothing but the librey: wherefore they might go for true and lawful soldiers. Whereupon the Lords of the Senate had put it unto his discretion as to do by them what he thought was expedient for the Common-weal. Thereupon, before that he should join battle with the enemy, he pronounced these words before them all, and said: *That now the time was come, of obtaining and acquiring that liberty, which so long they hoped after, for the next morrow they were to attempt their enemies with banner dilapidated, and to fight in plain and open ground, where without fear of any ambush the trial might be made with more force and true valour: Whosoever therefore can bring me the head of an enemy, him my pleasure & will is, to make free immediately, and who so loath some ground and retreateth, him will I challenge as a bondiye to be punished. Now every man hath his flate and condition lying in his own hands: and of your freedom, & not only my self will assure you, but for further warrant ye have the assurance of M. Licinius, the Col, of the Senate, and generally of all the LL. of the Council, whose whole thought and concern it was committed unto my hands the ordering of your liberty. And with all here the Consuls letters, and the decree of the Senate in that behalf. Whereat they let up a mighty cry, in token of their attendance and approbation, and called for battle, and earnestly urged to give the signal out of hand, then God that having pronounced the next day for battle, dismissed the assembly. The soldiers were joyous, especially such as were to have their freedom in reward of one day service, and bestowed the rest of that day in making their armor and weapons ready. The morrow after, to length the trumpets began to sound: they were the shift of all other that presented themselves before the General, his pavilion, well appointed and ready to fight: and by the same thing Gracchus led forth his men into the field in order of battle. The enemies for their parts were nothing behind, but forward to encounter them. They were in number eighteen thousand of footmen most of them Britons and Latinos: of horsemen, twelve hundred: among whom there were very few Italians, the rest were in manner all Numidians and Moors. The fight was sharp and continued long: and for four hours it was not seen which side had the better. No one thing else troubled the Romans more than their enemies heads, which were the prizes to redeem the soldiers liberty. For as any had killed their enemies initially they were gain'd with much ado to cut off their heads, within the troublesome press and tumult: and to lose time; and after that by reason that their right hands were employed and occupied with holding the same heads, it fell out that the best footmen gave over fighting, and the feebile dastards and fearful cowards only were to maintain the conflict. Which when the M. Marshals of the field and Colonels reported unto Gracchus: and namely that there was not a soldier of the enemies' standing that was wounded and not any more, but that they lay along were hacked and beheaded as it were by butchers: and that his own soldiers instead of swords, held their enemies heads in their hands: he commanded in all haste, that upon a signal given, they should fling away their heads from them; and charge ashe on the enemies. For their valour and prowess (as he) was well enough seen already, and evidently testified: so long as they were so hardy men and bare themselves so manfully they should not need to doubt of their liberty. Then the conflict began to be renewed: and all the horsemen charged the enemies whom the Numidians received with equal valour: infomuch as the fight of the Cavalry was as bravely performed, as the other of the Infantry: whereupon once again the victory seemed doubtful; on which part it would conclude: whereas in both hosts the Generals reproached and debated the adverse part, Gracchus said that the Britons and Latinos were to often vanquished and subdued by the Roman ancilures; and Hanno again girded on the Romans, calling them bondiyes: and footmen: let loose out of prison and houses of correction. At the last, Gracchus declared aloud, and said, They were not to hope at all for their liberty, unless that day their enemies were dishonored and put to flight. This one word of his at length set their blood in such an heat that they raised a fresh shout: & as if they had been cast again in a new mould, they charged upon the enemies so violently that they could no longer be resisted and withstood. First, they fought in the vanguard of the Carthaginians were put out of order; then they about their standards and ensigns: and last of all, the whole battle was driven back and gave ground. Whereupon they fairly turned their backs, and fled so fast one upon another into their Camp. In such fear and fright, that not so much as at the very gates, nor upon the rampier, they flaid once, and turned again to make heads: so as the Romans following them hard at the heels into their camp as it were in one in pelm mel made a new skirmish even within the rampier of their enemies. Where the fight was not so cumbersome, by reason of the frightfulness of the way wherein they were pent, but the massacre and execution was as cruel and bloody. The prisoners also that were among the enemies, in this confused conflict and tumult joyed themselves and stuck close together: and having caught some weapons, helped A helped forward the victory: and either charging upon the backs of the Carthaginians flew them, or else hindred them in their flight and running away. So of that great army, there were not all out two thousand and the most part of them alone (that escaped with the Generals) themselves all the rest were either slain or taken prisoners: and of military enigmas were carried away forty five slaves. Of the Victors there died tial two thousand. All the . . . on this prelions, was granted to the lindians. The catell also was reserved, as many as within twenty days the right owners could justly make claim unto for their own. When they were returned both with booties and pillow into the Camp there were about 4000 of the military lindians, whom the . . . and brake not into the Camp with the rest who of ear of punishment fled.

A little hill not far from the Camp and kept it for their hold, but the motion after being set from hence by the Colonels, they repaired again into the Camp at that time as Gracchus had summoned his lindians to an assembly. Where, after that the Pro-Consul first had rewarded his old lindians with military graces, according to each one his provest and good & c. &c. in that battle; then as concerning the voluntaries, he said thus much. He had rather they were all commanded by himself good and bad, one with another than these one of them that they should take of any punishment and therefore he pronounced them all free in the name of God to the benefit, happiness, and felicity, both of Common weal and also of themselves. At which word, they lifted up their voices along with exuding cheerfulness and alacrity and one while they clipped and embraced another another in their arm, with gratulation and great joy: another white again, they held their hands toward heaven, willing and praying at the gods hands all good blessing for the people of Rome and for Gracchus especially. Their (quoth Gracchus) before that I had made you all alive, and to have equal part in the right and pride of freedom, I would not set upon any of you, either the mark of a foot or hardy lindian, or the note of a fain-hearted and badly co.

D "long as they shall continue in lindiany, they neither eat nor drink but standing upon their feet. And this punishment I am sure you will willingly take in good part, when ye shall consider better of it, and fee that you could not have an easier note of diligence and shame for your false hearts and flender service. Then he gave the signal to tralls up bag and baggage, and founded the remove, and to diflodged: and thus the lindians carrying and driving before them their booties all the way disporing themselves to merly and joy and, returned to Beneventum as if they had come from some great dinner upon a solemn and festive day, and not from lighting a bony batt.

All the people of Beneventum came forth in great numbers to meet them at the gates, welcomed the lindians bad them joy, embraced them and invited them to their houses to give them entertainment and lodging. The board were spread in every mans court-yard, and furnished with more of stands they willed them to come and make merry with them: and requested Gracchus to give his lindians leave to feast and make good cheer. And Gracchus was content, but upon this condition, that they should all eat their meals abroad in the open street. Then all things were laid forth, and set upon the tables at every mans door. The voluntaries took their repast and rejection either with their caps on their heads, or else covered their crown with white wooll, some sitting some standing sitting and leaning one another at the table, and eat their meat and led with them together. This was such a worthy fight and solemnity that Gracchus after he was returned to Rome, caused the representation and semblance of the celebration of this day, to be drawn and portrayed in colours and the picture to remain in the Temple of the goddes Isberr, which his father caused to be built in the mount, Aventine, of certain lines and forties and afterwards there dedicated it.

Whiles these matters thus pasted at Beneventum, Annibald having spoild and harried the territory about Nepet, removed toward Nola, and there encamped before the town. Whom when the Consul understood to be coming, he sent for Pompey the Pro-Prator, together with that army which lay encamped above above Sestulae and provided to meet with the enemy, minding presently to bid him battell. He sent out Claudius Nero with the strength of his horsemens in the dead time of the night at a back gate, that was farther from the enemy, giving him in charge to sit about close by and in the camps and in sight and to follow the enemy, as he matched: and when he perceived the battell was begun, then to come forward and set upon him behind on his back. But whether it were that Nero muffled of the way, or having not time enough, could not put this policy in execution, I know not. In his abiem the armies joyed battell, wherein no doubt the Romans had the better hand. Howbeit, (for default that the horsemens were not there in due time of the order of the direction failed and took no effect). And notwithstanding that the enemies gave ground and retreated, yet Marcellus did not follow them upon them, but found the retreat to his own men being in a good way of victory. Yet were there by report above 3000 of the enemies slain that day, but of Romans under 400. And the about the ten fet, Nerone who all the day and night past had tired horse and men, and done no good and now returned, without so much as a fight of the enemy, was sharply rebuked of the Col. Infanmoch, that he gave him this check to choose him. That it was long of him and none else, that they had not cried quittance of all, with the enemy, for the overthrow & loss received at Cannæ. The day following Marcellus came down again into the field, ready to give battle. But Annibal, as one that secretly confessed himself to be overcome, held himself close within the strength of his Camp. And on the third day, giving over all hope to get Nola, (an enterprise that never sped well) he departed in the still time of the night toward Truentum, upon a better and more allured hope to gain it by treason.

The civil affairs at Rome were managed with no less courage at home, than the wars in the field abroad. For the Seniors who by reason that the City treasured low, were eald of their care of setting out the public works of the City by the great and having nothing else to do, employed themselves in reformation of mens manners and chaffing of vices and enormities, which were upon war: like as mens bodies, which by long and lingring sicknesses grown weak, ever and anon breed new disaies. And first they convented before them those Citizens, who after the battle at Cannæ were reported minded and disposed to leave the Common-wealth, and to depart out of Italy. The ring-leader of them all was L. Cecilius Metellus, who hapned then to be Treaurer of the City. He, with the rest of that true who were culpable in the same crime, were commanded to make their answer and plead their cases; but when they were not able to clear and quiet themselves, the Seniors charged them openly, that they had given out certain words, and made speeches against the State, tending to a sedition and conspiracy, for to abandon Italy. Next after them were cited to appear those coming and crafty companions above said, who with their over-sufficient interpretation and confuting of words, would seem to avoid their oath: those captives, I mean, K who being on their way to Rome, came back secretly into the Camp of Annibal, and took themselves freed and disbursted, because they had sworn to return again. But these and the others afore rehearsed, as many as served upon the City horses, had their horses taken from them, were disbursted out of their Tribes, and condemned all to lose their voices, and to serve without City pay. Neither were the Seniors careful to correct the Senate and reform the degree of the Knights only, but also they proceeded to take out of the public checkroll of the younger Citizens, the names of all those who for four yeare space had not served in wars, as many, I say them, as could not justly plead and alledge, either ordinary immunity by law, or tickets for their excuse. And of these there were found guilty above two thousand, who were awarded to be executed, and all of them to be removed out of their trice. And besides this shameful disgrace and note of ignominy awarded by the Commons, there passed a heavy decree of the Senate against them, to wit. That all they whom the Commons had thus reproved and noted should be bound to serve on foot in the wars, and be confined and sent over into Sicily, to the reliefe there of the army that remained at Cannæ, and no other time of service and warre was limited unto this sort of the fouldiers, but until the enemie were driven clean out of Italy.

Whilesthe Seniors, as it was aforesaid, upon occasion that the Cities flock was so decayed, gave over and forbade to bargain for the repairing and maintainence of the Churches and holy Temples, and for the finding and provision of charitie horses for the State and such like; there reformed unto them a great number of those that were wont at the spaire to take those bargains at their hands by the great, and for a gross sum of money: who ephorted the Seniors to deal in those matters still and to let, and enter into bargain with them, as if the City Chamber wanted no money: making this offer that none of them all would demand payment out of the common Chells, before the wars were fully ended.

Then repaired unto the Seniors the Masters of those bondmen whom T. Sempronius had manumitted and let them at reverence buying, that they were lent by the Tempirs, out of the office of the Bankers, called Mercari, to receive again their monies, according as they prised and valued their slaves showeth; they would not, before the war was finished. And as the hearts of the Commons were thus inscrutably affected, to inflame and support the poverty of the treasurers' houses; to the loss of money that belonged first to Orphans, and afterwards to widows, begun now to be bestowed in the Chamber of the City: and they that preferred and brought in those money, believed alwaye, that they could not lay them up more fine and safe, than in the publick cite and credit of the State, and whatsoever of those disks was disbursed and drained, for to buy and provide any thing for the Orphans or widows aforesaid, the restors kept a book thereof, and noted it down in a register. This kindness and benevolence of private persons unto their country, extended it also from the City, even as far as to the Camp: in which, that neither horsemanship nor Cenrution would take their wages but rebufe and rate them, that could find in their hearts to receive their pay terming them no better than mercenaries and hirelings.

Now Q. Fabius the Consul lay in Camp before Caesarian, which City was kept with a garrison of two thousand Campans, and even hundred of Annibals soldiers. They had for their Captain and Commander, one Quintus Marcellus, lent thither by Qn. Magnus Atellanus, who for that year was Mediator of Capua. He put the bonds and Commons in arms, intermingling one with another; for to enter upon the Camp of the Romans, whiles the Consul was busy in alluring Caesarian. Fabius was nothing ignorant of all these things, and therefore he sent unto Nola to his Collegen there, signifying unto him, that there was need of a second army to make head against the Campans, whiles the other was employed about the alluirt of Caesarian: and telling him besides, that either he must himself come in person, leaving a mean garrison behind him at Nola, or else if he might not be spared from thence, for fear of danger from Annibal.
And Marcellus, having left in Nola a guard of two thousand soldiers, with the rest of his forces, presented himself before Capua; upon whose coming, the Campanians who were ready to betray the island, shred themselves and were quiet. So both Consuls together jointly began to attack Capua: where the Roman soldiers that rashly came under the walls received much hurt: and Fabius seeing little good done, judged it best to encamp and give over the enterprise, being a lover of small conflagrations, and never believeth very dangerous and to depart from there, being there was business toward of great advantage. But Marcellus constraint was of opinion and said, that as there were many things which great warriors were not at attempt to, if they were on the

B taken in hand and the adventure given they were not lightly; to be given over and laid aside; for as much as in it lay matter of great concordence, for fame and reputation, both ways: and so prevailed, that the enterprise was not neglected and abandoned. Whereupon there were mantlets and all other kinds of fabrics and engines of batterie and suicide, but against the City; to as the Campanians besought Fabius, that they might depart to Capua in safety. And when some few were gone forth, Marcellus pollied himself of that gate where out they went: and then they fell to kill and lay one with another; first about the gate: and after they had killed one another, they put like execution those also within the City. Fifty there were or the cabals of the Campanians that first got out of the town, and fled for mercy to Fabius: and they by his guard and safe conduct arrived at Capua. But see Caefalon, through the lingering labours of the inhabitants that creed him.

C protection was by advantage taken of their long paciety, and temporizing, won by the enemies. The captives so many as were either Campanians or Annibals, this soldiers were led to Rome, and there clapt up fast in prisons. But the multitude of the townmen were distributed into a hundred cities aboutjoying, and there keep in ward.

At the very same time that the Consuls after their conquest, retired from Caefalon, Gracchus being in the country of the Lucans and having gathered and enrolled a certain number and companies of soldiers out of those parts, went them out of foraging, under the conduct of a Captain of Allies, into the territories of the enemies. How he contrived them in they ranged into sitting wise out of order, and let upon them, and paid his enemies again with the indecency and lies, or not much less than that which he had received at Beneventum: and in great haste withdrew himself into the country of the Britons; for the fear lest Gracchus should overtake him.

The Consul Marcellus returned back to Nola, from whom he came and Fabius went forward into Sannio, to spoil and waste the country and to recover by force of arms the cities which had revolted. The Samnites about Caefalon were pitifully and grievously discomfited: their villages in all places set on fire, their fields laid waste and destroyed, and great booties both of cattle and people driven away. Six towns forced by assault, namely, Campitera, Tifea, Caffi, Meda, Inuvia, and Orbitarium. In the Lucan country, the town of Inuia; and in Apulia, the City of Aene was assaulted. In these towns and Cities, there were taken prisoners and slain 25000 of the enemies: of fugitives and runagate traitors there were recovered 370, whom the Consul sent home again to Rome, and being thereto come, they were all beaten and scourged with rods in the Comitium, and then pitched down headlong to the earth, from the rock Torga. These exploits were achieved by Q. Fabius, within the compass of a few days. But Marcellus by occasion that he lay sick at Nola, was hindered from performing any feats of arms. The Praetor likewise Q. Fabius, who had the charge and jurisdiction of the province about Locera, won by force about the same time the town Aequus, and fortified a standing camp planted before Ardea.

While the Romans were thus employed about these affairs in divers other places, Annibal was come unto Tarentum, to the exceeding great damage and decrement of all places where he journeyed: but being once arrived in the territory of Tarentum, he began to march and lead his army most peaceably. There he did no harm at all, made no his; rather once went out of the high way. And it was evidently seen that all this was done not upon any modesty that appeared either in forlorn or Captain, but only to win unto him the hearts of the Tarentines. But when he approached the walls of the City, and law no connection, nor interruption from hence upon the discovery of his Vanguard, as he thought he should, he pitched his Camp almost a mile from the town. Now had Tit. Petronius the Vic. Praetor, who was Admiral of the Fleet at Brundibum, and T. Petronius his Lieutenant unto Tarentum, three days before that Annibals threw himself before the walls. He had minded and enclosed the flower of the Nobility, and to bestowed at every gate, and about the walls where need required, good guards for defence: with such vigilant diligence both day and night, that he gave no opportunity and advantage either to the enemies to advance any assault, or to the doubtful and unruly friends to practice any treason. Now Annibal, having spent there certain days in vain, and seeing none of them who repaired unto him at the lake; Avernius either to come themselves, or to send messengers or letters: and perceiving now that he had rashly and foolishly followed vain promises, so he was dejected;lodged and removed from thence. And even then also he spared the territory of Tarentum, and did not hurt at all; and albeit his faine and counterfeited army and mildness his hitherto took no effect: yet he hoped still thereby to corrupt their faithful allegiance to the Romans: and so he went to Salapia. And by reason that midsummer was past, and he liked well of that place for a winter harbour he conveyed thither all the corn out of the Territory of Metapontum.
and Her. Then he sent out the Numidians and Moors, to fetch booties and prizes from out of the Sahara country, and all the woods andastes next unto Apulia, from whence they drove of other cattell small ftores: but of horses especially they brought away great numbers, of which there were four thousand divided among the horsemen to be handled, broken, and made gentle.

The Romans seeing there was likely to be war in Sicily & the same not lightly to be regarded: & that the death of the Tyrant there, either gave the Syracusians good Captains, than wrought any change in their minds: alteration in the case: aligned unto M.Marcellus, one of the Coins, that I.rose, no. to govern. Frequently upon the murder of Heronynus first the fouldiers in the Leontin country, began to mutine and make an uprore, and boldly spake and said, That the Kings death should be espurte, and his oblogeies solemnized with sacrificing the blood of conspirators. But after wards, when they heard often iterated the sweer name of liberty and freedom restored unto them, and that there was good hope that the fouldiers should have a larges deal amongst them out of the Kings Treasure, and be under the command of Captains of better quality, and having besides all this, a bedroll reterned unto them of the Tyrant his cruelty and foul fact, and of mofecibity and loudsome left their affections were to altered that they suffered the body of their King to lie above ground entombed, whom a little before, they fo greatly desired and wished for, Now as concerning the conspirators, whiles the rest of them remained behind to assure and molest themselves of the army, Thedecmus and Soft took the Kings horses and rode poll, as hard as ever they could to Syracuse; for to purprize upon a sudden all his followers and favorites (who knew nothing of that which was done) and fall upon them at unsawres: but they were prevented not only by the fame (which above all other things in such cases is most fwiwis) but also by a courier one of the Kings servents, Whereupon Aemecdorus had feit beforehand of that part of the City which is called the Island, together with the Cattile and all other places that he could come at which were thought of any good importance: and them he fortified with good guards. Thedecmus and Soft being entered within the City at *Hecypus after fun-setting, in the twy, light, and flushing in of the evening and subing in the Kings royal robes allembred with blood, and the ornamentes and attire likewise of his head, he passt through This, and called aloud unto the people to rite all at once for their liberty and to arm them selves, and willed them to repair into Acradia. The people some of them ran out into the streets, others flowed in their entites and porches, that lay looked out of the windows fohn from within their hontes, and asked what the matter might be. Every place flown with terror and charter-light, and was filled with horrid garbols and horrid burlies, As many as were in same gathered together in the open places of the Citythere that were remand took down off the Temple of jep, Olimpia the spoiles of the Gauls and the Illyrians, which the people of Rome had given a present to K. Her as and which he let aloft for a memorabli playng uppo jepier that he would conciliale them this gracious fave, as to beftow those fared weapons & armes upon them that meant to arm themselves with, for the defence of their country, for the maintenance of the Churches and shrines of the gods, & for the recovery of their liberty. This multitude also joyned with the corps de gards that in the principal quarters of the City were belowed in places convenient, But Aemecdorus amongst other places that he fortified made alio all with strongguards of armed men the publice garrisons of the City within the Island. There was a place emciild round about with four-square stone, and built strongly like a fortress: this was possified by the youth that had been appointed for to guard and defend that quarter: and they set messengers into Acradia to signifie that the gattlers and the corn were kept by them to the behoof of the Sanc, and on the morrow at the break of day, the whole people as well armed as unarmed assembled together in Acradia within the Palace, And there before the altar of Concordia which in that place flood erected, one of the principal and chief Citizens, named Pheodes, made an Oration unto them all, with franks of speech enough, tending unto liberty, and enriched with modelly & moderation in this wise: Men, quoth he, that have exchange of others in all others and other indiginities, fall to abase the fame, and their flomacks likewise against them as known is, as for servile discord, what calamities & miseries it bringeth with them, the Citizens of Syracuse, have heard their fathers tell and not seen and tasted them selves. That ye have been ready to take up arms and weapons in hand I commend you for it: but I would then you more think, if we used them not, misely ye be driven thereto by extrem necessity. For the present I hold it good, and my counsel is, that Embassadors be sent unto Aemecdorus, to intimate unto him, yes and to require and charge him, to submit him self to the Sanc and people by and to be ordered to let open the gates of the Island, to put away from about him his guard, and deliver up the cattile and garrison. But in case he intend under the pretence of being guardan or protector to the kingdom of another, thereby to miup it to his own use; hemust be given to understand, by mine advice that we will seek to recover our liberty out of the hands of Aemecdorus more fiercely and forcibly than from Heronynus. And to prefectly upon this assembly embassadors were sent. Then the Sanat went together and sat in Councilhouse, as during the reign of Hiero, there was set an ordinary publice Council of State: so after his death unto that day, the Senors were neither called together, nor their advice taken of forught in any matter. When the Embassadors were come unto Aemecdorus and had delivered their message he was him self (verily) for his own part moved with the general content of the Citizens: but especially when he considered, that among other quarters of the City possified by the ad-

A vere fide, that one part alfo of the Island which was the strongeft, was barried (as it were) and held out against him. But when the Embassadors called still upon him to come forth, his wife Demarata, daughter of King Hiero, puffed up still with the proud mind and naughtv Romack of a Prince, and full of the vain humour and spirit of a woman, put him in mind of a laying, that Denis the Tyrant had evermore in his mouth; namely, "That a man should not ride on horseback to be deposed from his royal dignity and estate of tyranny, but be led fair and softly a foot pace, and go to that as a bear to the stake. An easie matter (quoth he,) it is to one to yield and forgo the possession of high place and honour, and thing that may be done in the turning of an hand, whenever one will: but to compass and attain thereto is a right hard matter, and of all others most difficult. You were better therefore to borrow some reftit of time of the Embassadors, for to take further deliberation of this main point and in the mean while, to trie the advantage thereof, to fend for the Souldiers out of the Leontin country: unto whom, no doubt, if you would promise a reward out of the Princes treasure, you shall have the whole matter. This prillious unhappy counsel of a woman Anchimedes neither despifed and rejected: together not yet presently accepted and embraced; supposing it a better and safer course, if he meant to aspire unto high dignity and great pruifance, for the present to temporize and give place unto the, efficacy of the time. And therefore he willed them to carry back unto the Senet this answer from him, That he submitted himself, and would be ordered & fet down by the Senat and the people. The morrow after, no loon as it was day-light, he caufed the gates of the Island to be fet open, and let himself forth. In the market-place of Acredina, where he allended up unto the altar of Concord from which the day before, Polyneus had made a Speech, he came to the people, He began his Oration with an excuse of his late coming and long stay behind, and craved pardon the cierctrelding. That he had kept the gates shut not because he meant to separate his own affairs from the State, and not to take such part as the City took: but when words were once drawn he feared what would be the end and issue of murders and massacres, and whether men would lay their hands, when there was an affurance of liberty effected (as being contented with the death only of the Tyrant,) for whether, as many as either in blood and kin, or in affinity and alliance, or in other offce or service, were toward the K. and his Court, should be counted culpable in the taint of another & to like the wife have their threats out. For after that (quoth he) I understand once, that they who had deferved and let free their country and minded and willing to face & preserve it, turn enfranchi

C as not committing on hands indifferently, for the good of the State. I made no longer doubt of the matter, but to yield both mine own person and also all that was under my hand (as committed unto me upon truft and fidelity) unto my native country: now that he who put all into my hand, is through his own folly & outrage overthrown and broug to con-fusion. Then turning to the murderer of the tyrant, and by name calling unto Anchimedes and Ser-

A noble and memorable piece of service ye have already done, (quoth he,) but trust me truly, your glory in this behalf is begun only, and not throughly finifhed and performed: nay, a great danger is yet behind, unless ye fee to the general concord and unity of all parts, that the com-

Hippocrates and Epizetes, when tidings came of the Tyrants death (which Hippocrates would fain have had concealed and therefore flew the messenger that brought news thereof) being for-faken of the founders, returned to Syracusa, supposing for the present, that to be the fuc-

put this their desire in execution as they should have done. For in the mean season, those young and rambunctious men and such as ever had converted with the foilders, went up and down, one while to them, another whiles to the fugitive strangers that were revolted; (who for the most part were sailors and sea men that came from the Romans) yea, and forced themselves with the base and most abject persons of the Commons, spreading tales, and whispering into their ears lurid insinuations of matters of crime against the Senators and great men of the Nobility, saying, that they plotted and practiced closely under hand nothing else, but that Syra, under a colour of reconciliation and accord, should be reduced to the obedience of the Romans: and then, the side and faction, and some few with them that are of council to renew the association, might be Lords, and tyrannize over the rest. By this means there flocked multitudes, every day more than other to Syra, that whole car were thicketed, and thicketed still to hear such tumefaction, and were apt enough to give credit thereto. And they gave not only the Hippocrates and Epicles, but Andrognorus, also a good hope of an alteration, and a new order. For he being at length overcome with the importunate entreaties of his wife, who ever put into his head, That now was the only time to surpris and take upon him the rule of the State, whilsts all things were troubled, and in confusion, upon their new and unknown liberty; whilsts the foilders were presented in their way, to be dealt withal, and daily maintained and led out of the Kings Exequaries when those captains sent from Annibals, by reason of their acquaintance with the foilders, were present to attest, and further their delignments first therefore acquainted Themistius, who had married Geo, his daughter, with his consent, and after a few days (full unadvisedly) imparted his mind also, unto one Arisban, an Actor of Tragedies, whom he used about, to make play unto his other feizes. This Arisban was well born and of a worthiful house, a man in good place and of honest reputation; and his profession (for among the Greeks it is reputed no matter of blame to play either in Tragedies or Comedies) was no blot either to his birth, or disgrace to his calling; and therefore as one who made more reckoning of his duty to his country, than of private friendship, betrayed & did dilate all the treachery of the Pratros. Who finding by good provers and certain evidences, that this was no forged and counterfeit information, after consultation had with the Ancients of the Council, by their warrant and direction, let a guard of armed men about the door of the Senate House, and to loom as Themistius and Andrognorus were enter our, they flew out grief thereunto. And when there began some uprore upon this fact, which in them seemed very horrid and horrid, (especially to all the rest that knew not the case) at length they appeal the tumult and ceased silence, and brought the informer into the Council-House, that had deted the intended treason: who declared all things orderly in particular, namely, that this conspiracy was devised and sprung from the marriage of Hermon, the daughter of Geo., who was wedded into Themistius; that divers auxiliary foilders of Africans and Spaniards were appointed, and provided to assassinate the Pratros, and other principal Civilians: that their goods were promis unto the murderers to be ransacked and riddled; that besides there was a band of mercenary foilders, th as were wont to be at work, and ready to execute the commandment of Andrognorus, let in a readiness to seize the Island again, and keep it to his use. And when he had laid every thing abroad in order, with all circumstances, what the practices were, and by whom they were to be performed and executed, and viewed before their eyes most plainly the whole conspiracy, and namely, what person and what forces should have been employed. Then the whole body of the Senate were likewise verily persuaded that they had deserved such an end, and were unjustly murdered as Hermon. But without the Council-House door the confudued multitude, composed of a fettis of people, who were doubtfull of the matter; and knew not what to make thereof, cried out. And albeit they menaced and threatened before the entry and porch of the Senate, yet at the sight of the dead bodies of the Conspirators, lying before their face, they were affrighted and soon hustled to as with great silence they followed the whole body of the Commons to the public place of assembly, whereunto, by order from the Senate, and his fellow Pratros, was commanded to make an Oration.

He began formally to inveigh against Andrognorus and Themistius, (as they that accuse men at the bar,) and rapped up their former base part, charging them with all the wicked deeds and impious facts, committed since the death of Hiero: "For what (quot he) did Hieronymus, or what could he do of himself, so long as he was but a child and tender, and scarcely come all the while he lived to have any hair on his face? His officers and guardians, were they that ruled all and managed the kingdom at their pleasures, but to, as the blame and heavy load lay upon him. Who if he had forfeited either before Hieronymus, or at least his life together with him, he had been but well enough served. But they, who long ago had deferred to die, and whom the galows had already groaned, cast not still after the death of the tyrant, to devise and plot new mischief one in the neck of another. At the first, openly in the sight of the world, Andrognorus by flutting the gates of the Island, entred by way of inheritance upon the kingdom, and sought to seize in his own right, and immediate heir apparent, upon those things that he held under the Prince, only during his homage. Afterwards being betrayed by them that were in the Island, and beleaguered round about by the whole City (which was possessed fully of the Acedem) feeling that in vain he had attempted to be king by spelt and open force: he fought means now to aspire thereto secretly, and by cunning flights. Neither could he be so much as exclaimed and won by any favours and honours done unto him: who being himself a traitor to the free..."
At these words, the people from all parts of the assembly began to cry out with one voice, that neither of them both were worthy to live, nor any one besides of the Kings stock and lineage ought to remain upon the face of the earth, See the nature and disposition of the multitude: Either they serve falsely, or rule prudently. Liberty that is the mean between, they have neither the skill to deserve reason, or the grace to entertain in measure. Now, there, wanted not (ye may be sure, as at all times else) ready instruments and firebrands, to help forward and kindle more anger, such, as hearing the Commoners didtemper already and, bloudly minded of themselves; before in manner that it was all read out and published, it pulset clear, and was granted. And presently there were sent out certain persons from the Praetors, that murdered Democrat and Heroma the daughters of King Hero and Geb, the two wives of Anderoninus and Themistius. Now there was another daughter of Hero, named Hersale, wife to Soppeus, who having been sent as Embassador from Hero to Probus, chose a life in voluntary exile, and lived not with his wife. She having an inklings given her aforehand and knowing that the murderers were coming astro toward her, took her two daughters, servants and together, with her hair loose hanging down their shoulders, and in most other poor array and rufflable habit able to have moved pity and compassion, they were fled into a private Oratory or Chappell unto their house-gods, to save themselves. The mother seeing the murderers fell to entreat them mutt pitifully, and recommended unto them the late remembrance of her father Hero, and her brother Geb: "Be exceeding upon that was born unto her that Hero at the time of Heromnas, as for me (quoth she) I cared no good by his Reign and Kingdom, unless it were the banishment and silence of my husband; and as by the life of Heromnas my fortune was not so good as my fathers; so after he was murdered and dead, my care is not to bad, nor like unto hers. Moreover, and besides in case Anderoninus had effected his deigizations, my father should have been a Queen, and reigned together with his wife; but as for me, I muight have been a subject and servant with the like. Again, if there were any meelfnger sent unto Soppeus to report the death of Heromnas, and the restitution of Syracuse to liberty, who can make doubt, but that forthwith he would be embascular and take the fees, and return again into his country? But how much the men put besides their hope, and deceived of their expectation? And who would ever have thought to have seen in a steele plate his wife and children in danger to lose their lives? For wherein do we hinder the common liberty, or the coute of laws? What danger can come to any person from us one delicate woman, and in manner a widow, and two young maidens living as Orphans in-their? And it be laid again that there was indeed no fear of hurt to be imagined from us: B. but only the Kings blood and kindred was odious in the eyes of the people: Then, quoth she, let us be sent away far from Syracuse and Sicily, and confined over to Alexandria, the wife to her husband, the daughters to their own father. But when they would neither give ear to her words or encline their hearts to pity and compassion: then became she would not spend longer time in vain (for now the first of them drawing their swords forth) the gave over all entreating for her self, and befought them instantly to be good yet, to the young ingenies, and spare their lives, unto whom of that age, even in the very enemies in their heart of anger for to bear violence: and that seeing they were to be revenged of tyrants they would not play the tyrants themselves, and commit that wickedness, which they seemed to hate in others. A. midst these words the murderers (sent from the Praetors) pulled her forth of the inward and most secret place of the chappell and other throat: and when they had done, they stifled and fell upon the maidens behiure with the blend of their mouth who for sorrow of heart and fear together were paling themselves and out of their wits and as it were in a furies fit of frenzy, with them, and get out of the Chappells minding, if they could have escaped forth, and recovered the street to let the whole City on an uprore. And to shifted for themselves poor wrenches by running to and fro within the house, (which was not large and spacious) that so a good while they escaped amongst the thickest of so many armed men, and oftentimes avoided their reachers, and caught no hurt: but, and when they had caught hold of them, not withstanding they were to struggle with so many hands, and that to strong, yet they wound away from them all until at length after they had received many wounds, and filled every place with blood, they fainted and sank down, and yeeded up their innocent spirits. This murder indeed, was of so ill a pittance; but much more lamentable, by occasion of a present accident. For straight after came a meelfnger with express commendation, to spare the women, and not to kill them: for that upon a sudden the hearts of the people relented, and entombed to mercy. But when they heard there was so quick dispatch made of execution, that neither they had time to betinkle themselves and repent, nor space to cool upon their heart, they fell pike and compassion into an extrem fit of anger and choler, The multitude thereupon began to mutter and murmur, and cried to have an election of Praetors in the room of Anderoninus and Themistius (for they were both of them Praetors) which new new election was not like to fall out in the event to the good liking and contentment of the other弘 Prato's in place. So a day was set down, and proclaimed for this election. At which time it happned that beyond all mens expectation, one from the farthest part of the assembly nominated Epides: and then another from thence named Hisperates. After which the same voices came thick and threefold still, so as it seemed the multitude would wholly go that way. The people there as-templed, were a confused fort intermingled, as well with a number of soldiers, as of a company of Citizens and Commoners; ye. and many of them were strangers fugitive, shuffled among, such as rather than their life desired a general change and iteration. The Prato's at first disembled all, and would seem to take no knowledge thereof: but thought it bett to put off the matter to a farther day: yet overcome at all with the common accord and content of the people: and I withal with a mutiny and sedition pronounced and declared the men aforesaid for Prato's, Neither would they at first hand to know as they were created, let that abroach which was in their mind and desire to effect notwithstanding they were displeased and disconsol'd much both for that there had been Embassadors dispatched unto Appius Claudius, about a truce for ten days: and also when it was obtained that there were others addrest to treat for the renewing of the ancien league with the Romans.

At the same time (Ap. Claudius the Roman General lay at Mugron with an Armada of 100 galleys, waiting there to hear what was the event of the troubles which arose upon the murder of the tyrants: and how far forth men would proceed upon this their new and unwonted liberty. And much about those days, when as the Syracusan Embassadors were sent from Appius unto K Amerin now coming into Sicily, Amerin himself after he heard the conditions of peace, thought they would grow to some good agreement and conclusion in the end: and therefore sent other Embassadors to Syracuse, personally to debate and confer in the presence of the Prato's, concerning the renewing of the League aforesaid. But by that time, they found not the City in the same quiet time and peace as before. For Hieron and Epeides, after news came that the Carthaginian Navy was arrived and rid at anchor under the bay of * Agedus, without, and without all fear buzzed in the ears one while of the mercenary soldiers, another while of the fugitive triters many tattle families against their brethren in Cith and namely, that they went about to betray Syracusa to the Romans. But Appius began to keep his Armada at anchor in the very mouth of the sea, letting know what heart and hope they of the contrary faction had, L at least that which they intended. Much credit was given (as it should seem) unto those flanders and lewd suggestions: whom as at the first the multitude ran to the waters side in a great hurty and tumultuous manner to hinder their landing: as happily they attempted it. In this toubleome continuation of all things, it was thought good, that the people should meet together to deliberate what was best to be done. In which assembly, whils some drew one way, others haled and pulled another way and were at the point to mutiny and grow to a sedition. Apollonides, one of the prin-cipalls and chief Citizens, made a speech to very good purpose for preservation of the publick peace, and thus he said: * Never was there any City nearer, either to hope of allured safety, or to fear of utter defillation than this of ours at this present. For if all would go one way together, and with one accord either encline to the Romans, or bend to the Carthaginians, there were not a City under the cope of heaven, whose tale were more happy and unfortunate then ours, But in case we were distracted, and the Common-wealth go divers ways, there would not be more hitter and cruel war between the Syracusians and the Romans, than among the Syracusians themselves: when within one and the same walls there should be banding one against another, and each have their forces, their armor, and their Captains of their own. And therefore we ought of all hands to consider what we can do that all may be of one mind and draw in the same line. As for the main point now in question, Whether society and allience be the better and more commodions, the Romans or the Carthaginians, is a matter of far less moment and important than to be confin'd and fixed long upon. Howbeit in choosing our friends and allies, we are to be directed by the authority and set of Hieros, rather than of Hieron's; and N not to prefer that enemy which we have tried for fifty years in much felicity, above a friendship for the present unknown, and sometime hereafter found unfruitful. It maketh somewhat also, to resolve upon this course, that in case we should deny peace and allience to the Carthaginians, we need not presently go to war with them; but with the Romans we must out of hand make an account either of peace or of hot wars. This speech of his the leis that it favoured of last onspiration and affiction, the more authority and iway it carried with it. And besides the deliberation of the Prato's and choice Senators, the advice also of the martial men were taken. And therefore the Captains of all their own enigns and companies, ye. and the great Commanders of the auxiliary forces of their allies were willing to sit in Council together with them. When the matter had been often debated, and much contention and hot words passed between, at the last became there appeared no colourable reason or cause to make war with the Romans, they agreed that a peace should be concluded, and that together with their Embassadors, there should be otthers alo from them to ratifie and confirm the thing.

There replied not many days between, when out of the Levantine country there arrived certain Orators, to crave help and succour for the guard and defence of their matches. This Emballge seemed to come very fitting and in good time, for to exonerate and rid the City of the um-fully and disordered multitude, & likewise to send out of the way their Captains and ringleaders.

So HIPPocrates, the Praetor was commanded to lead thither the fugitive strangers. Many also of the mercenary soldiers, that were waged to help them in their wars, accompanied them: so as in all, the number amounted to four thousand. This expedition and journey contained greatly as well the lenders and letters of it out, as also the parties themselves that were sent forth. For the one side had a good occasion and opportunity now offered them, to contrive a change in State (the only thing that so long they had desired) and of the other were right glad, that the ink (as it were) of the City was now well tourn and voided away. But this was like the palliative cure of a fire, and a lightning for the present of a sick body: whereby it might soon after by relapse fall back, as it were, into a recidive, and a worse dicease and more dangerous than the other. For HIPPOCRATES began at first to make rodes by Health into the confines bordering upon the Roman Province, and there to waife and spoil afterwards when Appius had sent a power of men to defend the frontiers of his conquerers, he charged with his whole power upon that guard that was opposed against him, and slew many of them. Whereof, when MERCENIUS was advertised, he dispatched Embassadors incontinent to SYRACUSE, to charge them with the breach of peace: and to give them to understand, that there would never be wanting him occasion or other of quarrel and war, unless HIPPOCRATES and EPEIDES were removed, and sent far enough out of the way, not only from SYRACUSE, but also quite out of Sicily. EPEIDES for his lost if he remained present in the City he might be charged and brought in question, for the taint and treasons of his brother absent or be wanting for his part, in the raising of new war: went himself also in person into the Leontins country: and seeing them there forward enough of themselves, and provoked already against the Romans, began also to alienate and turn their hearts from SYRACUSE. For in these terms he suggested and informed against the Syracusans, namely, "how they had capitulated with the Romans, that all the Cities and Nations which were under the Kings, should be subject unto them and within their jurisdiction: to as now they cannot be content (quoth he) with their liberty, unless they rule also like Lords and Kings. I would advise and counsel you therefore, to lend word unto them and give them to understand, that the Leontins likewise deem it good reason, that they should themselves be free: in regard ther that the tyrant was killed within the ground of their City, or because the first alarm for liberty began there. For they leaving and abandoning the Captains there that followed the King ran at once from thence to SYRACUSE. And therefore they are (faith he) so rare that sorest find article out of the infringement of the covenants, or not to accept at all with that condition. Soon were the multitude periowed hereunto, and therefore when the Embassadors of the Syracusans came to the Leontins both to make complaint for killing of the Roman Corps de guerre, and so to command peremptorily that HIPPOCRATES and EPEIDES should depart either to Locri, or to what other place they would rather chuse, so they went their ways and avoided clear out of Sicily: they returned unto them this stout answer again: that neither the Syracusanians had any commination and warrant from them, to make peace with the Romans in their name, neither would they be tied and obliged to any confederacy made by others than their own selves. This answer the Syracusanians made report of to the Romans, and laid plainly, "That the Leontins were not under their jurisdiction, to be ordered and Enlivened by them: therefore, anything committed in the league with them notwithstanding, the Romans might war against them without breach of any covenant: and in that war they would not for their parts fail them, but do their best in condition that when they were once subdued, they might be reduced again under their obedience, according to the covenant comprehended in the League. Whereupon MERCENIUS with his whole power went forth against the Leontins, and sent for APPius also, to affill them on the other side: and so hot were his fouldiers in this service, and bare themselves to revenge for anger that the guard was slain, during the time that there was treaty of peace between that at the very first affult they won the City, HIPPOCRATES and EPEIDES after they saw the wall fell and the gates of the City broken open, betook themselves for their safety, with some few into the Cattle, from whence by night they made a fierce escape, and fled to HERSEBAS.

As the Syracusanians marched from home with a power of eight thousand armed men, and were come forward, as far as to the river ITLA, they met with a messenger, who told them that the City Leontins was forced. They reported other news besides, as well lies as truths, one with another, namely, that townsmen and soldiers indifferently without respect were put to the sword: that he thought verily there was not left one alive of fourteen years of age and upwards that the City was put to the fack, and all the rich mens goods were given away. At this to hearful and horribile news, the army shaid and went not forward. And when they all were greatly troubled, their Leaders SOFAIS and DOMENESIS, consulted what to do. This loud lie arose not upon nothing, but was occasioned by mistraking of a matter. For there were certain fugitive traitors to the number of two thousand. But of Leontins and other soldiers, there was not one hurt after the City was lost. And every man had all his own goods restored unto him again: having that only which in the first hurlyburly of a City newly won happeed to militarry and perish. Howbeit upon this bare report, they neither could be induced to go forward to the Leontins, complaining and grieving that their fellow fouldiers were so besayed and murdered nor yet to abide therestill for to expect and hear more certain tidings. The Praetor perceiving their minds disposed to return, and yet hoping that this mutinous fit of theirs would not continue long, in case the Captains and heads of their fury and folly were once rid out of the way led the army to MEGARIS and went themselves in person with a few horsemen toward Herbesus, hoping to gain the City by treachery, while they all there were afield. But seeing that enterprise would not prevail, they minded to use forcible means. The morrow after they dislodged and raised their Camp from Megara, purposing with all their forces to assail Herbesus, Hippocrates and Epictides supposing this to be the only way for them, although at the first fight not the safest. (Considering all hopes besides were cut off) namely, to put themselves into the hands of the foinders, who were for the most part acquainted with them, and besides, upon the brutish of the execution and massacre of their fellow foinders, throughly chafed, went out to meet the army. The foremost enigns in the foremost, hapned to come to those three hundred Cretenians, who in the wars of Hieronmus had harbored under them, and received a favour and benefit at Anaulis this hands. For being taken prisoners at Thrasyboulos, I among other auxiliaries that came to aid the Romans, they were set at large and sent away without ransom. Whom when Hippocrates and Epictides knew by their colours, habit and fashion of their armour they held out branches of olives and other vials and tokens of rippancs, befeeching them humbly to receive them, and being once received, to voucheface to protect them, and not to deliver them into the hands of the Syracuseians: by whom they should soon be yielded unto the people of Rome, for to be murdered and cut in pieces. At this they all cried aloud with one voice, and willed them to be of good cheer, for they should fare no worse than their own fellows. Upon this communication the enigns flaid, and the army stood still and marched not forward: but the general captains will not as yet what the case might be of this day. After the rumour was spread that Hippocrates and Epictides were come, and that all the host throughout by a general applause, it seemed like well of their coming: the Praetors incontinently set forth to horse, and rode forward apace to the foremost of the vanguard, demanding of the Cretenians, what manner and fashion this was of theirs, and how they durst be so bold as to parle and talk with enemies? and without license of their Praetors to enter in them within their companies? And herewith they gave commandment, that Hippocrates should be apprehended and bound sure with chains. At which word the Cretenians set up such a cry, and the rest to answer it again with the like, that it was well seen, in case they had proceeded forward as they began, they should have incurred themselves no small danger. And this in great perplexity, and fear of their own lives, they commanded to turn enigns, and retire unto Megara, from whence they came; and dispatched messengers presently to Syracuse, to signify in what terms they stood, Hippocrates being the foinders pulled, to be of impudence and ready to believe everything, devised a cunning flait besides in this manner: After he had sent out certain of the Cretenians to bete the wails between them and Syracuse, he pretended that they had intercepted some letters from thence, which he read out unto the foinders; and were indeed framed and indited by himself. The tenor of the letters ran in this form:

The Praetors of Syracuse to M. Marcellus their friend, greeting. After these salutations and commendations premised, as the manner is it followed written thus: you have done well and orderly in sparing none at all of the Leonins, but all other mercenary foinders besides are in the same predicament: neither will Syracuse be ever in quiet so long as any foreign aid be either in the City, or in your army. And therefore our advice and counsel is that you would endeavour to get them into your hands, who with our Praetors are encamped before Megara, and by ex-M "

The contents of these letters were not so soon read, but with such an outcry and alarm they ran to their weapons on all hands, that the Praetors amidst this garboil were fain to ride away as fast as they could gallop toward Syracuse. But although they were fled, the mutiny nevertheless continued and was not appeased; for the foinders fell upon the Syracuseians that were in the camp amongst them and they had all drank of the same cup and not one escaped, but that Epictides and Hippocrates came between, and opposed themselves against the multitude in this their furious rage not upon any pitiful compulsion that was in them, or regard of common humanity, but because they would not cut themselves from all hope of return; and besides, they were not only deterred to have the soinders themselves affectionate unto them and faithful, and withal instead of hostages: but also purposed, by this so great danger, first to gain and win unto them the kindred and friends of those soinders; and afterwards to oblige and bind them fast by so good a pawn and gage, remaining still among them. And having good experience, with how small a puff and gale of wind the common people turneth every way, they suborned a soinder, one of them who was befieged within the City of Leonium, to carry news to Syracuse, fusing with those false tidings that were reported at the river Mylas: yeas and to pave the same candidly upon his own knowledge, and tell things that were doubtfull, as if they were most certain, and by himself seen and known: thereby to stir up men to anger and indignation. This fellow was not only credited of the common multitude, but also being brought into the Council-House, he greatly moved the Senate of Syracuse as some of them, more light of belief than others, gave it out openly and said:  "That it was happy, that the avarice and cruelty of the Romans was thus discovered among the Romans: And god blest us from them here. For if they set foot, once within Syracuse, they would commit the like outrages, yes, and worse too a great deal, and more horrible: as they did find there greater matter to work upon, and to satisfy their covetous and greedy appefire to the full. Whereupon they agreed in general, to shut the gates, and to stand upon their guard, and defend the City, but they all feared not alike, nor hated the same persons. For the mar-

Romans the Prators, and some few of the principal Citizens, albeit they were in the hui, and poleUed with the false report aforesaid, yet they had more regard to provide for a mischief that was more imminent and near, and ready pretently to fall upon their heads. And now by this time Hippocrates and Epicides were come before Hexaplyos. Within the City, the kinsfolk and friends of those Citizens which were in the army, drew together in conventicles, conferred among themselves to let the gates open and agreed to have the common country of them all, to be defended against the violence of the Romans. Now, when one only wicker of Hexaplyos was opened, and they ready to enter in thereat, the Prators came upon them in the manner. And first they commanded by word of mouth, and threatened them; after that, by virtue of their place and authority, they seemed to fright and terrify them: and last of all, seeing nothing could prevail, forgetting their own dignity and majesty of their calling, they fell to pray and entreat them not to betray their country to thole, who aforetime were the instruments and puppets of the Tyrant, and now the corrupters of the army. But to deaU ear gave all the multitude in this their rage and furious fire into the Prators, that they withal, as well as without, let their hands, to, by all forcible means, to bang down the gates, and so when they were all broken open, the army was set in, and received within the Hexaplyos. The Prators fled for refuge with the youth and strength of the Citizens into Acdrom. The mercenaries, the fugitives, and all the foundries that were left, in Syracuse, (of them that served the King) joyed to the army, and augmented their forces. And so Acradma also was upon the first assault won. All the Prators, but those that escaped by flight, and lapsed themselves in the midst of this hurry, were slain and the night coming upon them, staid the massacre. The day following, all bondages were called to receive the rapt and made free the prisoners were set open and the prisoners let go a large. And this confined rabbie and multitude of all forces created Hippocrates and Epicides Prators. And thus Syracuse, having for a short time liberty flining favourably upon it, fell again into her old servitude.

When news hereof came to the Romans incontinently they dislodged and removed the camp from Locutians, and marched directly towards Syracuse. It happened the same time that the Embassadors sent from Appius by the way of the haven, were embarked in a galley of five banks of oars: but another galley of four banks which wasissent, was not to loo en red into the harbour, but it was taken: and the Embassadors hardly, and with much ado escaped in the other. And now the world there was grown to this pass, that no laws or peace, nor so much as the very laws of arms were observed, but broken clean: at what time the Roman army lay in camp a mile and an half from the City, at Olimnian, the Temple of Jupiter. For when it was thought meet to send Embassadors from them, Hippocrates and Epicides with their followers encountered them without the gate, and charged them upon their peril not to enter the City. The Roman Orators alluded and said, "That he came not to proclaim war against the Syracuseans, but to bring aid and help, as well unto thole, who having escaped out of the midst of the slaughter fled unto the Roman Camp, as ali unto them, who being kept under with fear enduring bondage and thralldom more miserable than banishment, yea, and death it felt. Neither will the Romans (faid he) put up that shameful and cruel murder of their Allies without due revenge. And therefore, if those persons who were fled for foucour unto them, may return home safely into their country: if the authors of that massacre above said be delivered into their hands: and if the Sicilians may enjoy again their liberty, together with their laws, there shall not need any hostilite or war: But in case their conditions be not performed they would perfecute with fire and sword, all such as shall hinder and stand against the same, whomsoever.

To this Epicides framed his words in this wise, "If (faid he) ye had any meallage and commissary to part with my brother and me, we would return you an answer accordingly. In the mean while ye were best be gone for this time, and return again when the City and state of Syracuse shall be under their government, unto whom ye were sent. As for war if the Romans think it good to deal that way, they shall find and know by experience, try when they would, that it is of one thing to afflict Syracuse and another to let upon Locutians. And so leaving the Embassadors, he made the gates stay against them.

From this time forward the Romans laid siege unto Syracuse, and began to beleaguer it both by sea and land at once. On the land side at Hexaplyos, by water at Acdrom, upon the walls whereof the sea beateth. And like as they won the City of the Locutians by terrifying them at the first assault, and therefore disfrusted not, but that they should force and enter this also one side or other, being so large and vast as it was, not compact, but built so lofting, one part far afrander from another, they approached with all their fabrics, engines, and ordnance of batterie against the walls. Which enterprise of theirs, so resolutely begun and so hotly and forcibly followed, had iped well and taken effect; if one man at that time had not been in Syracuse, Archimedes was he, a singular Astronomer. A rare man for contemplation and beholding the sky with the Planets, and other stars therein fixed: but a more wonderfull engineer for devising and framing of artillery, ordnance, fabrics and instruments of war, whereby he would with very little ado, and at ease, check and frustrate all the inventions which the enemies with so great difficulty had prepared for to give the assault. This cunning artificer and admirable workman had planted engines of all sorts upon the curtain of the wall, which stood on certain hills, and thole not of even height; and having for the most part high places that yielded hard access, and some other low again, whereunto men might come on even & plain ground, he fitted and furnished every place accordingly. Now Marcellus from out his gallies of five ranks of oars assaulted the wall of Acro tin a, which (as is above said) is washed and digned upon, with the sea. And from the other gallies, the archers, slingers, yes, and the right armed darters (called Pelites) whose javelins are of that fashion, that they be unhandsome to be landed back again (by those that have not the catt and skill of it) did affie the defendants, that they hardly suffered any one to stand upon the walls without hurt and dangers: Tho' I say kept their gallies far distant from the wall, because archers and darters had need of some space and compass to lan. e and let drive their shot. But unto the gallies of five course of oars, there were adjourned other two of either side: for which purpose the oars within were taken away in a way that they might close larboard to starboard and be coupled one unto the other. And thus being rowed as one entire gally, by the help of the utmost oars without, they carried upon them platforms of timber, framed with foors and lots of planks, and other engins and instruments within them to batter and shake the walls. Against this artillery from the gallies, Archi medes belowed and dipotted upon the walls counter-engins of sundry fizes, some greater, some smaller. Against these gallies that were furthest off he weighed and discharged stones of exceeding main weight and those that were nearer he annoyed with lighter bullers, but those he shot far thicker upon them. And bit of all, to the end that his own Citizens might, without taking harm, make a counter-battery against the enemies, and so annoy them, he caused certain barba cans or loop-holes almost a cubic deep to be pierced through the walls, and to stand thick from the foot to the parapet: and all to slack the enemy, through which overtures, they within shoot dilly against the enemies for arrows out of bows, some quartels out of scorpions and K braxes of mean and indifferent bignes. And against these gallies which approached more clofe and near under the walls because they would be within the shot, and that they within might carry and level over them he devis'd a crane or swive to be planted aloft upon the walls, having at the one end, while hung over the sea a drag or grappling hook of iron like an hand fanned therto with a long staff which took hold upon the prow of a gally, and when the heavy counter poite offic'd at the other end weighed it down to the ground, and therewith drew with it the gally up on a height, while it hung thus aloft in the air, the gally fell into a manner endlong upon the porp, and then the swive being let go again all at once suddenly with a lavy, did the gally tumbling as it were down from the top of the wall, with it the swive and violence against the water (to the exceeding fear of the mariners) that if it had fallen directly downward upon the land, yet needs it must have receiv'd good score of water into it. Thus all their provision for assaults by the sea side, was deluded and made void: and then they turned their whole forces from then, etc. to give assault by land. But even that part of the wall like-wise, was as well furnish'd with all manner of engines and ordnance, provided at the great charge of Hiero, and by his careful fore cast for many years together: but devised and framed by the arithmetical cunning and skill only of Archimedes. Besides, the natural situation of the ground was a great help: for that the rock, upon which the foundations of the wall stand, is for the most part steep and bending forward, that not only the shot levelled out of an engine, but also whatsoever was but rolled & tumbled down, with the very own weight and poise came with a great force & violence upon the enemy. Which fore Said cause made the assailants to have difficult & climbing up, and as unititled footing and keeping of their hold. Whereupon they went to counsel. And considering well that all their attempts and enterprises were thus delined and stocked by the enemy: it was thought good to give over assaults, and only by long and continual siege, to cut them off from all virtuals both by land and sea. In the mean while Marcellus with one third part (well near) of the army, went forth in expedition, to recover again those Cities which, taking occasion upon these troubles, were revolted to the Carthaginians. And he gained Pedasus and Herbasus, which yielded on their own accord. As for Myrages, which he won by a charge, he laid it down to the ground, and sacked it, to the sorrowfull example of the rest and espieaily of the Syracusians.

And much about that time, Hanno also, who had a long time rid in the Bay of the Cape Plate ram with his Armado disbarred and set alond at Hersonisset (which they call Minos) 5500 foot-men, 3500 horse-men and twelve Elephants. He had not all this power of men when he lay with his fleet under Pela nus. For after that Hippocrates had taken and held the possession of Syracusen, he went to Carthage, there being sent unto both by Embassadors from Hippocrates, and also by letters from Annemachus (who moved him and remonstrances. That now the time was come to recover Syracusen with much honour and glory: and being himself there present in person no bad folk nor by word of mouth to further and follow the cause) he easily persuaded the Cartaginians and prevailed that as great a power both of horse and foot as might possibly be raised, should pate over into Sicily. Being arrived at Hersonisset within few daies after Agrigentum was delivered up into his hands. And all the other Cities, which had banded and taken part with the Cartaginians, were put into good hope to drive the Romans out of Sicily: that even they who were befieg'd within Syracusen, to take hold upon them: and were so in their ruff, that suppressing part of their forces sufficient enough to defend their City, they parted between them the charge and managing of the whole war in this manner: That Epicerus should remain behind for the guard and defence of the City, and Hippocrates join with Hanno, and war joyntly against the Romans. He with 10000 foot, and 300 horse, set out by night: and passed between the Corps de gaurd, where none at all warded, and encamped about the Acere. As they were fortifying their Camp, Marcellus came upon them as he retired back from Agrigentum, besieg'd now by the adverse part: whether A he had made great haste, but in vain, in hope to prevent his enemies, and get thither afore; but little thought he (and nothing less) than in his return from thence, at that time and in that place, to meet with an army of Syracusians that should make head against him; Howbeit, for fear of Himilco and the Carthaginians, whom he knew to be abroad, and with whom he was not able to make his part good with that power which he had about him, he marched as circumspectly as he could, having his eye on every side, and led his army in good order of battle against all occurrences whatsoever might happen by the way, and so as good was, that carefully forecast and diligence, which he was provided with against the Carthaginians, served him in very good stead against the Sicilians. Finding them therefore but feeing in pitching their tents, without order, and stra-

B tered in the word, and most of them unarmed, he environed soon all the Infantry that they had, and put them to the sword. But the Cavalry after a flight skirmished began, fled with their leader Hippocrates to Acre; Marcellus after he had by his flight reproved and kept in the Sicilians, who were at hand to fall away and revolt unto the Romans returned to Syra for, and after some few days, Himilco joined with Hippocrates, and en camped about eight miles from thence upon the river Anatis.

Likewise about the same time, or very near, it happened that 55 war-ships of the Carthaginians, under the conduct of Bumleanc, Admiral of the Armado put into the great haven of Syracusa out of the deep and main sea: and also the Roman fleet of thirty Galleys, with five ranks of oars, arrived at Panormus, and landed the first Legion there: and thus the war was turned and diverted.

C from Italy. So wholly seemed both nations as well Romans as Carthaginians, aimed upon nothing but Sicily, Himilco making full account to prey upon the Roman Legion which was yet a land at Panormus, as they should come to Syracusa: misled of the right way to meet with them: for he marched and led his power farther within land higher in the country, but the Legion coatled along by the sea side, accompanied as it were with the fleet which flanked them and come to Pachiumus unto Appius Claudius, who with part of his forces went out to meet them on the way. But the Carthaginians made no long stay about Syracusa. For Bumleanc having small trust and confidence in his ships, considering that the Romans were coming toward him with a fleet, and were many in number: and with all feeling that by sojourning there he did no other good but with his company impoverish and eat out his fr endsFood and hoarded up faire, and with a merry

D wind passed over into Affick. Himilco also, who had dogged and followed after Marcellus, vainly as far as Syracusa, to epy some good opportunity and vantage to bid him bate, before he joyned with a greater power: seeing that he was hereof disappointed and the enemy lying about Syracusa late and secure, as well in regard of their fortifications as their forces: because he would not spend any longer time to no purpose in sitting there still. To look upon their Allies how they were besieged, he dislodged and removed from thence: attending, whereover there were many hope and likelihood of revolt from the Romans, or that he come with his army, and beth himself in person, to encourage and animate by his presence those that favoured his part, And first he recovered Morgantia, where the Roman garrison was betrayed by the inhabitants, and delivered unto his hands, into which City the Romans had conveyed great stores of corn, victual, and provision of all sorts. Upon this revolt other Cities also took heart unto them, and the Roman garrisons were either thrown and driven out of the Castles and Fortresses, or else were treacherously betrayed, surprised, and destroyed.

The City Aenea, leant upon an high hill, and on every side inaccessible; as it was by natural situation of the ground impregnable, so had a strong garrison within the Castle. A Captain of that garrison, one that was not to ease to be compassed and over-ravaged by desertfull trains. His name was Pinarius, a witty man, and hardly withall, who repose more trust in his own diligence to prevent, that he might not possibly be deceived, than in the truth and faith of the Sicilians. And at this time more than ever, before he stood upon his guard, and took heedfull care of himself and his charge, by occasion that he heard of so many treacheries and treasons, to many revolts

E of Cities, and malversations of garrisons: and therefore as well by day as at night, he looked that the Castle was well provided and furnished of good war, and well continually: and the fortresses never departed from their armour nor their appointed place. When which the chief Citizens of Aenea perceived, who already had covenanted with Himilco, and promised to betray the fort and the garrisons, and law that the Roman Captain was to wary that he lay not open unto the opportunity of any fraudulently and guilefull coune, they resolved by art and open means to effect this their destyled enterprise. They alluded therefore unto Pinarius, 4 That the City and Castle 4 both ought to be in their power that they entered into league and amity with the Romans 4 as freemen, and were not yielded as slaves to be kept in durance and prison. Reyon would therefore 4 fore, and meet it as (as they thought) that all the keys of the gates were delivered unto them.

F of Cities, and malversations of garrisons: and therefore as well by day as at night, he looked that the Castle was well provided and furnished of good war, and well continually: and the fortresses never departed from their armour nor their appointed place. G With good and trusty allies, their own faith and truth is the fiftest bond. And no doubts, the people and Senate of Rome would con them greater thank, and esteem more dearly of them, if they be they of themselves, not by constraint but of willing mind, would abide and continue in their found allegiance and fast friendship. Pinarius made answer again, 4 That it was by his General placed there Captain of the garrison: at his hands he received the keys of the gates, and the Constablehip of the Castle, and the same to hold and keep neither at his own will, nor at the pleasure of the men of Aenea, but at his disposition, who leaht him his Commission. New for a Captain to abandon his fort (quoth he is) a capital crime among the Romans, by virtue of a
a law, which our fathers themselves have confirmed, even by the exemplary punishment & death of their own children, who have transgressed the same. And seeing the Consul Marcellus is not far off, ye may, if it please you, send your ambassadors unto him of whom you may be certified, under whose power, commandment & government I am, Tulli. Say they, we will never send unto him, but if words and reasons may not prevail, we will work some other means to recover our liberty again. Then quoth Pinarius to them, If ye think much to address your meffengers to the Consul, yet do me this favour, as to call a Common Councill of the people for my sake, that I may know whether these demands proceed from some few, or from the whole body of the City. So it was accorded and agreed, that a general assembly should be proclaimed against the morrow. Then Pinarius, after that he was departed from this party, returned into the fortres, and called his fouldiers together, and spoke to them in this wise: I suppose ye have heard already (my fouldiers) in what sort the Roman garrisons have, these dais past, been betrayed and murdered by the Skilfuls. I hope this day we have avoided and escaped first & principally through the goodness of the gods; next, and immediately by your own valour and prowess; & by continual watch & ward keeping in your arms both day & night. And I would to God ye might pass as well the time to come, without falling into this hard choice either to endure and suffer Inch horrible mischief; or to execute and commit a fearfull example of cruelty. This intended treason of theirs hath been carried and conveyed closely and cancelionly all this while & seeing they cannot as yet meet with any advantage to surpris us, they would seem now openly and without dissimulation, to demand for to have all the keys of the gates under their hands, Which we should not to loom past with & render unto them; but presently Ennius would return to the Carthaginians, and more cruelly should we here be murdered and hewn in pieces, than the garrisons was at Magna L. Malido I had to offer of them repit of this one might to take further counsel: that I might advertise you of the present danger, wherein both I & you stand. To morrow morning by day-light, they purpose to hold a solemn assembly of the people, and to make a speech unto them, to accurr, and to stir them up against you. And to morrow is the day that the City Ennius shall overflow either with the blood of you or of the Inhabitants. Be ye well stored, that as ye shall lose all that you have if ye impriue you: for in case you prevent them and begin the fray there shall no peril at all betide you. Look who first lay hand on his sword and draweth it he shall carry away the victory clear, Therefore ye must be there pret in your armes, and attentive to expect a signal from me. I may tell will be present in the assembly, and with paling and debating, tempestic and draw out the time untill ye be all in readiness and everything in order. And to toon as I shall give you sign with my gown then let me hear you let up an outcry, then let me see you all upon the multitude: down with them and spare not and put them all to the sword. See in any case there be not one of them that remains and remain alive, from whom ye may fear any harm, either by fraud or force. And now I beseech thee O Dame Ceres, and thy daughter Proserpina, and all other gods in heaven above, or infell beneath, who inhabit this City, that these holy lakes and fanned groves, wherein ye are honoured and worshipt to you be propitious and favourable unto us; in case we enter into this action and enterprise, for the avoiding of treachery intended against us, and not to offer mischief unto others, but to otherwise, I would use more words unto you my friends and fouldiers; for to animate and encourage you, if it were that you had to deal with men in arms: but since they are naked unarmed, & unarmed, you shall kill and slay them at your pleasure, and satisfy your selves with their blood, And to the end that you need not fear any harm from Hannicus and the Carthaginians, I hope the Consul himself lieth encamped near the hand. After this exhoratation they were dismissed, to take their refelct and left. The next day, they were betowed in fundry parts of the City, some to belet all the streets: others to stop the passages and the waies against the townmen, that they might not escape. But the most of them stood upon and about the Theatre, and were nothing inspected as being used nether to behold and see the assemblies of the people. The Roman Captain Pinarius was by the Magistrates brought forth and presented before the people: where he pleased, that it lay not in his hands but in the power and authority of the Consul, to dispose of that which they demanded: and heเต率ted for the most part the same allegations that he shewed the day before. At first they began gently some few by little and little: afterwards more and more of them, required him to deliver up the keys; and to consequently all with one voice, charged and commanded him to do so; and when he seemed to make some stay and defer the matter they menaced and threatened fiercely, yea, and seemed as if they would no longer forbear but proceed to extreme violence. Then the Captain made a sign with his robe, according to the former agreement: and with that the fouldiers who had their eyes upon him waiting witty for the signal and were ready for execution, set up a loud outcry and ran some from aloft upon the multitude assembled over against them; others stood thick at every corner of the Theatre, where the people should go forth, and opposed themselves against them. Thus the men of Ennius, shut up and penned within the Theatre were massacred and lay stumble upon one another; not they only that were killed but such also as fled one over another ahead: the found just upon the wounded, the quick upon the dead, one with another, by heaps. Then there was running from them fundry waies, and as if the City had been taken upon assault by the enemy, there was nothing but murdering and flying away in every place. And as hot and furious were the fouldiers in the execution of this unarmed multitude (whom they judged worthy A thrily and juftly to be killed as if like danger presented to them, or chol er railed in former, had provoked them there. Thus Æneas was held fill for the Romans by this means: were the deed simply ill, or by circumfance needless and neceffary; Marcellus did not of the fact & granted the pilage of the Citizens of Æneas to the fo unders: supposing that the Sici lians throughly frighted by this fearful example would betray no more garrisons. The calamity and hard fortune of this City, (linding, as it did, in the very heart of Sicily) was in one day divulged and noised throughout the Island, from end to end. And other wise, a famous and renowned town it was, either for the natural situation exceeding strong, or because all places in it were accounted faced and holy, in remembrance of Preferpkins, who in times past left her footing & trace there, at B what time as the was stolen away & ravifhed, [by Pius] Now it was generally thought by the Sicilians, that this curried and deteftable mischief had de fded and polluted not only the habitations of men, but also the temples of the gods: whereupon even they likewise, who flowed but doubtful and indiffertent before, fell now away from the Romans, and turned to the Carthaginians.

Then Hippocrates retired to Margarita and Himileo to Agrigentum: who were fent for by the conquerors and traitors within Æneas, and approached with their forces, but to no purpose. Marcellus returned to the Leontis country: and after he had brought into the Camp corn, and other vi tuals, and left there a mean guard, he preferved himself to the fege that lay before Syracuse. And when he had fent Apusius Claudius to Rome to live for the Consulship, he committed the charge in his room of the Armado there, and the old legatee unto T. Quininus Crispinus, Himself erected and forfited his winning harbours five miles from Exaplos, at a place which men call Leontis. And there were the affairs of Sicily unto the beginning of winter.

In the fame Summer the war began with King Philip which long before had been fup- fected; For there came Embaffadors from Oricon to M. Valerius the Prefeor Admiral of the fleer, for the defence of Brundafium, and the fea-coat thenceabouts of Calabria, and made report that Philip firft allioed to win Apollonia, and was come up the river with one hundred and twenty light galleys, or fiefs with two ranks of oares against the flream: and afterwards, feeing he could not effect his purpofe fo speedily as he hoped, privily by night he approached with his army to Oricon: and that the City, fucre upon a plain, neither strongly fene with walls, nor well man- ned with foudiers, nor yet furnished with armor and munition, was at the firft affaft not surprised, and won, And as they recounted their news of, they behoufed him to grant aid and succours: and to make head againft this undoubtcd enemy of the Romans, either by Land or forces at Sea, and to chafe him away from them: who for no other reason were by him affailed, but because they were near neighbors to Italy, M. Valerius leaving the guard of that place to T. Valerius his Lieutenant General, with a fleet of fhips well rigg'd, furnished & appojided, and having embarked the soudiers (which the galleys for war would not receive) in the merchants fhips of burden, arrived at Oricon on the second day after: and finding that City kept with a small and flight garrifon, which Philip when he departed from thence had left there, recovered it without much refiftance, Thither repaired to him embaftadors from Apollonia, who brought word that they were befieged, because they refu ed to revolt from the Armado of the Romans, and were not able to hold out any longer against E the forcible attempts of the Macedonian, unless a garrifon of Romans were rent unto them. He promis'd to effect whatsoever they defired, and to fhipped a thouand clef and choice foudiers in galleys, and rent them to the mouth of the river, under the conduct of a Captain of Allies Na- vires Crispus, an induftrious man, and an expert foudier. He having landed his men, and fent the galleys back to Oricon (from whence he came) to the relief of the Armado: conducted his foudiers higher in the country far from the riverside, by a way that was not beet nor held by the Kings forces: and in the night-fall, unawares to all the enemies, entered the City. The day following they refled, only the Captain took a survey of the youth and able men of Apollonia, of their armor and the munitions and forces of the City. When he had seen and pruced all; thereupon he was well appaied and encouraged to fight, and withall he had learned by the Scous and fpies, how retchless, idle, and negligent the enemies were without. So at midnight he went forth of the City without any noife, and entered the Camp of the enemies carefully guarded as it was, and lying to open: that by credulous report, there were above one thouand men got within the trench and rampier, before that any one was ware thereof: and if they had held their hand, and not fal to killing, they might have paffed on still even as far as to the Kings Pavilion. But by reason that they flew the watchers next the gates, the enemies were rai'd: whereupon, they were all so frighted and terrifed that not only there was never a foudier took weapon in hand, and went about to repulse the enemy out of the Camp: but even the King himself, half naked as he was, and newly wakened out of his leep, clad in fimple apparel, scarce de ent for a common foudier, much lefs, I wot, for a King, was fain to run toward the river side to his fhips. Thither also the other multitude fled dis- ordered in heaps. There were not many under three thousand either tain or taken prisoners in the camp. Yet there were more by odds of the enemies taken than killed. In the rifing of the camp the Apollonians met with Catapults and Balist, and other engines provided for the affault of the City, which they conveyed all to Apollonia, to serve for defence of their walls againft the like occasion of needful service. All the booty besides of the camp was grant't unto the Romans.

Tidings hereof being come to Oricon, M. Valerius preferably led forth the Armado as fast as to the mouth of the river, that the King might not file away and escape with his fhips: whereupon Philip diluting his power as well by sea as shore, and doubting he was not able to match the the Romans drew up on one of his ships to land, set fire upon the rest, and by land went into Matien, with a great part of his foilliers disarmed and spoiled. The Roman fleet wintered at Orinum with M. Fabius.

The same year in Spain the affairs went varibly on both sides. For before that the Romans passed over the river Uerus, Mago and Afdumall defeated a mighty host of Spaniards, so as all the farther part of Spain had fallen from the Romans, but that P. Cornelius made haste to transport his army over Eerus and came in good time to settle the waverings and doubtfull minds of the allies. At the first, the Romans encamped at C. Ferenus Aleru, a place memorable for the death of great Amilcar. The Castle was well fortified, and thither more they had conveyed but. But because all those quarters thersabout were full of enemies, and Sundaytimes their Cavalry had charged the Roman footmen, and gone away without any harm, whereby there had been slain at times upon two thousand of them, which either made small haste away, and stood behind, or straggled looly over the fields: the Romans departed from them, nearer unto places of more security and peace, and fortified themselves in camp upon the mount of Vistoria, Thither came Cn. Scipio with all his forces, and likewise Afdumall the son of Gijoe, the third Captain of the Carthaginians, with a full army. And they all encamped beyond the water, over against the fort of the Romans above-foaid, P. Scipio accompanied with certain light armed foilliers, was gone out cloely to discover and take view of the places thersabout: howbeit, the not so covertly, but he was espied by the enemies, and (no doubt) they had put him to a thoughful life in the open plain champion, but that he took a little hill thereby for his damage. Where he was environed and before round about; but by K the coming of his brother Cn. Scipio he was delivered out of that danger.

Culfus, a famous and strong City in Spain, and so near linked in affinity to the Carthaginians, that Amilcar from thence married his wife, and went to the Romans. The Carthaginians came again to Illiturgum and began to assault it; because a garrison of the Romans lay there: and like they were to be Matters of the town, by occasion especially of a great death and scarcity of victuals within. But Cn. Scipio to relieve his friends and the garrison, went out with a legion lightly appointed with carriages, and marching between the two camps of the enemies skirmished with them, flew many of them, and entered the City. The morrow after he fell into joy, in fight with the enemy, and sped as well so as in both battells there were slain of them above well thousand in the place, more than ten thousand taken prisoners, and 26 military eniligns carried away. Thus the siege brake up at Illiturgum. After this, the Carthaginians began to lay siege unto Reges (a City also confederate with the Romans,) But Cn. Scipio at this coming raied up a siege without any confid. Then the Carthaginians from thence went forward against Munda, and the Romans followed them theither straight after. There they encountered together and fought a fet battle with banners displayed, for the space well-near of four hours. And as the Romans bare themselves bravely, and had got the better, and were at point of the victory, the retreat was founded, by occasion that Cn. Scipio was hurt in his thigh with a barbed javelin, and the foilliers about him were greatly afraid that the wound was deadly. But no doubt, if it had not been for that fray and hinderance the very camp of the Carthaginians might that day have been forced. For not only the foilliers, but the Elephants also were driven already so far as the trench, and even there upon the very bank, 59 of them were killed with darts and pikes. In this battell likewise were killed (by report) twelve thousand men, almost three thousand taken prisoners, and 57 military eniligns won. Then the Carthaginians retired back to the City Amintus, and the Romans followed upon them, because they would give them no time to rest and breath themselves after their fright. Where Scipio being brought into the field in a litter, gave them battle the second time, and got the victory clear; but fewer of the enemies were slain by the one half than afore, because there were not so many in number left to fight. But as they are a nation given naturally to renew war, and to be everfighting, and cannot give over they soon repaired and made up their forces. For A'dumall had sent his brother Magus to levy and gather new foilliers; whereupon they took their heart again to try another field. These, being for the most part other foilliers (new come) fought as it were in revenge, and to uphold that side which in few days space had so often taken the foill, and demeaned themselves as courageaully as they before, and sped as untowardly. For there were slain of them above eight thousand, not many under one thousand taken captives, with military eniligns 58. In sight of them there was found very much spoil of the Gauls, as rings, ogoles, car- kants, collars, and bracelets great store. Over and besides, two great Lords and Princes of the Gauls, whose names were Manciatus and Guismerus, were slain outright in that conflict. Eight Elephants taken alive, and three killed.

Now when as the affairs in Spain went thus fortunatly with the Romans, they began at length for very famer to think of Saguntius, a town that was the caunte of all these wars, and had now five years already been in the hands and poftession of the enemy. Whereupon by force of arms they recovered it, drive out of the town the garrison of the Carthaginians, and restored it again to the ancient inhabitants, as many as remained alive, and had escaped those broils of war. As for the Turdets, who were the occation of the wars between the Saguntins and the Carthaginians they labled them, and brought them under their subjection, fold them in portile, and destroyed their City utterly. Thence were the achivements in Spain, during the time that Q. Fabius and M. Claudius were Consuls.

At Rome, when the new Tribunes of the Commons were once entered into their office presently L. Metellus

A L. Metellus one of the Tribunes aforesaid, arrested the Centors P. Furius and M. Atilius, peremptorily to make their appearance and answer before the people. Thefe Centors had taken from him being Treasurers the year before his horie of service allowed him by the City, called and displaced him out of his Tribe, deprived him of liberty to give his voice, and made him Absurdus, and all, for being a party with them at Carra, who composed to abandon Italy. But by the means and mediation of the other nine Tribunes, they were discharged: for they would not suffer, that the Centors should come to their answer whiles they were in office. And the death of one of them, namely, P. Furius, was the caufe that they could not accomplish the lefzing and numbering of the Citizens. And when M. Atiliusrended up his Magiftracy. Quo Fabius Max. held the oflen B assembly and Parliament of the people for the election of Centors, wherein were created Q. Fabius Max., the Centor his fon, and T. Sempronius Gracchus the second time, both abfenf. For Pra- tors, there were elected, M. Atilius, and with him who at that time were Ædiles of the chair to wit, P. Sempronius Tuditanus, Ca. Furius Centinalus, and M. Aemilius Lepidus. This year, as it appeareth in old Records, were the Stage-plays first fet out by the Ædiles of the chair, and continued four daies. This Ædile Tuditanus above-named was he who at Carra when all besides him (for fear were affifted, in that would calamity) brake forcibly through the midst of the enemies, and escaped. When Q. Fabius the old Centor had finifhed the Election then the new Centors Elciæ were lent for to repair unto Rome, and they entered their Magiftracy. Then they assembled the Senat fofo, and took order for the war for the Provinces as well their own, C as those that were under the Praetors: also concerning the armies, and the disposition of every charge and place of command. So the Provinces and armies were divided in this wise: The war with Annibol, whereofever it fell out, was committed to the managing of the Coff, with the charge of one army, which Sempronius himself had before under his command: and another, commanded by Fabius the Centor, And those were two legions, M. Aemilius the Praetor, whose lot it was to have the jurisdiction over the foreigners, had committed his authority unto his Colleague Atilius the Praetor of the Citizens of Rome, that he might govern the Province about Lucania, and those two legions, over which Q. Fabius, now Centor, had the command, while he was Praetor. To Sempronius the Praetor befell the Province of Aetumnia. To C. Furius was allotted Sufcula, with two legions likewise: as, Fulvius should have the leading of the legions.
D of Citizens, and Tuditanus receive his from M. Pomponius. The government of the former Provinces continued still in the former deputies. M. Claudius ruled Sicily, fo far as the dominion of King Hiero extended: and Larentius the Vice-Praetor had the charge of the old Province. T. Q. Fabius was high Admiral of the Navy, without any new supply or augmentation of forces. M. Fabius was employed in Greece and Macedon, with one legion, and the Amado which he had before. Q. Marullus was L. Deputy in Sardinia, having under him the old army, consisting of two legions, and C. Terentius had the administration of the affairs in Picenum, with that one legion which long time he had been Captain of. Moreover, it was decreed and agreed upon, that there should be multiplied and enrolled two new legions of Citizens, and twenty thousand men besides levied of Allies and Afofafs. With these Captains and their forces above-said they provided for E the defence and maintenance of the State and Empire of Rome, against many wars at once, either in hand already, or suspected shortly. The Centors having enrolled two legions of Citizens, and chosen a supply to make out the rent, before that they left out of the City procured the pacification of the gods, for the festiul and prodigious tokens that were reported. For the wall and gates of Rome were blasted and smitten with lightning from heaven: and likewise the Temple of Jupiter at Ariminum. Other vain objects and illusions of the eyes and ears, which men imagined they saw and heard, were believed for truths. Namely, there appeared in the river of Taurana certain reenlances and shews of Gallics, whereas indeed there were none such. And in the Temple of Jupiter Piculum which standeth in the Territory of Coff, there was heard for both ruffling of arm: and the river of Aventine seemed to run with blood. When satisfied was F made of their strange signs, the gods pleased, and all well again, according to the direction of down by the Priests and Prelates, then the Centors let forward in their expedition, Sempronius into Lucania, and Fabius into Apulia. Where it fell out, that Fabius the father repaired into the Camp at Sufcula, as Lieutenant and affiitant unto his fon. And when Fabius the younger went forth to meet him, and his Sergeant or Ulteras matching alone, said not a word to Fabius the father, nor put him aside to give way, for very reverence of his person, (such majesty he carried) the old man rode forward, and passed by eleven of the said Lictors with their bundles of rods. Then the old Centor commanded the Sergeant that was next himself to do his office: and with that said Ulter called upon old Fabius, to alight from his horse's back: and alighting, let foot ground: I did all this but to try, quoth he, my son, whether you knew well that you were a Centor or no.
G There came that might secretly to the Centor while the Camp lay there, one Cossus Altinius, an Atpinatus, with his three hondilaves, promising, that if he might have a good reward for his service, he would betray Arpi into his hands. Fabius then proposed this matter unto his Council, to be debated of. Some were of opinion, that Altinius was to be whipped and put to death fugitive runagare and false knave as he was: a common enemy and a dangerous to either part and playing with both hands, like a double-hearted hypocrify. Who first, after the over- throw at Carra (as it he might turn with the wheel of fortune and go from his word and faith-ful promise, and change even as the changers) rigned him self unto Annibal; and by his example, drew with him Arpi to revolt and rebel; now after that he feeth the Roman ciate to rise again and hold up hand (and that, beyond his hope & contrary to his desires) he would play the villain and turncoat again, and come with a new practice of a more sanguine trea-ture: as if treachery and falsehood were of the nature and quality of a judgment passed in Septemvarious courts; and if he might be allowed to carry two laces under a hood, and alter every hour, Faith's friend, that he is not to be trusted and slippery enemy not to be regarded. A good deed it were, that together with that same traitor of Falerii, and the other of King Pythus, he made a third, and were punished accordingly for exemplary justice, to teach all rogues and runnagates hereafter, how they run from their Lords and Matters. On the other side, old Fabir (the Conuls father) replied, and said, That men now daies had forgot how to make diffience of feaons, and in the very heat & midst of wars, reaoned and gave their opinion and cent face of every thing and person, as in a free time of open peace: when as indeed, we are to think, consider, and deliberate of this point, that (if possibly it might be) no more of our allies revolt from the people of Rome, rather than invite and incite them thereto: and after one is harted aside, and upon repentance returned again to the ancient amity, to fall a revelling and rebuking of him and bitter to say that he delivered to be made an example to all others. For it may be lawfull for one to turn from the Romans, and held unlawfull to return again unto the Roman: no man need doubt but shortly the Roman Empire will be foraken of all her confeders, and allies, and we shall see within a while all the Cities of Italy linked and confedered in that league and friendship with the Carthaginians. And yet (quoth he) I am not the man that thinketh Altius worthy to be trusted in any thing for all this, but I would take a mean couci and middle way between both extremities. My opinion is therefore that for this present he should be taken neither for enemy nor friend, but commanded to ward, and to have the liberty of a prisoner, and only be kept forth-coming in some confederat and trusty City, not far from the Camp during the time of the war. And when the war is once finished and ended, then I hold it good to deliberate and consult, whether that his former revolt hath deserved more punishment than this his present return meriteth favour and grace. Every man liked well of this advice of old Fabius, and gave their assent. So he was bound with chains, and himself and his company delivered over and put in custody, and a good sumnum of gold, which he had brought with him, was by commandment delivered to his wife. At Caesar he made his abode; where all the day him he went to walk at liberty, with his keepers following him, but in the night they kept him close prisoner. But at Arpi, where his home was, they of his own house began first to mis him, and seek for him: afterwards, when it was noised throughout the whole City, that he was out of the way, and could not be found: the same hereof coued a multitude, for the loss of a principal perfon as he was, thus revolted to the enemy. And for fear of alteration in the State, presently the news thereof was sent to Amidus. Who was nothing offended thereat, both because long before he had the party himself in jealousy and suspicion, as one neither full nor flesh, a man of no credit, and hardly to be trusted; and also for that he found a good occasion and quarrel to feize upon the goods of so rich and substantial a Citizen and to make sale thereof. But to the end that the world might think that he was more angery against his person, than greedy of his substance, he joyed with crudely, a grave couple aloof of judiciousness, that the one might serve as a file to give brife to the other. For having lent for his wife and children into the Camp, first he examined them straitly, for to know whether he was fled, and what store of firber and gold he had left behind him at his home; and when he had learned enough of them touching every particular, and as much as he desired, he burnt them quick to ashes.

Fabius being departed from Susetta purposed the first thing that he did to assist Arpi. Where he lay encamped a mile from the town, and after he had well viewed by near approach, the situation of the City, and confidered the wall, look where he saw it was most strong and sure, and therefore guarded most strongly and negligently, there especially he purposed to give the hottest affault. And when he had sufficiently provided and got together all ordinance and engins, requisite for the battery of Cities, he made choice of the most hardy and valiant Centurions of the whole army, and set over them certain Tribunes and Marshalls, glorious and doughty good men, and appointed unto them a Regiment of six hundred loudiers (for so many he thought sufficient for the present service) with direction and commandment, that when the trumpet sounded the relief at the fourth watch, they should bring scaling ladders to that place foreward. Now there stood a gate low and narrow, answering to the street not much used and frequented, by reason that quarter of the City was not inhabited, but flood void. That gate he gave them order first to scale and climb over, and then to go forward on the wall, and from within-forth to break down the bars, and level the said gate, and when they were Makers of that quarter of the City, then to wind the horn, and give signal to the rest of the forces to approach and come hard to the town, saying, That he would have all things in readines, and in good order. This direction was performed accordingly with great diligence, and that which was thought and feared would have been a hindrance and let unto them in the action, was the only thing which helped them mott, that they were not detected. And that was a smock of shower of rain that began after midnight, which caused the warders and watchmen to quit their flamandges, forake the Sentinels, and to fly into the houses for covert. The first noise of the horn pouring down with such a force, made that the rumbling of the loudiers could not be heard, as they were breaking down the gates; and The four and twentieb Book of T. Livius.

A as it grew after to rain more softly, and to kept still at one, it founded gently and weely in their ears, until it brought a good many of them fast asleep. Now after they had seiz'd the gate, the Marshals gave order, That the Cornetiers should be belowe in that old street aforesaid, distant equally abou'd, and to wind their horns, for to waken and raise the Conful. Which being done, according as it was before agreed, the Co6, commanded the standards and ensigns to be brought forth and somewhat before day-light entered at the said broken gate into the City. With that, the enemies at length began to rouse themselves, for now the shower and storm was past, and the day approached. There was a garrison in the City at hand of five thousand of Arpinb, his followers, armed and well appointed: and the Arpines of themselves were 5000 strong. Those the Carthaginians put in the forefront, as a forlorn hope, and opposed them against the enemy, for fear of some treacherous prank that they might play behind their backs. First, they began to arrange themselves to light in the dark, blist, and narrow lanes. For the Romans had filled and taken up not only all the streets, but also the houses that were next the gate to the end they might not be gauled with, and wound from aloft. Some Arpins and Romans fell at length to meet to take knowledge and acquaintance one of another: and to began to commune and talk together. The Romans asked what the Arpines meant to rebell: for what offence and harm given of the Romans, and for what defer and benefit received from the Carthaginians should they being natural Romans maintain war for Allies, strangers, and barbarous nations against the Romans their old friends and ancient Allies: and to to bring them into affection to Africk, to do homage and fealty, yea, and to become tributary, and to pay pension unto it. The Arpines excused and cleared themselves, saying that (simple men and ignorant in all things) were bought and sold by their great masters and principal Citizens, and lived in manner as captives and slaves under the command of some few persons that might do all. Upon this beginning, more and more of them grew to prizing and Conference. At length the Pratice of Arp himself was by his own people and Citizens brought and presented before the Conful: where, after faithful promise made between the enemys and the band of the Arpins immediately bent their forces on the Carthaginians side against the Carthaginians. The Spaniards likewise (who were not many under a thousand men) after they had capitulate and agreed with the Roman Conful, nothing but this one article, That the garrison of the Carthaginians might be sent forth and pass away safe without harm. Coming with their colours to the Conful, Then all the gates were let open for the Carthaginians to depart: and being kept away on safe conduct without any harm at all or damage unto Arminim, arrived at Selapo. Thus Arp was restored again to the Romans, without the least detriment of any onetime but one onely old traitor and now fugitive revolt. The Spaniards were appointed to have double allowance of victuals: and they performed good faithfull, and valiant service many times after to the Common-wealth.

When one of the Confuls was in Africa, and the other in Latium, one hundred and twelve men of arms. Gentlemen of the Nobility of Cape, having licence granted by the Magistrates to go out of the City, pretending to make a rode into the enemies country, and to set it in boosies and priizes, came directly into the Romans Camp lying about Selapo. And meeting with the E. Corps de guard, declared who they were, and that they would put with the Lord Deputy: Not Pal. Camillus, the General and Commander of the army there: who being adverized and certifie himselfe gave order that ten ony of all that number should be brought before him unarm'd. When he heard their facts and demand, which was nothing else but that when Cape was recovered by the Romans, they might have their goods restored unto them: he received them all into his protection. The other Praetor allo Scipio, hastened to the town Cerranum, where there were taken prisoners above one thousand men, and a good deal of copper and silver coin gained besides. At Rome there was char'd a liffel and pitiful fire, which continued two nights and one whole day. All between S. Luc. and the gate Cornemau, together with the Equines and the streets Ingrarius, were burn'd down, and made even with the ground. Likewise without the gate the fire spread all about, and in the Temples of Ternucia and Diana Munita, and Sesto conflagrate much, as well bellowed as prophano.

The same year, when all things prospered well and had good success in Spain, P. and C. both Sepeos having recovered many adorers and those of ancient league that came again to him and yielded themselves and besides, gained some new confederares for receiv'd good hope, and took heart to proceed farther, even into Africk.

Sepeo, King of the Numidians, then king fell out with the Carthaginians, and became their prolected enemy. Unto him the Sepeos address'd three Centurions as embassadors, to treat with him about a league and alliance, and to promise withall, that if he went on still to trouble and molest the Carthaginians by making war upon them, he should do him high favour to the Senate and people of Rome: that they would endeavour and bring about, that in good time and place, he should be well required for that kindness, and receive at their hands a double recompence with thanks. This embassage pleased the barbarous king right well. And after he had conferred and talked with the Embassadors, concerning military affairs, and the knowledge of warfare: and heard those old & experienced loundiers talk of war, he soon found his own wants, and how unskilful himself was in many points and feats of arms, in comparison of that methodical and orderly discipline, whereof they had discourse. The first thing then that he requested at their hands, was this: That as they were good friends and faithfull Allies, two of them would go back back with their Embassadors unto their Generals, and that the third might remain with him, to read unto him a lecture in the military science of warfare. Saying, that the nation of the Numidians were raw and altogether unskilful in footmen service, and only nimble and practiced in fight on horseback. So (quoth he) from the first beginning of our nation have our ancestors used to war; & to have weft from our childhood been enured to fight. Mary, an enemy I have, troubling and presuming much upon his Infantry, whom I would gladly be able to match every way in all kind of service. Footmen I am able to set out as well as another: for why? my Realm is populous, and yielddeth abundance of men: but altogether ignorant are, how to fit them with arms. how to meetall them, how to order and set them in battell array: insomuch as all my people in battle, go to it pell-mell, and are as a multitude huddled and thumbled together at a venture without skill, without discretion and advisement. The Embassadors answered and said, That for the present they would do according to his will and pleasure: but withal, they had his faithfull promise & word of a Prince that he should immediately send back their companion again, in case their Generals approved not their deed in that behalf. So Statuimus his name was, that left behind with the King. So Syphax sent by the two Romans his answer to the forefald Embassadors into Spain: and besides, with them other Numidians. Embassadors of his own to receive farther alliances and fidelity from the Roman Generals; unto whom he gave in charge, that forthwith they should solicite, persuade, and entice all the Numidians that were auxiliary foildiers unto the Carthaginians, and served in any Camp City or Garrison Town of theirs, for to abandon them and come to him. And Statuimus for his part, having suffered a great multitude of serviceable young men whole forth and enrolled a power of footmen, to serve in the Kings wars: and when he had forfeid them into bands and companies, and ordered them in battell array, as near as possibly he could, to the manner of the Romans: he trained them in their running to follow their colours: he taught them to keep their places in their ranks, and to double their files: and likewise he accustomed them to travel and do work: and so acquainted them with other military orders and exercises, that within short time, the King reposed as good confidence, and was as mighty in his new infantry as in his old Cavalry: and in a fort pitched field on even ground, was able to meet the Carthaginian with banner displayed, and give him the foil in a full battell. The coming of the kings Embassadors into Spain, was to the Romans also a matter of great consequence and importance: for upon the rumour and fame that went thereof, the Numidians began to fall away space, and to come thick unto the Romans. Thus were the Romans joyfull in amity and friendship with King Syphax.

When the Carthaginians had intelligence of this new alliance they addressed immediatly their Embassadors to Gala, who resigned in another part of Numidia over a nation called Maffia. This Gala had a son named Mafanius, of eighteen years of age, but a youth of such towardness, and to forward in vertue, that even then he made good and apparent shew, that he would another day enlarge his dominion, and make a more flourishing and mighty Kingdom than his father should leave it unto him. These Embassadors declared unto Gala, "That forasmuch as Syphax had entered league, and was bandied with the Romans, to the end that by their alliance and fociety, he might be more mighty and proficient against other kings and nations of Affrike; it were also better for him and much more commodious to joyne with the Carthaginians in all convenient speed: before that either Syphax passed over into Spain, or the Romans into Affrike: And Syphax (say they) may soon be defeated and overthrown now, while that he hath gained might yet, but the bare name of the Roman League. Gala was soon persuaded to lend a power of men especially at the present instance of his son, who was very desirous of that war, and to have the managing thereof. He with the help of the Carthaginian legions vanquished Syphax, and gave him a great overthrow. So as at that field there were slain, by report, in one day thirty thousand, Syphax himself in person, with some few Numidian horsemen fled back to the Maffianes, that inhabited the salt marshes, hard upon the Ocean over against Gades. But the barbarous people at the time of his coming foretold in great manner to him out of all parts, that in a short space he was able to arm an mighty host. And before he could with them cross over into Spain, which was divided from Affrike with a narrow arm of the sea, Mafanius was come with his victorious Army: who in that place, of himself, without any help or aid of the Carthaginians, gave Syphax battell to his great honour and singular glory. In Spain no memorable exploit was achieved: but that the Roman Generals allured and drew to them the able and serviceable manhood of the Celibrians, for the same hire and stipend that they bargained for with the Carthaginians: and fent from thence about three hundred Spaniards of the noblest parentage into Italy, to folicit their countrymen, who served under Ancibia as auxiliaries to follow them and take part with the Romans. This only, touching the affairs of Spain that year, is a thing worthy to be noted and remembered. That the Romans never waged foildier to serve in their war before that time, when the Celibrians began to be their mercenaries, and first received pay.
The five and twentieth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation of the City of Rome.

The Chronicle of L. Florus upon the five and twentieth Book.

Publius Cornelius Scipio, surnamed afterwards Africanus, was made Edile, before he was of lawful age; Annibal won the City Tarentum (all but the Castle, into which the Romans garrison was retired) by means of certain young Tarentine Gentlemen, who had made semblance, that they went by night and abating. The solemn place in the honour of Apollo, were now fit instated, upon occasion of certain propheticall verses of Martius, wherein the overthrow at Cannæ had been foretold. Q. Fulvia and Ap. Claudius Consul, fought fortunately against Hanno, a Duke or Captain of the Carthaginians; T. Sempronius Gramius the Pro-Consul, was by a Lucan (his host that gave him entertainment) trained into the danger of an ambush, and slain by Mago. Centenii Penula, who had served in the wars of a Centurion, being made flat unto the Senate, to have the leading of an army, and promised, if he had granted to win the victory of Annibal, and to conquer him, took the charge of eight thousand footmen, and gave battle to Annibal: but he was slain himself; and his whole army defeated and slain. Cn. Fulvius the Prætor fought unfortunately against Annibal, and left the field: in which fight there died sixteen thousand men. Himself, with two hundred horsemen fled and escaped, Apulis was besieged by Q. Fulvius, and Appius Claudius, the Consuls; Claudius Marcellus in the thirty year of the siege won Syracuse, and bare himself in that service like a worthy and noble Knight. In an intrigue and badly-rolly when the City was taken, Archimedes, whiles he was busily occupied in certain Geometrical figures and forms that he had drawn in the dust, was killed. The two Sicils, Publius, and Cornelius, after so many and so worthy exploits performed Fortunately in Spain, came to a woful and heavy end, being themselves slain there, with the loss of three hundred thousand of their whole Army, in the eighth year after that they went into Spain. And the main possession of that Province was quite lost, but for the singular manhood and industry of L. Martius, a Knight of Rome, who having rallied and gathered together the remnants of the armies, so encouraged them, that by their own forces, and several encampments, and the enemy's divisions, they were seven and thirty thousand of the enemy slain, and eighteen hundred taken prisoners, and a great rich booty obtained, Whence upon he was called Captain Martius.

The five and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

Hilles these affairs thus passed in Africa; and in Spain, Annibal employed the immerse nation in the territory of Tarentum, in hope by treason to be Master of the City of the Tarentins; in which mean while, certain baile Cities of the Salentine, and towns of no importance revolted unto him. And at the same time, of those selves States of the Bruttii, which the year before had turned, and banded with the Carthaginians, the Conentiens and Thurins were rallied wholly again to the devotion of the people of Rome. And more of them had returned likewise for L Pompionius Petentins, Captain of the Illyes; who after he had made certain rodes into the country of the Bruttii, and sped his hand with many booties, took upon him the countenance of a sufficient Colonel, and was no less pleased and having gathered a power of men, suddenly in haste, without good aduancement, fought against Hanno. In which conflict, a mighty multitude of his men were either slain or taken prisoners. But as good hap was, they were but a disordered unruly rabble of rustic clowns and bondmen; and the least lots of all other, was the Captain himself who amongst the rest was taken captive: a man as then, the author of a rash and fool-hardy fight, and had been aforetime a Publius, or farmer of the City revenues, and alviases (through his naughty practices and cunning fictions) the subject wherein he was become skillful) a disyloial person, and dangerous both to the publick State, and also to those private companies and societies, with whom he had commerce and allying. Sempronius the Conul, lying in the Lucanian country, made many light skirmishes, but not one worth remembrance, and won certain poor towns, and of small regard belonging unto the lands.

The longer that this war continued lingering, whiles prosperous successes and adverse mishap interchangeably wrought much variety and alteration as well in the inward minds of men, as in their outward state and fortune; such religious zeal and superstition (and the fame for the most part in forein ceremonies) had so seized & polished the City, that either the men or gods thereof, were suddenly all at once become clean altered and transfigured. Inomuch as now the Romans and holy observations were concerned, not only in secret, & within doors at home in their private private houses, but abroad also in the open streets, yea, and in the common place and Capitol: if wherefore they fled, alaways a fort of women that neither offered sacrifice and oblations, nor paid their prayers, and did their devotions according to the use and custom of their native country and City. Certain odd Priests and Chaplains, yea, and doting wizards and blind Prophets, had inveigled the minds and consciences of men: whole number was the greater by recency first of the rural people and peasants of the country, who for need and poverty, and for fear together, were driven to quit their lands which they had not tilled and husbanded, by rea son of the long wars, and many invasions and rodes that laid all waste, and so retired into the City: afterwords by the eafe occupation and ready means of gain which they found by the errour of others, whom they loon seduced and abused: which trade they used and practiced openly, as if it had been a I lawful art and mystery. At the first, divers good and honest persons began hastily to grieve and be offended herewith, yea, and to mutter; and utter their griefs in private: but afterwards in process of time the matter was presented before the LL. of the Council, and brake forth to open complaint in public places. The Ediles and Triumvirs Capitol were blamed much, and sharply rebuked of the Senate, for not redressing these disorders: and when they went in hand to hand the common place of this multitude and to call down, over-turn, and fling away the preparation and provision for their sacrifices and oblations, they had like to have been militated and miltichieved by the people. When this malady and milorder seemed now to be greater than might be remedied and reformed by the meaner and inferior Magistrate, M. Emilius, Praetor of the City for the time being, received Commision by order from the Senate, to see that the people were eased and delivered from this new religion and superstition. He not only read unto them in a public assembly the decree of the Senate in that behalf, but also made proclamation, Imprimis, that whoever had any books of prophecies or prayers, or treaties written of this art and science of sacrifices, should bring in all those books and writings unto him before the Calends of A prilex evening. Item, that no person should sacrifice either in public place or sacred Church, in any new form or foreign rights and traditions. And in that year there died certain publick Peafts, not wit, L. Cornelius Lencus the Arch Prelate, or high Priest: and C. Papirius Malfio, the In of Caus a Bishop. Alto, L. Fufius Flaccus a High, and C. Papirius Ma'to the In of Lucinity, A Dem-vic, deputed for holy mysteries, In place of Lencus and of Papi'rus were M. Cornelius Catibus. and Cn. Servilius Cirpubl substituted high Priest and Bishop. For Augurlyere was created L. Citius Flaminins: and L. Cornelius Lencus was chosen Decemvirs over laced ceremonies and dine service.

Now the time drew near of the solemn election of new Consuls: but because it was thought good to call the old away, busied as they were in the wars, T. Semproni on one of the Consuls, nominated for Dictator, to hold that election a forelaid, C. Claudius Cento, who named sois Generall of the Cavity F. Fufius Flaccus. This Dictator, the first comitial day following, cated to Consuls F. Fufius Flaccus also ennamed, his Generall of horsemen, and A. Claudius ales-der, who in his Praetorship had the jurisdiction and government of the Province of Sicily. In were the Pratos elected, C. Fufius Flaccus, C. Claudius Nerac, M. Junius Syllanus, and P. Carus Sulla. When the Election was ended, the Dictator resigned up his place.

That year was Edile Cornelia, together with M. Carinus (ethegus, one P. Cornelius Scipio, who surname afterwards was Africns. When he stood and made suit for the Edileship, and the bunies of the Commons were against him, objecting that he was not eligible and capable of t office for that he was not of lawful age to be a competitor: and without it: It (quoth he) the Quirites and Citizens of Rome will choose me Edile, I have years enough on my bi Whereupon, in favour and furtherance of his suit, there was such running and labouring of the Tribes for their voices that the Tribunes suddenly forced all their purpose to him him. And this was the largess and donative that the Ediles bestowed. The Roman Games according to the wealth of that time, exhibited and set out with great state and magnificence; continued one day longer than ordinary: and for every street throughout the City, was allotted a Cornuis of oyl, L. Vitellius Tappalus and M. Fundarius Fundulus, Ediles of the Commons, act ordained dames and wives of the City before the people, of dishonest and incontinent life: some of them being condemned, they forced into banishment. The Games called Plebeii, were rewined for two days: and by occasion of these games a solemn feast or dinner was kept for honour of Jupiter.

Then Q. Fufius Flaccus the third time entered the Consulship, together with Appius Clarese and the Pratos call lots for their Provinces. It fell unto P. Cornelius Sulla his lot, to have jurisdiction both of Citizens and strangers, which before was executed by twain. To Cn. F. Fufius fell Apulco to C. Claudius Nero was allotted Scipio, and M. Junius Syllanus his hap to have the rule of the Tufcans. The Consuls were appointed by decree of the Senate to war VO Annib I, and to have under their command two legions apace: and that one of them should receive his legions of Q. Fufius, the CoL of the former year: and the other take his at the hi of Fufius Continuus. As for the Pratos Q. Fufius Flaccus had Commision for the conduct the legions atLucernia, which served under Emilius Praetor there: and Nero Claudius was to the leading of those that were under the hands of C. Terentius in Picenum: and that they also provide them selves of supply to make up the full number of the Companies. M. Junius the charge of the legions of Citizens mutined the year before to serve in Tuscany: T. Sempr Grac.
Dracchius, and P. Sempronius Tuditanus continued still in the government of their Provinces, the one of Lucania, the other of Calabria, and kept their own forces. Likewise P. Lentulus governed the old Province in Sicily: M. Marcellus was Lord Deputy of Sycrae, and so far as the Realm and Dominion of King Hiero reached, T. Oelcucium Admiral of the Navy. Greece was governed (Ill) by M.V. Terius, Sardinia by Q. Marcius Sevulus, Spain by P. and Cornelius Scipio. To the old armies before, there were other two new legions levied and enrolled by the Coif. So as in all, the whole forces for that year amounted to 23 Legions.

When the Consuls should muster the soldiers, they were hindered by occasion of a seud prank played by one M. Pobulunius Pyrgens, to the great trouble and diuquiet of the State and publick peace. This Pobulunius was by his vocation and calling a Publican, who many years together for crafty and deceitful dealing, for avarice and covetousness, had not his fellow in all the City, but it was C. Pomponius Venetus again: the same man whom the year before as he betrayed the territories of the Lucans falsely and unadvisedly, the Carthaginians by the conduct of Hanno had taken prisoner. These two (forasmuch as it was concerted and intended before, that the transporting of those things which were for the provision of the armies beyond sea, should be warrantable by the City against all danger of tempest; and that all damage and loss of goods that way mis-carrying, should not lie upon the shoulders of the Publicians, who had undertaken by great force to serve the armies but be made good again out of the common Chells and Treasures;) these publicans (I say,) not only gave false information of certain shipwrigs, but also if they brought word at any time truly of some ships that were perished, they were such only as were lost by their own fraud and deceit, and not caused by chance or violent of weather. For they would freight & charge certain old vellets and thaken bottoms, with some few wares of small or no worth at all, and suffer them to sink for the nonce in the deep sea, and give the mariners and sailors with small pinaces and cock-boats prepared aoteels for the purpose: and when they had done, lie faintly and say, that they had lost met, handle and commodities in those ships of fundy forts, and of great value. These cunning parts of theirs had been the year past revealed and noticed to M. Claudius the Praetor, and the Senates by him made acquainted therewith: howbeit there was nothing done, nor any act of Sentis devised for the chastisement of the offender; because the LL. of the Coun-cil in no case would confound the company and society of these publicans and farmers, in such a time especially, when there was some need of them. Then the common people took the matter into their own hands, to procure with more severity against the avaricious and fraudulent practices. At length, two of the Tribunes of the Commons, Sp. and Lucius both Carthians, arose up and shewed themselves. For seeing how odious and inanes an indignity this was, and not to be suffered they brought M. Pobulunius in question, and laid an action and let a fine upon his head, of two hundred thousand Attic. When the day of trial was come, whether the fine aoteel should stand and be paid, or taken off and remitted; and that the Commons were assembled in so great number, that the great Court-yard of the Capitol would scarce hold the multitude: the defendant spake for himself and pleaded at large. But the only hope that he seemed to have was this, in case C. Servilius Sas, a Tribune of the Commons, a friend and near kinsman of Pobulunius, would by virtue of his office come between and stop the course of his libel; for proceeding farther before the tribunes and wards were called forth, to go together and to give their voices. The two tribunes above named, having brought forth the witnesses to depose, and their denunciations being, commanded the people to old and make way: And the lottery casket or folder was brought forth to cast lots in what Tribes the Lucians should give their voices. All this while the Publicians were excepted with Cofet to dissolve the assembly by one means or other and put off the Court for that day. The common people on the other side, called on hard and gainfast it. And as it fell out, Cofet left himself in one of the points and corners of the assembly. He will not what to do his mind was perplexed for shame of the one side, if he did not help his friend and kinsman, and for fear on the other side, because he see the people so eagerly bent. The Publicians seeing a small hope of help in him, with full intent to make him ill, and to trouble the Court, put forward forcibly and advanced themselves through a void way, seized upon an high pace, and between the Tribunes and the people, rushed in upon them, and fell to quarrel and brawl both with the people of the one side, and also with the Tribunes on the other: insomuch as they were like to go together by the ears. "and to stop the tribes for being called to scrutiny and to give their voices: and nothing else it was that kept men from committing a fray, and shedding blood, but the patience of the Magistrates themselves in that for the present, they gave place to the furious rage and malappr fas-tions of view: and for his will and pleasure brake up the assembly, before they could go together about the matter they were met for: (which the defendant himself wish force & arms was ready to stop and hinder for going forward) because they might have no occasion given them to quarrel, which was the only thing that they sought for. When this matter with all the circumstances was thronghly examined, and the best men there had spoken their minds; and given their opinion according to the nature, circumstances and dignity of the thing: and therefore the Senate decreed, that this violence tended to the breach of common peace, and the hazard of the State (a I most dangerous precedent to be fincekt) then without more ado, the two Caesaran Tribunes of the Com, laid aside, all. debating about the perilous sentence, and indited Pobliminus of a capital crime; and committed him to be arrested by a principal Sergiens, and to be led to pris-son, unless he put in good securities for his appearance to answer the cause, such as would be bound for him body or body. Pobliminus put in bail: and made default at his day. The then Tribunes called the Commons together preferred a bill unto them, which they granted to pass as a act, in this form. That if M. Pobliminus came not forth & made appearance before the Calendars of May and being cited and called that day, answered not to his name, and no lawful excuse alleged for his absence, they judged him to be a banished man, and therefore awarded his goods to be sold in port-side and himselfe to be excommunicate, and interdicted the use of water and of fire: and to lose the benefit of a Citizen forever. This done, they began also to endite all those, one after another of a capital crime, who were his abettors, and the movers and fathers of a sedition and conuction of the people and to call for personal pledges. At the first they committed as many of them as could, and no more, except such as were sufficient to put in bail. For the avoicing of which danger, most of them departed into voluntary exile. This was the end of the Publi-ans fraudulent dealings; and this was the issue of their audacious enterprize, in defence and maintenance of their gilde and deci-

After this, a solemn Court was called for the creation of the Arch-Prelate, and M. Cornelius Cethegus newly elected Prelate, was the President of this election. Three competitors there were, who used for that Preacy, and firved earnestly one against the other: namely, Q. Fabius Flaccus, L Cornfus for the time being, who also had before been two: Cornful, and Centiforbes; also *T.
Madinus Terquatus*, a man of great reputation, for that he had been likewise dignified with a double Centifhip, and one Centifhip: and last of all, P. Licinius Crassus, who as yet, was to ice for the Archippe: howbeit, this young man in that fate and contention was Addition, and carried it away from those, great, ancient, and honourable persons. Before him, for the space of an hundred and twenty years, there had not been created any one the highest Priest, (tke only P. Cornelius Cethegus) but had sat before in the Ivory Chair and born office of State. The Cornful had much ado to go through with the Levy, and to enroll the full legion of fouldiers, by reason that the small number of young and able men would hardly afford both to furnishe the new legion of Citizens, and also to supply and make up the old. Howbeit the Senate would not suffer them to give over their enterprise which they were about, but agreed that there should be cho-en two Terrisons of Tribunus: the one fort of them to be entt out, within the compass of fifty miles every way from Rome, the other to go farther: with commission to take good view and forvoy, within what that precinct and without, in all through-fares and market towns: in boroughs and places of frequent assemblies: of all persons of free condition that they could fey eye on: and so many as they thought able men of body to bear arms, although they were not come to the humble age for service, to pros them for fouldiers. Also it was decreed, that the Tribunes of the Commons: they prosecuted, should put up a bill, that all under seventeen years of age, who had bound themselves by military oaths, should have as good pay, as if they had been enrolled fouldi-ers at seventeen years of upward. By virtue of this decree, the two Terrisons aforesaid of the N Tribunus being chosen, made diligent search, and visited all the country over for free-born men accordingly.

At the same time letters came from M. Marcellus out of Sicily, concerning the demands of these fouldiers who served under P. Lentulus, and they were read in the Senate House. That army confisted of the senate which remained after the field lost at Cammas, and was confined into Italy (as hath been before) with this condition, not to return back into Italy before the Punic was wholly ended. Those fouldiers obtained licence of Lentulus to lend as Emislladors unto Marcellus (where he lay in winter harbour) the principal men of arms, such as served on horses allowed by the City, the chiefie Centurions also the bravest fouldiers and choice flower of the Legions. One of these in the name of the rest, having liberally granted them for to speak, made his occasion in this wise: We had come to you into Italy M. Marcellus, when you were Confal, immediately upon that decree made against us (which if it were not unjust and unmentionable, yet surely it was heavy and rigorous enough: but that we hoped to be let into this Pro-vice (to generally troubled and out of order by the death of the KK, there to be employed in some dangerous and cruel war against the Sicilians and Carthaginians both at once, and so with our blooded and grievous wounds to make satisfaction for our tredows unto the Magistrates and rulers of Rome. Like as in our fathers' daces, which were taken prisoners

A by King Pyrrhus before Heraclæus, made amends for their fault by their good service against the same Pyrrhus. And yet, I can not see, [my LL., of the Senat] for what ill deed of our parts, ye either have been displeased aforetime, or are offended at this present with us. For me thinks, I see both Consuls, and the whole body of the Senat, of Rome, when I behold your face, O Marcellus: whom if we had had to our Consul at Carthage, it would have gone better both with the Common-weal, and with our selves, then it did. For I beseech you, suffer us now, before I make moan, and complain of our hard state and condition, to purge our selves of that crime for which I blame, Set cæle, that neither the wrath of the Gods, nor deifying and fatal necessity (upon the Law and decree whereof dependeth the invariable order and infallible course and consequence of all things in the world) was the cause that we were defeated & overthrown at Carthage, but our own selves, and our default was the occasion: let us see then, who fault it was, the foeldiers, or the Generals? For mine own part, I remember I am a foeldier, and of my Captain and General I will never speak but well: of him especially, unto whom I know the Senat rendered thanks for that he depaied not of the common-wealth: and who government ever since his flight and running away, hath been prostrated from year to year, and who hath had the conduct of armies continually. Neither will I say ought of the rest likewise, who escaped that unfortunate foil and defeat, I mean our military Tribunes and Colonels, who (as we hear lay) use for dignities, bear honourable offices in City, sea, and role whole Provinesses as Rome, Princes in foreign parts. It is so indeed my LL, do ye easily pardon and forgive your own selves and children? and deal ye so hardly, so rigorously and cruelly, against us bale-abject persons, and vile wretches? And was it no shame and dishonor imputed to the Consul and other great personnages of the State to flee, when there was no other hope? and were the poor foeldiers sent by you into the field with this intention, to be all killed up and none to escape? At the batall of Aulis, the whole army in a manner fled away: Also at the fraughts of Caudine: (to say nothing of other shameful foils of our armies) the host yoked up their armor to the enemy, before they joyned battle, and fought one strok. Yet, so far off it was, that those armies inflamed any inflamy and shameful reproach therefore, that both the City of Rome was recovered again by the means of those Regiments which fled from Aulis to Vacca, and also the Caudine ligeons which returned to Rome, naked were sent: again into Samnium well armed: who subdued D and brought under the yoke of subjection the very same enemies, who had taken in pride and joy in that dishonour and ignominy of theirs. And now, for the army before Carthage, any man able to come forth and charge them jutly, that either they fled, or for cowardly fear behaved themselves unequely, and not like foeldiers: Where were slain in field above fifty thousand men: from whence the Consul fled with fifty Horsemen, and no more: and of which company there is not one remittach alive, but whom the enemy, weathy with killing, spared and left. I remember, at what time as the prisoners taken there, were denied money to pay for their ransom, then every man commanded and prais'd us, for saving and relieving our selves against another day, to be employed in the service of the Common-weal: for returning unto Samnium to the Consul, and for making a good show of a compleat army. But now, in worst case we are, than in out E fathers days, captives have been that were taken prisoners. For they only had their armor and weapons charged for worse, their rank in the battal shifted, their place in the camp where they should quarter altered: which notwithstanding, they recovered again at once by performing their good devoir to their country and winning a victory in one unfortunat battal. Not one of them was ever confined (as it were) to a place of exile: none put beside hope to be diff charg'd from foeldiery by leaving out his full time: and to be brief: they were let to fight with some enemy or other, where they might once for all either lose their life, or end their dis honor. And we, against whom nothing can be objected at all, unless it be this, that we were the caule, and none but, that some citizen of Rome might be laid to remain alive of all those that were at the battal of Carthage: we say, are sent far enough off, not only from our native country, and F Iulus but also from all enemies: where we was old in exile, to the end, that we should have no hope, no occasion and opportunity to wipe away and cancel our disgrace: to mitigate and pacifie the anger of our fellow-citizens, and finally to die with honor. But it is neither end of shame, nor reward of virtue and valour, that we desire and crave: but only that we might be permitted to make proof of our courage, and shew our prowess. Pains and perils we seek for, and to be employed in dangerous adventures, like hardy men and brave foeldiers. Two years already there hath been sharp and hot war in Sicily. Some Cities the Carrthaginians won by force, other some the Romans took likewise by assault, Whole Regiments of foot, many troops and corpers of Horse encounter together, and affall one another. At Syracuse there are great enterprizes and worthy feats of arms, both by Sea and Land. The fight of them that fight the G very clattering and ringing again of their armor and weapons, we can hear where we are, and we sit still like idle lunks: and do nothing: as if we had neither hands nor weapons to fight with, T Sempronius the Consul, with legions of bond-slaves, hath bidden battel to the enemies, and fought with them in plain field to oot, that they are well recomposed for their labour with gaining their freedom first, and then the Burgoyne of the City. Let us yet, in place and quality at lastwise, of bondslaves taken up and bought for money against these wars, fight with those enemies, as well as they have done, and by our fight trie, whether we can regain our enlarged and liberty. Wil you your self, O Marcellus make tryal of us, and of our valour by Sea, "by by Land, in pitched field, and battled ranged, or in giving assaults and winning of walled Towns?

Put us to it, and spare not. The hardest enterprises, the most painful and dangerous enterprises, are they which we require most gladly: that we may have that be time, and at once, which we should have come unto at Careful; seeing that all the time we have lived since, hath been defined to our ignominy and disgrace.

At these words they fell down prostrate at Marcellus his feet, Marcellus answered them, that he had neither power of himself, nor commission otherwise, to content them, and satisfie their request. Howbeit, write to the Senate he would: and according as the L.L. should give advice and direction, so he would do and not fail. These letters (as I said before) were brought to the Confuls; and by them read in the Senate-houre. And after deliberate consultation about their contents, the Senate passed this decree: That as concerning those soldiers, who had forsaken their fellows fighting before Careus, the Senate should not reason, why they should be put in trust any more with the affairs of the Common-wealth; but it M. Claudius the Proconsul thought it good otherwise, he might do according to that which he judged convenient; and to stand with his own credit, and the safety of the State. Provided always, that not one of them be dispensed with, and freed from service or charge of foouldiery: nor rewarded with any military gift in testimonio and token of his valour: nor yet reduced home again into Italy, so long as the enemy made abode there.

After this, the Pretor for the City, by virtue of a decree from the Senate, and an act of the Commons, assembled the people together. In which Session were created five Commissioners called Dumugnares, for the reedsifying and repairing of the turrets and the walls: Likewise two other fraternities of Trimiviris, the one for taking an inventory of all sacred things, and to sign and note all offerings and oblations: the other for reedsifying the Temples of Fortune and dame Minerva within the gate Careus, and likewise of Jupiter without the gate, which the year past were consumed by fire. Great and fearful tempelis happened this year. On the Alban mount it rained stones continually for two days. Many places were blased and blotted with lightnings from Heaven; and namely, two Chappels in the Capitol, and the Rampier about the camp and fort above Sestryens in divers places thereof: and two watchmen in their Sentinels flenke flark dead. The wall and certain turrets thereon at Careus, not only blotted but also shaken down and overthrown with lightnings and thunder-bolts. At Rome there was a great houne to flie to, and into the air. The sun also appeared more red than it useth to be, and like to blend. In regard of these prodigious fights, there was a solemn Procession and supplication all one day: and the Consul for certain days together, attended only upon Divine service of the Gods: and the Novendial Sacrifices were deservingly celebrated nine days together.

Now whereas a long time already both Amikel hoped, and the Romans also suspected that the Tarentins would revolt: there fell out between, an occurrence and outward accident, which hastened it the rather. There was one Phere a Tarentine, who having abode long at Rome under colour of an Embassador leger, a busy head man, and of an unequil spirit, one that of all things could not away with rest and peace, in which so long as he lived thought every day a year, and that now he was waxen old and aged therein, found means to have access unto the hoandings of the Tarentins. He kept them in the Close belonging to the Temple of Liberty, with the least attendance and careful eye because it was expeditious and good neither for themselves, nor for their City, to make an escape, and deceive the Romans. These hostaged he had oftentimes olllicitly and perniciously; by much talk and many reasons, and at length having bribed and corrupted two lestons and warders of the said Temple, he trained them forth in the evening out from the place where they were in late custody: and when he had accompanied them onward on the way as a guide, did direct them how to pass secretly, he fled himself and they together. By day break the next morning they were missed, and their escape was noted throughout the City: Wherupon men were sent out after them from all parts, to fetch them in again: who having overtaken them at Tarentina, laid hold of them, and brought them back to Rome: where in the Careus they were, by the content of the people, beaten with rods, and then thrown down headlong from the cliff Tarpæa.

The cruelties of this punishment, caused much anger; and provoked two of the noblest and most famous Cities in Italy to indignation, not only in publick generally, but also in private particularly: according as any man was either in blood joyned, or in alliance and friendship linked to them who were thus foully and shamefully put to death. Amongst whom there were about thirteen noble Gentlemen of Tarentum, conspired together and the chief of them were Nicco and Philemon. These conspirators before they would stir and enter into any action, thought bett to speak and confer with Ambell first; and to having gone forth of the City under a pretence as if they went to the chase a hunting, by night they came unto him. But when they drew near unto the camp, the red hid themselves within a wood near unto the high way: Nicco and Philemon only went forward to the watch, and there being taken (as they requested themselves,) were brought before Ambell. Who when they had delivered unto him their complaint and upon what occasions they entered into that delention they were highly commended, and promised great rewards and waifed and charged by him, that to the intent they might bear their countrymen in hand, how they ever went out of the City to fetch in some booties, they should drive after them into the City, certain cattel of the Carthaginians, which were put out to pasture and feeding; and

A and herewith gave them his word to do it safely, and without any imprisonment and resistance whenever. Thus these Gentlemen were seen to bring in good store of cattle: and as they were known to make his adventure the second time and after till, men marvelled the less at the matter, and suspected nothing. Now upon a new parling and communication with Ammabo, they covenanted with him upon his faithful promise in the terms, Impromis, for the Tarrentines themselves, to enjoy freely their Lands and goods, and live under their own laws. Item, to pay no pension nor tribute unto Ammabo, nor be forced to receive a garrison against their wills. And last of all, to betray the garrison soldiery of the Romans, and all their fortresses and places of strength deliver up into the hands of the Carthaginians. When those conditions and capitulations were agreed upon, then Philemones sued much other to go forth and come again in the night: and as was known to be a great hunter, and much delighted in that exercise, he had his hounds following him at his heels, and all other furniture about him fit for huntmen: and lightly ever he took some wild beast or other with his hounds, or else got something from the enemy, that of purpose lay ready for his hands: and always as he brought home ought with him, he would belittle it either upon the Captain of the Roman garrison, or deal it among the warders of gates. And they all, verily believed and were persuaded, that his going out and in thus, that by night, was only for fear of the enemies. Now, when he had used this so accustomably, that he had made it an ordinary practice, to so much, that at what time of the night to ever he had but once lured or whistled the gate was lighted, and open for him: then Ammabo thought it time, to put the plot above said in execution. Three days journey he was off; Where being he would have men the lese marvail, why he kept a standing camp so long in one place he signified and made himself sick. The Romans also, that lay in garrison at Tarrentum, gave over to inspect his long abode and leaguering there. But after that he was determined and resolved to advance toward Tarrentum, he picked out ten thousand foot and horsemens together, whom he imposed for nimble bodies, swift footmanship, and lightness of armor, to be most meet for expeditio: and with them at the fourth watch of the night, he marched forward with his ensigns. And having sent out his horse fourtide Numidian light Horse: he commanded them, to ride about and scour all the ways on every side, and to call their eye to clipe and discover all the coasts, that no country people a far off might defery and view the army on foot, but they should be seen: and withal, to D bring in, as many as were gone before, and kill all them they met and encountered: to the end that the Peasants there inhabiting, might think they were Thieves and Robbers, rather than the vandarierers and fore-riders of an army. Himick in person marching with great speed and celerity, pitched his camp almost 15 miles from Tarrentum. Neither would he there, be known unto his men of his purpose, nor tell them whither they should go: only he called his soldiers together, and charged them to hold on the direct way, and not suffer any one to turn aside: nor in the march go out of his rank or file: and above all things, to be ready for to receive their charge and commandement from their Captains, and do nothing without their warrant and commission. As for himself, he would when he saw his time let them know his mind: and what service was that he would have done. And about the fame very hour and inflants news came as far as Tarrentum that E some few Numidian Horsemen forraged the country, and had put the villagers in great fright all about. At which tidings, the Captain of the Roman garrison was no more moved, nor made any other halt, but only gave order, that some of the Horsemen the next morning by day light should ride forth, to keep the enemy from further excursions. In the mean time, they had this charge, bare themselves to carefully in providing themselves to execute that which they were comman- ded, that contrary-wise, they took those outrodes of the Numidians for a good argument, That Ammabo with his army was not dislodged, but abode still in heaguer where he lay first. Ammabo when it was once dark and dead night, began to set forward. Philemones was there ready to be his guide, loden with his game hunted as his manner was. The left of his conspiracy waited their time to execute their several charges, as it was agreed among them. Now it was ordered between them aore, that Philemones coming in at the minall little wicket, with his vention that he had hunted, should bring in with him some armed men: and Ammabo on another part, come to the gate called Tarrentum, which looked toward the East, and stood on the Land side of the City, a good way within the wall, as it were in a nook. When Ammabo approached the said gate, he made a fire, in token that he was come (as it was devided between them before) and it flamed forth and gave a shining light. The like did Nicot again. Then the fires on both sides were put out, that they made no more blaze. And Ammabo in great and still silence, led his army close to the gate. Nicot came sudainly at outwares upon the watchmen left asleep killed them in their beds, and opened that gate. Ammabo entred with his Regiment of footmen and commanded the cavalry to stay behind, to the end they might have liberty of open ground to ride, whithersoever there was need. Q and as occasion required. Now by this time, Philemones also was come nearer to that little gate on the other side, where he used to make his egress and ingress to and fro. And when he had raised the watchman with his voice to wel known and with his whistle whereby now he was familiarly acquainted, & said withal, that he was troubled with lugging and lugging of a foul heavy beast: therewith the wicket was set open. Two fibly fellows there were carrying in the wild bores between them, and he himself followed with one of the huntmen, lightly & nimby appointed, and whilst the watchman his eye was upon the two porters that carried the beast, wondering at the bigness of the bone, and took no heed to himself, Nicot thrust him through with his spear. Then tred in after them, about thirty men armed, who killed the rest of the watch, and brake down the great gates withal: and immediately there entered the companies with banner displayed: and so, forth from thence they were conducted and brought to the market place, without making any noise, and there joined themselves to Ambusc. Then Ambusc divided two thousand Gauls into three Regiments, whom he set into sundry parts of the City, and gave order to the Tarentins and the African, to get possession of the most principal and populous places of the City; and when the cry and shout was once up, to kill all the Romans wherever, and to spare the Townsmen. But to the end that this might be orderly done, he gave direction to the young Gentlemen storeward of Tarentum, that so soon as they espied a far off, any of their own Citizens and Country-men, they should bid them be quiet and still, to hold their peace, to be of good cheer and fear nothing. By which time, they began to set up a shout and cry, as men use to do in a City taken by assault, but what the matter should be, no man of the Town or garrison could certainly tell. For the Tarentin inhabitants supposed verily, that the Roman soldiers of the garrison were risen up to sack the City: the Romans on the other side, thought that the Townsmen mutinied, and they were in doubt of some traitorous practice. The Captain himself awakened and raised at the first tumult, escaped to the key, where he took a small Barge or wherry-boat, and fled to the Castle. The Trumpet also that sounded from the Theatre, made the greater terror: for it was both a Roman Trumpet, provided beforehand for the purpose by tho'ke Trattors, and a Greek blew it, one who had no skill: and so it was doubtful, both who he was that sounded, and who they were that gave signal unto. When day appeared, and the Romans saw the armament of the Carthaginians and Gauls then they will well in what door the wind was, and how the World went: and the Greeks seeing the Romans lying along every where brain, were soon aware that the City was taken by Ambusc. But after it was broad day light, and that the Romans who remained unkill'd, were fled into the Castle, and the noise and tumult suddenly began by little and little to slack and give over: then Ambusc commanded the Tarentins to be called to a general assembly, and to present themselves without arms. When they were all come together, but only those who with the Romans were fled for company into the Castle, there to abide in a fortune as they: Ambusc spoke kindly unto the Tarentins, gave them good and friendly words, rehearsed with great pretention what favors he had shewed to all their Citizens, whom he had taken prisoners either at Tralles or at Caere: and withal, after he had bitterly in sighed against the Lordly and proud rule of the Romans, he commanded every man to repair home to his own house and let his own name upon his doore for that Romans house as had not the name written upon them of the Master thereof, he would presently upon sound of Trumpet, command to be riled, Over and beside that, if any one should have his own name, and set it on the door or lodging-house of a Roman (for he saw divers of their houses empty) he would take him for an enemy and deal with him accordingly. After this speech ended, and the assembly dissolved, when the doors were marked with their titles and inscriptions storeward, whereby the houses of friends and enemies were known distinctly one from another: the signal was given by sound of Trumpet: and then there was running every where from all parts to ransack the lodgings of the Romans. And some pretty sprinkling of villager they met withal. The next day after, he advanced against the Castle to assault it, which he had never impregnable and not possible to be won, either by forcible assault, or by artificial devices of fabricke and engines, by reason that both the Sea came to it, whereas the greater part thereof was compass'd, in manner of a demy land, and also fortified besides on another part with exceeding high and steep rocks: and withal, fenced from the City with a strong wall and deep ditch: therefore, because he would neither let nor hinder himself from achieving greater affairs, while he was thereby bided only about defending the Tarentins, nor yet leave them without a strong guard, for far left the Romans from out of the Castle, might at their pleasure come upon them, he determined to raise a rampart for a partition between the Castle and the City, for their defence against the said garrison. And he was not out of hope, that then when the Romans should offer to illume forth to hinder the said work, they might also be fought withal: and in case they adventures rashly ran on, and engage themselves too far, they might be cut off in their heat, and the forces of the garrison might be so diminished and abated by some great slaughter & execution that the Tarentins of themselves should be able with ease to defend their City against them. The said work was not so soon begun but the Romans all of a sudden, set open the Castle gate and charged upon the pioneers as they were labouring about their work. The guard that attended for the defence of the workmen, and flood before their work, fell off and suffered themselves to be put back, to the end that the enemies upon their first success, should be more advantageous supposyng that the further they gave ground, the more of the other would follow after and chase them, Which being perceived the Carthaginians whom Ambusc had kept close for this purpose, and had in readiness very wel appointed, role out of all parts, and made head again. Neither were the Romans able to abide their terrible violence, and die they could not, in miliardess by occasion that the straightness of the place would give no leeway: and besides, many things lay in their way: partly, the work that was begun and partly, other provision of flute brought for the same which mightly hindered and impeached them. Most of them fell headlong into the trench: and were thus more perilish'd in their flight, than were killed in the fight. After this the fortification was in and again, and none durst venture to hinder it. So he cast a mighty deep ditch, and raised an high rampier within it. Also behind it, a pretty distance of he went in hand to build a more or wall to it, in the very same quarter; that they might be able even without any guard at all, or strength of men, to defend themselves against the Romans. Howebeit, he left them an indifferent band of banditiers, which might withstand out somewhat in making of the wall. Himself then departed with the rest of his army as far as the River G. Iphes five miles off from the City, and there encamped. From which standing camp, he came back once again to survey the work: and finding that it went better toward than he looked for, he began to conceive some good hope that the citadel also might be won by assault. For why it was not defended surely by situation on high ground, as others were, but setted on a plain and divided from the City, by a wall only and a ditch. Now when as it began to be assailed with labours, and artillery devised of all sorts, there hapned a new supply to be sent from Metapontum to aid the garrison: whereby the Romans took heart unto them, to so much as in the night time of a sudden and before they were looked for, they set upon the labours and ordinance of the enemies planted thereupon: some they cast down and overthrew, others they fired and consumed. And there amend of Annibal his affault of the Castle from that tide.

The only hope behind now, was in continual siege: and yet that hope promised no great effect, because they that held the Castle had the Sea free at their command, all that side, whereas the said fort (standing as it were in an half island) overlooked the mouth of the haven: and the City contrary-wise, was wholly excluded from all enterance of passage and commodities coming in by Sea, and like were they that besieged the fortrese, to feel the want and scarcity of victualls, than those that were besieged within it. Then Annibal after he had called together the principal citizens of Tarantum, laid open unto them all, the present difficulties, saying: "That he neither saw any way to win by force the Castle so strong and fortified as it was, nor had any hope at all to gain it by siege, so long as the enemies were Lords of the Sea. But if they had ships once, whereby they might hinder and stay the coming in of their victualls and other commodities, the enemies immediately would either quit the piece, or yeald themselves. The Tarantines held well with that, and approved the device. But (say they) he that giveth us that counsel, must also afford us means to effect the fame. For the Carthaginian ships if they were sent for, and fet out of Sicily might well do the least: many, as for our own which lie that up as it were, within a little creek and bay, consider that the enemy keepeth the mouth and entrance of the haven, how is it possible that they should get out from their harbour into the open Sea, and pass without danger? Pass (quoth he) they shall, make no doubt of that. Many things, I tell you, considered in their own nature are number one and difficult, but by policy and wit of man are easily welded and wrought with alight, Ye have a City here leated upon a plain and champain ground, the ways answerin to every side of it are even, large and broad enough, yea, and open to all quarters. I will chuse that way which croseth the midst of the City, and passeth along to the haven and the Sea, and so will carry and transport the ships upon waies, with no great ado and trouble. And so, both the Sea shall be ours clear, which now the enemies keep, and also we shall believe the Castle round, as well by Sea as by Land: nay, more than that, within short time we shall either enter it, being abandoned of the enemy, or else be masters both of it and them together.

These words not only put them in good hope, that the enterprize would be effectued, but also let them in a wonderful good concite and admiration of the Captain himself. Then out of hand, all the waies and carthes were taken up from all places as many as could be had, and were put together, and coupled one to another. Divers canes and other instruments were fet to, to draw up the ships to Land the way made plain and level, that the cars might go more easilie, and pas away with less trouble and more expedition. After this they got together draught oxen cart jades and other working beasts, yea, and men also for to draw: and thus the work was libly begun, inonuch, as within five days, the fleet well rigged, appointed, and drefted, was brought about the Castle, and rid at anchor even in the avenue & entry of the haven. In these terms flood Tarantum, when Annibal left it, and returned back to his wintering harbours. But authors write diversly of this revolt of Tarentum, whether it happeneth the year paft, or at this present. But the greater number of them, and those that lived nearer to that time, when the remembrance of these matters was freth, affirm that it was this very year.

At Rome, the Consuls and Pretors both remained till the fifth day before the Calends of May, by occasion of the Latin holy-days, upon which day, when they had performed a solemn sacrifice, with all complements thereto belonging, on the Alban Hill, they departed every one to his several charge and Province. After this, there crept into the minds of men a new irruption of confidence upon certain prophetical verses of one Martius, a noble and famous Prophet in times paft. Now, by reason that in the year before, there was diligent search and inquisition made, for such books of Fortune, according to a decree granted out of the Senate, those verses came to light, and to the hands of M. Aemilius Pretor of the City, who put them upon that communion. And he immediately gave them to Sulla the new Pretor. Of two Prophecies of Martius, the one, which afterwards carried the greater authority with it, by reason of the event that happened to right, and declared it so evidently, caufed the other also, whereof the time was not yet come, to be of credit and believed. The former contained a Prediction of the overthrow at Cannae, in these or such like words:
From Trebiana lines, O Rome, at once defended, Ele Canna River, near to Canna Town: Left strangers born, who have by death intended, Force thee to fight on Diomedes his own, But warning mine, thou wilt not lift upon,
Until with blood thy weft do fill the plain;
And then to sea from fruitful Land, now Thy men shall down the stream by thousand plain, Thy steps must bent the fish in Ocean deep.
And lure the plenty, as from high to prey,
And feed wild beasts, on earth below that keep.

Mark well my words, O Rome, till I am taught to say.

And they who had been foundiers, and served in those wars, knew as perfectly Diomedes his plans, and the River Canna, as they did the very defeat it self, and loosed at Canna. Then was the other Prophecy likewise read, which was the darker of the twain: not only because future things are more uncertain than those which are past already; but also by reason of the kind of writing, which was more obscure and intricate, in these terms:

If enemies ye would expel, if batch and plague ye sore
* Sent from a far, ye would drive forth, and vexed be no more;
To Phocbus (Romans) I advise, ye went from year to year
To set forth places in solemn wise, with word and woe mighty clear.
From public kirk, the people set, part of the change disclose.
The rest should ye, for your and yours, despot, be ye fierce.
The sacrifice, the Priests must presume these games to be perform'd, Who sit in place, mean to please, and for all wrongs reform'd.
Then shall the ten Decemvirs fight, the Greek's victor observe,
In flames be called sacrifices, and nothing from them forever.
If all be done accordingly, your joy shall are increase,
Your State shall daily grow in wealth, and fruits of blessed peace.
For God Apollo will you save, he will your feet defend,
Who at their pleasure west your fields, and make you much annoy.

For the explanation and expiation both, of this prophesy, they took one whole day, and the morrow after, there passed a decree from the Senate, That the Decemvirs should peruse and look into the books of Sibylla about the exhibiting of those said games, in the honour of Apollo, and celebrating likewise of the sacrifices. And when all was perused, and relation made before the Senate: the Lords made an Act, and set down an order: First, to vow and set forth solemn parades accordingly, to the honour of Apollo. Item, After the Games were done and finished, to allow the Priests twelve thousand Ases, toward the expenses of the divine service, and two great beasts for sacrifices. There passed also another Act of the Senate, That the Decemvirs should celebrate divine service, and sacrifice after the oblation and rites of the Graces: and offer upon the Altar these beasts, to wit, an OX with guided horns, and two white female Goats, with guided horns likewise, for Des Ap Io: and a Cow with horns, in like manner guided, for Dame Latona. The Priests, when they was to represent the Games within the Circus Maximus, gave commandment, and made proclamation, That the people, during the time of those solemnities, should contribute money, for an offering to Ap Io, every man according to his ability, and as he might well spare. This is the beginning of the Apollinaris Games and Plays, exhibited for to obtain victory, and not for to escape some plague or pestilence, as most men suppose. And when they were celebrated, the people was to behold and look on, adorned with garlands upon their heads, and the dames and matrons of the City were in procession, and made supplications. Every man's door was set open, and they feasted and made good cheer generally through the City in the open streets; and a high holyday this was, solemnied with all kind of ceremonies that could be devised.

But to return again to Annibal, who was about Trebutium: and both Consuls remaining in Samnium, but ready, as it seemed, to besiege Capua: it fell out that the Campanians already were distrest with hunger and famine, (a calamity that usually followeth long and continual siege) and the reason was, because the armies of the Romans had impeached and hindered their feeding. Therefore they dispatched Embassadors to Annibal, beseeching him that he would take order for grain to be brought into Capua, from all parts near adjoining, before that the Consuls were come abroad with their legions into their territory, and all the wayes belte, and passages stopped by the guards and companies of the enemies. Whereupon, Annibal gave direction to Hannibal, that he should remove out of the country of the Brittsi, and passe over with his forces into Campania, and endeavour so, that the Campanians might be provided of sufficient store of corn, Then

Heir and aid, That right and overlodged he called for the late convoy thereof. After this, he sent a messenger to the consuls, to give them notice, upon what day they should attend, and be in readiness to receive their corn; and against the time, provided out of the country for the carriage, carts, wains, and draught-beasts, and pack-horses of all sorts. But the Romans did as they carried

B themselves in all things chearfully and regularly, so in this they were very slack and thoughtless: for they lent little above forty carts, and some few beasts for carriage besides. For which they had a check given them, and were rebuked by Hanno; because that hunger, which caused the very beast to bidder it left and make hard shifts, was tolerable to prick them forward to be more careful about their own business. So there was a farther day appointed for to load their corn, and to come more furnished and better provided for. A this being reported to the men of Bereniceum, with the circumstances and particulars, as it was, they addressed with all speed ten Embassadors to the Roman Consuls, encharged them about Bereniceum. Upon which intelligence given of the affairs at Carthage, they took order, and agreed between themselves, that that of them should conduct an army into Carthage. And Ptolemas, who undertook that charge,

C marched by night to Bereniceum, and put himself within the walls of the Town. And there he was advertised by them that devout near hand. That Hanno was gone out with part of his forces, for to pursue them: that there were 1000 carts com, with a rude and disorderly multitude of people, without armor; that all that they did was in hurly, in hubbub, and great fear; and finally, that the camp was out of form and fashion, and all good military orders were gone, by reason of a rabble multitude of country cowards come out of those quarters, and encumbered amongst them. The Consuls, being informed for certain of the particulars of these things, gave their foudiers warning to make ready against the next evening, nothing but their engines and weapons, for that they were to charge upon the camp of the Carthaginians. And so they set forward at the relief of the fourth watch, having their packs and trusses all their baggage behind them at Bereniceum: and presenting themselves before the camp, somewhat before day, they put them into an holy body fear, and so terrified them, that if it had been pitched upon a plain ground, it had been won at the first attack. But the height of the place, and the rampiers and fortifications besides, which could not possibly be escaped upon, without climbing upon the steep hill with much difficulty, were a defense unto it. But day light there was a most affright given, and a hot skirmish begun, but the Carthaginians not only defended and kept their rampier, but also (as having the vantage of the ground) they charged and thrust the enemies back, as they mounted up the hill. Howbeit, rare hardiness overcame all hardships and difficulties whatsoever; for in diverse places at once they advanced as far as the banks and trenches; but it cost bloody blows first, and the death of many a foudier. The Consuls therefore

D calling the Coronels and Marshals together, said, it were not amiss to give over until their haste and heady attempts, and as he thought, it was the later course, for that day to retire the army to Bereniceum, and on the morrow to encamp themselves about the enemy, to the end that neither the Camps might get forth, nor Hanno return and enter into the Town again. And that this might be the former effected, and with a great deal more ease, he would send for his Colleague also with his army, and both of them jointly bend their forces that way. But these devices of the Capt in general were soon defeated. For as he was about to found the retreat, the foudiers with a loud voice cried out, that they could not away with such faire Captains; they feared to be commanded in so cold and slothful service: they would none of that: and so put the Conspirata of their bent. It happened, that next unto the gate coming into the enemies camp, there lered

E a cohort or company of the Peiligni, led by Captain Fulvius, who caught the bower out of the bearer his hand, and flung it over the rampier and with that fell to curing himself and his company both, with a flame light upon him and them to; if the enemies were away with that banner; and therewith he himself the way, and brake first through the trench, and over the palisado into their camp. Now by this time the Peiligni fought within the rampier: and then Valesius Flaccus a Coronel of the third legion from another side fell to uphold the Romans, and hit them in the teeth with their bestly and most determined in order of taking the camp. Whereupon P. Pedemus (a centurion of the Regiment called Principes, and sitting in the first plate thereof) took likewise an ensign from him that carried it, and withal. Now shall quoth he this ensign, and this Centinere (meaning himself) prettily be within the rampier of the enemies: let me see who dare follow, and face it from being taken by the enemy. At first, his own band and company followed him hard at heels, as he climbed to get over the rampier, and then the whole legion came after likewise. But this time, the Consuls also facing their foudiers climbing over the rampier, charged his purpose, and was of a clean other mind: and from calling, and rekindling their foudiers back, fell to exhort and encourage them, shewing in how great hazard and danger a right hardy and valiant cohort of allies were, and the whole Legion of Citizens besides. They all therefore set to and every man did his best: and not with landing there was many a dare driven and javelin hurled, notwithstanding the enemies opposed posed their armor and bodies full against them yet they never flinted to aby every place, as well as high as low, until they were broken through, and gotten in. Many a man was hurt (ye may be sure) but yet even they that bled until they fainted, and were not able to fight any longer, carried this mind and force withal, to die yet within the rampart of their enemies. Thus in the burning of an hand the camp was won, as easily as if it had been pitched upon a plain and even ground, and not fortified at all with trench and rampier. From this time now, there was no more fighting, but killing on all hands in that tumult and confusion of bell-mell within the camp. Slay there were of enemies more than six thousand, and above seven thousand taken prisoners, toger-

The Campins also having heard, as well of their own losses as of their allies, sent Embelladors to Ambibol, to certify him; "That both the Conuls were at Beneventum, that the war was within a dayes journey of Capua, and but a lepp from the very gates and walls of the City; and unless he made good halt to succour and rescue them, Capua would sooner come under the obedience and subjection of the enemies than Apri did. And he was not to make such a reckning of all Tarentum (much less then of the Calte alone,) as in regard thereof to leave Capua undefended, and yeild it to the people of Ro, Cap. I say, which he was to come and make equal with the City of Rome. Ambit. promised that he would take care for the good estate of the Campans : and for the present he sent two thousand Horsemans with the Embelladors, as a guard to keep the country and territory from invasion and spoil.

The Romans in this mean time, among other their affairs, neglected nor the safety of the Calle of Tarentum, and the garrison there believing. Pet C, Scrutarius, Lieutenant, by order and authority of the Senat, was sent by P. Corn. but the Pretor into Hbran, to pursuyc for cornard to buy more: who with certain ships laden therewith, arrived in the haven of Tarentum passing even through the guards of the enemies. At whole coming, they that before whiles they had but small hopes, were oftentimes by way of partly moved by the enemies to go to the contrary side, now themselves began to periwaide and licillicit the enemy to come unto them. And the garrison here-ly was strong enough, considering that the fouldiers which lay at Metapumum, were drawn from thence to the defence and keeping of the Calle of Tarentum. And therefore the Metapumins, so soon as they were delivered of the fear whereby they were kept and held inas with a bit, recolted unto Ambibol. Semblibly did the Thurins also, who inhabited the same tract by the Sea side. They were moved and periwaded thereto, not so much by the rebellion of the Farentins and Metapumins, with whom they were linked in kindred, and joynez near in blood (over and besides that they were defended as well as they. out of Achaea) as with anger toward the Romans for the hostages lately by them killed. Their friends therefore, and kindred dispatched letters and meffengers unto Hanno and Magis (who were in the country of the Britani near at hand) offering to deliver the City into their hands if they brought their power and presented it before their walls. Now was there one M, Atimius, Captain there over a small garrison, whom they implomed might be easily driven forth of the Town to make some rash and inconfert skirmish, pre-noting not so much upon his own feoudiers (who were but an handful) as upon the youth and flour of the Thurins, whom he had of purpose enrolled into bands and companies, and furnished with armor against the like occasions of service. The Carthaginian Captains above named, had divided all their forces between them in two parts, and were entered into the territory of Thuri:

and Hanno with his Regiment of footmen, advanced with banners dip'd ayde before the City: Magis with the Horfemen, hid behind close among the Hills, over-against the Town, and there lay lager in ambush. Atimius then, who by his eipials was endangered only of the squadron of footmen, came forth with his forces into the field, ignorant (God wont) both of the fatihood and resnon of the Townsmen, and also of the covert trains and ambushment of the enemies. The skirmish of footmen was exceeding faint and cold, whereas the Romans being but few, fought in the vanguard: and the Thurins looked rather when the skirmish should end, than made any halt to fight themselves and help: and withal, the squadron of the Carthaginians gave ground for the nonce, to train the enemy as far as the side of the Hill, under which, on the other side their Horfemen lay in wait and were ambushed. And thither they were not so looin come, but the Horfemen made halt to shew themselves, with a great outcry, and presently put to flight the raw and disordered company and multitude of the Thurins: who were not very fast and found in heart to them on whole side they fought. The Romans albeit they were environed round, whilst the footmen lay still at them on the one side, and the Horfemen charged them a-fresh on the other side, yet they maintained fight, and held out a long while; but at left, they likewise turned their back A back and fled to the City. There the traitors and conspirators being gathered together on heaps, so soon as they had let in the gates standing wide open, the companies of their own citizens: when they saw once the Romans running space in dismay toward the City, made a false alarm, crying aloud that the Carthaginians were at hand, and that both enemies and friends totgether mingled, would enter the City, unless they made better hall to shut the gates. So they excluded the Romans out, and gave them as a prey to be hevin in pieces by their enemies. Howbeit, Atmian, with some few, was received within the Town first. After this, there was some mut-tiny and dissention between the citizens themselves, for a little while. Some were of mind to stand upon their guard and defend the Town: others were of opinion, to yield unto fortune of the time, and deliver it up to the victors hands. But in consideration, fortune and bad counsel to-gather, (as for the most part it fell out) prevailed. And so, after they had brought Atmian and his soldiers to the haven (for to be embarked, more upon good will that they bare to him for his mind and last government), and therefore were ready to save him, than for any regard at all they had of the Romans, they received the Carthaginians into the City.

The Consuls then led the legions from Beneventum into the territory of Capua, not only to make spoil and mar the cow, that was laid up already in strong Towns against winter, but also to afflict Capua: supposing they should make their Consulship renowned unto posterity, by the destruction of so rich and wealthy a City: and besides, do away that great dishonour and shameful blemish of the Empire of Rome, in suffering a City to erect unto them to continue now three years in rebellion, without revenge and confounding punishment. But to the end that Beneventum should not be without a guard, and that against all inordinate accidents and occurrences of war; in case Atmian should come to Capua, for to rescue and aid his allies. (which they made no doubt but he would do) there might be Horsemens to withstand his violence; they commanded T. Gracchus to come out of Lucania, with the cavality and light armed footmen, and to take order and leave some other to govern the legions and the halting camp, for the guard and defence of those parts there.

Gracchus before he had lodged out of the Lucan country hapned to have a fearful and prodigioous token, as he offered fortune. For after the sacrifice was performed and accomplished, two Snakes came gliding out of a blind hole, no man knew how, to the entails of the beast, and fell to eat the Liver: and so soon as they were espied inwardly said out of Sight, and were no more seen. Now, when as the bowl-prayers had given advice to kill a new Sacrifice and to aso as the inwards were opened and laid forth, to tend and look unto them more heedfully, the Snakes came again, as it is reported the second and third time: and when they had once given as it were an allay, and tafted the Liver, they went clear away without hurt and untouched. And albe a Sotholayers foretold, had given an Item, and foretold, that this prodigious sign perceived properly unto the chief Captain and General, and warned him to take heed of some close perils and secret practices; yet his fatal destiny of death that hung over his head, could by no forecaet and providence be altered and avoided. Now there was one Flavius a Lucane, the principal head of that bend and side of the Lucans, which when the other faction revolted unto Annibal, took the Romans part; and having been by them chosen the Praetor had continued in that place of Magistracy a year already: this man all on a sudden chance his mind and affection, and seeking to wind and enter into the favour of Annibal, could not be content to revolt himself, and to draw with him the Lucans to rebellion; unless he made a league also and covenant with the enemies, and joined it with the murder and blood of his General; of him (I say) who being enticed and lodged in his house, he purposed villainously to betray. He entred therefore into a secret speech and conference with Mago; Governor over the Bruttii, and having captivated with him, under his faithful word and promise. That if he delivered the Roman General into his hands, the Lucans might live in freedom under their own Laws, in league and amity with the Carthaginians, Gracchus, he told him of a place into which he would bring Gracchus, with a small company and guard about him: willing Mago to put his foot and horse in arms, and in such a place beforehand wherein he might bellow closely and secretly a mighty number of men. When the place was well viewed and considered all about, they agreed upon a day, for putting this plot in practice. This done, Flavius cometh to the Roman General Gracchus, and encomemeth him that he had begun an enterprise of great consequence for the accomplish and full perfection of; he the needed the helping hand of Gracchus himself: "Namely, he had persuaded with all the Praetors and Governors, who in that universal and general trouble of all Italy, had revolted unto Annibal, for

"to return again into the league and friendship of the Romans: seeing that the Roman state and "their Dominion, which by the overthrow at Cannae was come in a manner to the lowest ebb, "and lain into extreme despair. flowered now again, and grew everyday more than other, greater
"and mightier; whereas contrary wise, the putrlllung of Annibal decayed much, and was well-
"never come to nothing: besides, the Romans were men that might be appeased and reconciled "again, especially the teipais being so long ago done and past: for never was there nation un"der the sun, more tractable, more exorable and ready to pardon a fault: and how often have "they (to go no further for examples) forgiven the open Rebellion even of their fore-fathers and "ancestors? These (quoth he) were my words unto them, and indeed, but my words, Mary
"they had rather hear Gracchus himself speak, and hear the same from out of his own mouth:
they would more gladly talk with him in person, and take hold of his right hand, which as the *allured pawn of his faithful promise; he carrieth always with him whithersoever he goeth, and they defer no more. I have therefore (that he) appointed a convenient place of interview, and conference: lying out of the way and forth of sight, but yet not far from the Romans camp.

There the matter may be dispatched in few words, and all the remainder nation of the Lucans, reduced under the obedience and alliance of the people of Rome. Gracchus suffering no great harm, neither in his words nor deeds, finding all to a great likelihood of truth and simplicity in his conceit, departed out of the camp attended upon with his Sergeants, and guarded only with a corneet of Horsemens: and so by the guidance of his own hoist, in whose house he lodged, was plunged headlong within the danger of the ambush of his enemies: Who suddenly arose: and Flavius because he would put it out of doubt, that he was a traitor, went to their side and joyed with them. Then they let flies arrows, and short darts against Gracchus and his Horsemens on every side. Whereupon Gracchus slighted from horseback, and commanded the rest to do the same, exhorting them, that the only thing which fortune now had left unto them, would grace and honour with vertue. For what remaineth else for us, (a small handful unto them) in vironed as we are with a multitude of them, within a valley compassed about with hills and woods, but present death? This only we are to resolve upon. Whether in this present amazedness and heartlesse fear, we will as beasts suffer our throats to be cut without revenge again; or turning wholly our timorous expectation anduffering of death, into choler and courage, fight adventourously and manfully, and bating our hands in the blood of our enemies, lose our lives and fall down dead; upon the weapons and bodies of them, lying gasping themselves under us.

Ah! that Luuan, that seditious rogue and rebel, that treacherous and sable traitor, see ye all lay at him. Whole hap it will be, ere he die, to be his Priest, to sacrifice and send him to the Devil; he shall win an honourable prize, and find no small solace and comfort in his own death.

With these words, he wrapped his rich coat of arms about his left arm (for they had not brought forth with them so much as their shields) and charged with exceeding force upon the enemies. The fight was far greater on their part then for the proportion and number of the men. The bodies of the Romans lay openmost unto the first, and thus overcharged on all sides from the higher places: as being in the valley subjedt to the volley of their darts, they were soon piercethrough. When Gracchus was left naked alone, and his guard dead at his feet, the Carthaginians did what they could to take him alive; but he having espied among the enemies his good hoist and friend, that Lucan, ran among the thickest places; where he was fully bent to mistich him, that they could not will nor choose but kill him outright, without they would have lost the lives of many other. He was not so soon dead, but Mago lent him freighth ways unto Annibal, and commanded that his body together with the knittles of rods (belonging to his Majestie) should be presented and threwed before the Tribunal seat of the General. And this is the true report of the end of Gracchus; to wit, that he let his life in the Lucan Land, about the plains which are called Vetere campi. There in time that tell it otherwise, how he being accompanied with his Sergeants, and three serving men his bondslaves, went out from the camp within the territory of Beneventum, neer unto the River Calor, to wash himself; where there chance his enemies to lurk, and lye in wait among the willows and alders that grew by the bank side, and so being unarmed and naked too, he was assaulted, where he defended himself as well as he could with flinging at them pible stones such as the River afforded and carried down with the stream, and so was slain. Others write, that by advice of the Bowel-pryers, he went out of the camp half a mile off, for to purge and expiate in some pure and clean place, those prodigious tokens above rehearsed: and there was best and environed round about with two troopers of Numidian Horsemens, who hapned there to lie in ambush. See how variable and uncertain the same goeth, both in what place, and after what manner, this so noble and famous person cameby his death. Nay, the very funeral and sepulture also of Gracchus is directly delivered. Some say, he was entered by his own fouldeers within the Roman camp. Others give out and say (and that is the more common report) that by the appointment of Annibal he was buried in the very entrance of the Carthaginian legions: that there was a funeral fire made in solemn wise to burn his corps; that the whole army jutted and ran at tilt and torment in their compleat armor; that the Spaniards leaped and danced Morrice: and each nation according to their guise and manner performed sundry motions and exercises as well of their weapons, as of their bodies: yea, and that Annibal himself in proper person, with all honor of funeral pomp that might be devised, both in word and deed, solemnized the obsequies in the beast manner. This say they that affirm the thing to have hapned in the Lucans country. But if a man should believe them, who record how he was slain at the River Calor, then the enemies gat nothing of him but only his head. Which being presented unto Annibal, he sent Carthalo immediately with it into the Roman camp, unto Cn. Cornelius the Treasurer or Quetlor: who there within the very camp performed the funerals of the General, and both army and citizens of Benevetum together solemnized the same right honourably.

The Consuls being entered into the territory of Campai, as they foraged all abroad, frageing one from another, were by the Townsmen of Captain which fell out, and by the Horsemens of Mago, put in fear: whereupon in great fright and haste, they rallied the foulers to their colours, that A that were ranged over the Country: but before they could well embattail them, and set them in array, they were discomfited, and lost above a thousand and five hundred men. Upon which good success, the enemies (as they are a nation by nature proud) began to be very luyly and exceeding audacious, infomuch, as they offered to skirmish fundry times with the Romans, and ever challenged them to fight. But that one battail,so undividedly and incomconsiderably archived, made the Comitis more circumspect and wary afterward. Howbeit, one small occurrence hapned, which, as it encouraged and animated them again, so it abated the hearts, and daunted the boldnes of the other. For in war there is nothing (be it never so little) but one time or other, it is the occasion of some great consequence and importance. There was in the camp one,

B Quintus Crispinus, linked in special friendship and familiarity with Balbus, a Citizen of Capua, whose acquaintance grew and encreased upon this occasion: This Balbus, upon a time, before the revolt of Capua fell lick at Rome, and, lying in Crispinus his house, was liberally and kindly used, yes, and tenderly feene unto by him, during his sickness. This Balbus having put himself forward before the randing shouts, that warded at the gate of the Roman camp, willed, that Crispinus should be called out unto him. Whi being told unto Crispinus, he supposed no otherwise of it, but that he should talk friendly and familiarly with him. For albeit both nations generally were at enmy, in regard of the publick State, yet the private right and band of hospitality, remained still in force, and was not forgotten, and therefore he went out somewhat apart from the rest of his fellows. Now, when they were come in sight and interview one of the other. I challenge thee, O Crispinus (quoth Balbus) to combat: let us mount on Horseback, and trye it out between us two, without any other companion, whether of us is the better man at arms. To this Crispinus made answer again and said, We want no enemies, neither you nor I, upon whom we may prove force of our manhood: easier me, if I met and encounter you in the very battail, yet I would decline, avoid, and shunt from you left I should dislike and stain my hand in the murder and bloodshed of my guest and friend; and with this he turned from him and went his way. But the Campanite contrary-wise, upon these words, was the more eager with him, railing and rating at him for his effeminate cowardice and daintiness, letting fly at the harmless and innocent man all sightfull terms and reproachful language: which himself: I wot (he had his due) was well worthy of calling him a friendly foe, and a kind enemy indeed, and finally charged him, that he made his excuse of sparing him: for friendship's sake, whom he knew he was not able to match in manhood and valour. But it (quoth he) thou thinkest, that by the breach of publick league and covenant, our private bands of amity and hospitality, are not yet enough broken in fitter, then here I pronounce openly, in the hearing of two armies, That I Balbus a Campanite renounce all hospitality with thee T. Quintus Crispinus a Roman, and to farewell all friendship for ever: I will, I say, have no more to do by way of acquaintance with thee, no society, no alliance, no hospitality will the guest have with that host, who in hostile manner is come to invade his native country, and to make assault upon the publick buildings and private houses thereof. And therefore, if thou be a man, meet me in the field. Crispinus drew back a long time, and was loth to enter into the action, but at last his fellow Horsemens, serving in the same troop and corner with him, forced and prevailed him, not to suffer that bragging Campanite, thus to infringe over him without revenge. Whereupon he made no more ado, nor any longer delay, but whiles he went unto the I. Generals to know their pleasure, whether they would permit and license him, out of his order and rank, to fight with an enemy that challenged him, and gave him defiance. And having obtained leave, he buckled his armor about him, took his weapon mounted on Horseback, and calling upon Balbus by name, bad him come forth he durst to long a fight. The Campanite made no lay, and so with spear in refleet pass to, and they ran their frieuses full carrier one at the other. Crispinus with his lance pierced Balbus above his shield, through the left shoulder, and therewith unhorsed him, and when he was fall to the earth with the pain, he alight himself from his horse, minding on foot to fall upon him as he lay along, and so to dispatch him outright. But Balbus, before his enemy leaught upon him, left his target behind and his horse, and by good footmanship recovered his own fellows, Crispinus then, all goodly to be seen with the spoils of his enemy, made the w of the horse and armor that he had won, and bearing up withal the bloody point of his lance, was with much praise and great glorification of the foundiers, brought honourably to the Comitis, and presented before them. At whose hands he was both highly commended, and also liberally rewarded.

Annual having dilobged out of the territory of Beneventum, and removed into Capua, within three days after he was come thither, brought forth his forces into the field, making no doubt at all, but that, considering the Campanis in his absence, had but few days before fought fortunately, the Romans now would be so much lefe able to abide his royal army to often used to victory. And verily when the conflict was once begun, the Roman battalions of the Infantry were much troubled and distressed, especially with the fierce assault of the Horsemens, who overcharged and pecked them mightily with their darts and Javelins, until the signal was given to their own Cavalryalso, to let hard to, and charge the enemies with their horse. Now the men of arms were but lively in both sides, it hapned that the Regiment of Sempronius [Gracchus lately slain] were defiled marching a far off under the conduct of Cn. Cornelius the Treasurer, which put both parts in like fear, loit they were some new and fresh enemies that advanced against them. So they founded the retreat on either side, as if they had been agreed so to do, departed out of the field (as a man would say) on even hand, and retired themselves unto H their several holds: howbeit, the greater number was slain of Romans, upon the first violent charge given by the Horsemen. From them e the Consuls intending to draw Ambibal away from Capua, departed landry wayes, Felons into the territory of Camnes, and Claudius into the Lucans Country. The next day, when Ambibal was advertised, that the Romans had abandoned their camp, and that they were gone into divers parts with their several armies, being at first uncertain whom to pursue, resolved at length to make after Apulus, and so began to do. But after he had once trained the enemy about to the place that he desired, he returned himself another way to Capua. And Ambibal hapned also upon a new occasion preferred, to have a good hand of his enemies into their hold.

There was one M. Centenius, furnamed Pellaia, one of the chief Centurions of the Pilaris, a singular good Captain in that kind, as well in regard of his mighty and goodly body, as also of his brave mind, and valiant courage. This man having left out his ordinary time required by Law, was by the means of P. Cornelius Sulla the Prector, brought into the Senat-House, and became a Petitioner unto the LL. of the Council, that he might have the leading of five thousand footmen: promising that within short time, by reason he was so well acquainted with the nature and qualities of the enemy, and withal so much beaten in riding those quarters, he would do some great deed, and achieve a piece of notable service: and look, by what cunning devices and stratagems, both our leaders and our armies had been until that day, entrapped and over-ruled, the very fame would heute and practice against the enemy. He was not so vain and undiscerned in making this offer, but they were as forthi and foolish again in taking him at his word, and trusting him: as who would say, A good Leader and Commander, and a stout and hardy foildier were all one. And so where as he demanded but five thousand, he had the charge given of eight thousand: whereas the one half were citizens, the other allies and confederats: and besides them, he himself also gathered together out of the country as he pleased, a good Company of Volunteers: into which as his power was doubled, by that time he came into the Lucan Country, where Ambibal abode, after that he had followed Claudius in vain, and to no effect, a man that had but half an eye, might see what the sequel and event would be of the conflict between General Ambbal, and Centenere Centenius: between both armies also, the one of old bestandtovadiers tried ever to victories, the other of raw novices and yong beginners, yea, many L of them taken up suddenly in hait, and fledgeley armed by the halis. For so soon as both foits had confronted one another, and that on neither side they dallied and shifted off, but minded presently to go to it & fighton were they on both parts arranged in order of battale. And albeit the Romans had many illad. anages, yet they maintained skirmish more than two hours: and that so boldly and courageously that they thrunk not one jot, so long as their leader ftood on foot. But after that he once was stricken down and slain, who not only in respect and remembrance of the former name (that he had won) of valour and provets: but also for fear of future shame and dishonor, in case he should remain alive after the defeat of his forces, whereof he was the only cause through his fool-hardy rashnes, pretended himself desperately upon the pikes of his enemies, where he might be sure of nothing but present death: and incontinent the Roman bat-tailon was discomfited and put to flight. And so hard beleed they were, in seeking ways and means to escape (all the avenues were so laid and beleed with the Horsemcn) that of a great a multitude, there were hardly one thousand saved, all the rest miscarried here and there, and came by their death one way or other.

In this mean tyme, Capua was strightly beleaguered by the Consuls, and they began to it in most forciible manner; great preparation there was of all things needfull unto such an exploit, and with great diligence every thing provided and brought accordingly. Corn was conveyed to Cassinum, and laid up there for store: at the mouth of the River Vulturnus (where now the City standeth) was the fonce and caffle fortified (which Fabius before had built) and a strong garrison therein planted, to the end that both the Sea foorer, and the whole River also might be N at their command. Into these two fortes flanding on the Sea side, as well the corn which lately was sent out of Sardona, as also that which M. Tullius the Prector had bought out of Hevstria, was transported from the Port of Cassia, whereby the army might be fed plentifully all winter feaon. Over and besides that bosome received in the Lucans country, the army likewise of the Vo- lonets, i.e. Voluntary foildiers (which during the life of Crassus, had lived truly and faithfully) now a bandoned their colours: as if by the death of their Captain they had taken themselves fully dischargued from warlike service.

Ambibal made no small account of Capua: for willing enough he was, that his allies and friends there should not be torstaken and left in so great perill wherein they dwell; and yet upon that for- tunat succes which hapned unto him through the rashnes of one Roman Captain, his fingers O itchet to be doing with another of them, and hoped to find some good opportunity and advan-tage to surprize and overthrow both Captain and army. Whereastherefore certain Apulian Emba,lladors advertised him, that C. Fulius the Prector, (who at the first inaffinking of certain Ci-ties in Apule which had revolted unto Ambibal, bare himself like a wise and prudent Captain: now afterwards upon his good fortune and happy speed in those affairs, whereby himself and his foildiers had made up their mouts and filled their hands well with booty and pilage) both himself and his men were grown so idle and so disolute, that no good government nor military disci-Discipline remained among them: hereupon Ambit the having good experience, (as often heretofore, so in this late instance but few days past) in how small a head an army verteth, when it is directed by an unskilful Leader, removed his forces into Apulia. Now lay the Roman legions and Fulvius the Pretor, encamped about Herdonia. And when the news came thither that the enemies were on their journey coming toward them, hardly might the foiards be exclaimed and dismayed, but they would in all haste push up standards and ensigns, and straightway go into the field and bid them battle, without commission and commandement of their Pretor. And no one thing more held them back, than the asured hope they had, to do it at their pleasure whenever they would. Ambit the night following, having certain intelligence, that there was a tumult in the camp, and that most of the foiards mightly importuned their General to put forth unto them the signal of battle, and called earnestly him for to lead them out into the field, made full account to meet with good opportunity and occasion, to have a fair day of his enemies: and therefore he betowered three thousand men lightly appointed, in divers villages thereabout, among the thick groves and bushes, and within the woods: who at a sign given them, should all at once upon a loudain, start up and leap forth of their lurking corners: and withal, he gave order to Max, with two thousand Horsemens or thereabouts to keep all the ways whereas he suspect they were most like to flee and make escape. Having thus ordered all things beforehand in the right time: at the break of day he entered the field with his army, and embattled himself in warlike manner, Fulvius for his part, was not behind: not induced so much upon any hope or conceit he had of good speed as drawn and baled thereto through the rash enforcement and compulsion of his foiards. And therefore as they came forth to battle upon a head and heat, inconsiderately, so they were set in array as disorderly: even at the pleasure of the foiards, according as they came forth and took up their ranks and files, as they list themselves: and then again, as the toy took them in the head the same, either upon willfulness or fear. The first legions together with the left wing or cornet of Horsemens were first marshalled: and the squadrons drawn and fetched out in a great length: not withstanding the Knight Martialis and Coronels cried out, that within, there was no strength nor power at all: and that the enemies wherefoever they should hap to charge would break in upon them and go through. But no wholeome counsel for their own good might be taken and considered upon: nay, they would not so much as lend their ear, and give them the hearing. And by this time Ambit was in place, with another manner of army (you may be sure) and otherwise ordered and arranged. And therefore the Romans were not able to abide so much as the first shout and shock of the onef. The Captain himself (as foolish and heady as Cennerius: but in courage and resolution for shot of him) seeing how the world went, the field like to be lost, his foiards in fear and great perplexity: recovered his horse in great haste, and with some two hundred horsemens fled away and cryed: all the army beside, beaten back affront, befit behind flanked on the sides, and environed round, were killed and hewn in pieces, that of eighteen thousand, there were not pass two thousand saved. And the enemies besides were matters of the camp.

When these lozies one in the neck of another were reported at Rome, the City was set in a great fit of sorrow and fear for the while: but so long as the Consuils, in whom reselt the main chance, had hitherpropered and iaped well, they were the lefe troubled at these by-blowes and cross misfortunes. Whereupon they addrest C. Lelltorius and M. Matius as meffengers unto the Consuils, willing them to gather together with good care and diligence, those dispersed relics and rememders of the two armies; also to have anay and heedful regard unto them, that upon fear and desperation they yielded not themselves to the enemy (as it hapned after the Cannian overthrow:) and lall of all, to make diligent search and seek out those Generals, or voluntary servitors, that had abandoned their ensigns and called themselves. The like charge was laid upon P. Cornelius, who had commission besides to levy moremen. And he made proclamation throughout all market Towns, fairs, and places of frequent resort, That those Generals should be found out and brought again to their own colours, to serve as aforetime. All these directions were executed and accomplished with exceeding great care and diligence.

Apollonius, the Consul, after he had made D. Junius Captain of the icone erected upon the mouth of the River Volturnus, and M. Aurelius Costa Governor of Lucullus, with commision, that as any ships with corn from out of Hetoria or Sardinia arrived there, they should immediately send the corn to the camp: went back himself to Capua: where he found Q. Fulvius his Colleague, transporting thither all provision from Capilius, and making preparation for the assault of Capua. Thenboth Coll, jointly together beleeged the City: and sent unto Claudius Nero the Pretor, to come unto them from Sestilia, out of the old camp of Claudius, who likewise leaving a small garrision there to defend the piece, with all his power and forces, enclosed the paws before Capua. So there were three royal pavilions pitched for three Ll. Generals about Capua: and three full armies in three sundry places began to fortifie, creating hafting forts and forts in places not far distant: yea, and to cast a trench and raise a rampier round about the City. And in divers quarters at once, they skirmished with the men of Capua, whensoever they came to hinder the fortifications, with so good success, that the Townsmen were driven at first to keep within their gates and walls: but before that those rampiers and trenches above did were fully finished and all ends brought together, there were Embassadors dispatched unto Ambit, to complain in the name of the Captains, as finding themselves griev-ved, that he had forsaken Capua, and in a manner delivered it into the Romans hands; and with all, to beseech him earnestly that now or never, he would relieve and succor them; being not only beseeched, but also that up and almost trenched about, as within a prison. T. Cornelius likewise the Prefect of the City of Rome, sent his letters unto the Consuls, advising them before they had fully invested Capua round about, to make offer unto the Campans of this liberty. That as many as would, might depart with bag and baggage out of Capua; and whatsoever went forth before the

* Idea of March should enjoy their freedom and all their goods and lands: but as many as after that day, either departed or tarried there still behind, should be reckoned no better than enemies. These intimations were made known unto the Campans, but so light they set by them, that they'll a railling, talking, and menacing the Romans, with most reproachful taunts and frightful terms. Annaulus was departed from Herdonia with his legions unto Tarentum, hoping either by force or fraud to gain the Castle. And seeing little prevailed, he turned from thence and took his way to Brundisium, supposing that Town would be betrayed into his hands. While he lay there also and lost his time in doing nothing, the Embassadors of the Campans arrived and came unto him, with complaints and humble requests both at once. Unto whom Annaulus made this glorious and like answer with a Majesty: Once already have I raised the siege and never will the Consuls, I trespass on my second coming. The Embassadors have receiving their dispatch, departed with this hope: but much ado they had, to put themselves within Capua, so enclosed round was it (by this time) with a double trench and a rampier.

It fortuned at the very same instant, when Capua was thus freewill beseech'd, that the siege also and assault of Syracus should come to an end: helped forward and hasted by intemperate heat, and treason within, as well as by force of army and valour of Captain abroad. For Maccellus, in the beginning of the spring, doubtful in himself and hanging in suspense, whether to bend his whole forces toward Agrigentum against Himilco and Hippocrates, or still proceed to besiege Syracuse: albeit he saw the City might not possibly be won either by forcible assault (considering it was by situation both by Sea and Land invincible) or pineg'tamine, by reason the passage in manner lay open to it and into it and Carthage, for late transporting of all sorts of victuals: yet because he would leave no stone unrolled, but try all ways that could be devised, he commanded certain retorts of the Syracustians (for there sided with the Romans some of the noblest persons of the City, who at the time of the first backsliding from the Romans, because they mistified and abhorred all rebellion and change in the state, were driven out and banished the City) to deal with their bend and fiction by way of conference to sound the hearts (Tay) such as were their followers, and to follow them to their part: and with all to allure them (upon their warrant) that if by their means Syracuse were betrayed, they should live in freedom, and enjoy their own Laws as they would themselves. But no opportunity could they elope for to part and talk with them. For by reason that there were many suspected to encline and draw that way, every man had a careful eye and regard unto them, that there could be no treachery practised, but loon it would be found out and detected. Yet a bond-servant toward one of the banished persons above-said, hapned to be let into the City, pretending that he was run away from the adverse part unto them: who hapning to meet with some few, begun to move and broach such a matter. After which certain others lying close hidden under the nets in a fisher boat came about by water to the camp of the Romans, and had conference and communication with those former fugitives and exiled men. And thus from time to time this was practis'd in the same manner, by divers and sundry persons, until at length they were a crew of four persons in all. Now when all things were concluded for the betraying of the City, near upon the point of execution, it chanced that one Astalas (a false brother among them, who took snuff that he was not specially trusted in the matter) disclosed the conspiracy unto Epideus, and appeache the parties: whereupon they were all put to extreme torture, and suffered death every one. When this plot would speed no better, they conceived hope another way, by a new occasion and occurrence that presently offereth it fell. There chanced one Domenippus a Lacedemonian, lent from Syracus, as a messenger to King Philip for to be taken prisoner by the Roman armado. Now both Epideus was very desirous and exceeding careful how to ransom him, and also Maccellus was not unwilling for his part to grant the same. For even then the Romans began to affect the friendship of the Astalians, with which Nation the Lacedemonians were confederate, and in league. So, when there should be commissioners and delegates sent on both sides to parle and treat about his redemption the most indifferent place for them to meet in, was at the key or wharf of "Trogili," built by a turrect which they call "Cadagea," as being in the midst between, and most convenient for both parties. It hapned now, that as they had recourse oftentimes thither about this business, one of the Romans well viewed the wall next by the thorne the stones that appeared in the forefront of the wall and made estimate to himself of their quadrature and proportion; and withal, giving a guess as near as he could of what height (by his reckoning) and measure, the wall might be: and supposing it was a good deal lower than either himself or others, had always before taken it to be and only to be scaled with ladders, even of a mean size and middle fort, he relathed the matter, and his conceit of it to Maccellus. And in his opinion it was a thing not to be neglected, but to be thought upon. But for affin'd how there was no access unto that place by reason that for the lowness thereof it was the more care fully guarded and defended, it was thought good to wait for some opportunity and advantage to help that difficulty. Which, as good hap was, offered it itself presently unto them by A means of a fugitive: who gave them intelligence, that they held a solemn feast of Dionysus at that time within the City; and the same continued three days together: also he said that for want of other things, during this siege to make good cheer withal, they spared for no wine, but made merry therewith in great plenty and abundance. For why not only Epides made bountifully belovled wine upon the whole Commons, but also the great men of the City, had in every ward and parish where they dwelt, allowed a proportion besides, of their own charges. When Marcus had heard this, he called unto him some of his Colonels and knight Marshals, and conferred with them: and when they had joined certain choice and elect Centurions and foildiers, fit and sufficient men to adventure and execute to great a piece of service, and withal provided ladders B secretly: to all the rest he commanded a watchword and warning to be given, That they should become their rejection of meat and repose of sleep, for that in the night they were to be employed in an expedition and action of service. After this, when he thought it was about the time, that they (as having feared all day long, and well filled their bellies with meat, and their heads with wine) were gone to rest, and newly fallen sound asleep, he commanded one enigma or company of soildiers, to carry ladders; and besides them, there were upon a thousand well armed and appointed, marching with silence and in thin ranks, brought thither to the place, When the formost without any stir or noise at all, had scaled the top of the wall, others followed in their course. For the forward and solitary boldness of the former, was able to animate and encourage the rest, if they had been false-hearted. By this time now, the thousand armed soldiers had feized C that part, when the rest of the ladders were set to; and upon more ladders still they got up to the wall in diverse places, upon a signal given them from the gate Hexaplex. Unto which places the Romans were now come, and found no stirring at all, but exceeding silence and defolation, for as much as a great part of them had made good cheer within the turrets, and either were fast asleep with drinking wine already, or else were bubbling full, notwithstanding their eyes were heavy, and their hearts asleep. And yet, some few of them they took in their beds, and killed. Neer unto Hexaplex there is a little wicket which with great violence, they began withal, to break it open. So as now, both from the wall (as before appointed) they gave signal by sound of trumpet: and allo from all parts they went not to work any more by stealth, but plainly and openly without diffimilation. For they were come already as far as Epides, a place full of D watchmen and warders. And the enemies were to be terrified now and then into fear, and no longer to be dealt withal by craft and guile, And it fell out so indeed that they were mightily scared. For they heard not to soon the sounding of the trumpets, and the shouting and outcry of them that were polleefed of the walls and one part of the City, but the warders, thinking all was gone, some ran along upon the wall, others leapt from the walls, or else were born down head-long, with the prefs of others that were affrighted, And yet many there were, who were not ware at all of this misery and extremity, both because generally they were all dead asleep, and also by reason that the City was so wide and large that a thing felt and seen in some remote parts, reached not firefightways throughout, to all the rest. The gate Hexaplex was broken down somewhat before day, at which Marcus with all his power entered the City. He wakened them all, and E set them to their business: he made them take weapon in hand, and to help (what they could) a City in a manner wholly purified and taken, Epides made half from the Island (which they themselves call Nafsos) with a company of soldiers about him, making full account to drive them out against: as supposing that they were but few men, who through the negligence of the watchmen and warders were got over the wall: and ever as he met with any that were scared and in fear, he fliouted to them themselves, that they themselves made more ado, and every thing worse than there was cause, reporting all in greater measure and more fearful manner than need was in very truth. But when he saw all places about Epides full of armed men after some small volley of shot, and little skirmish with the enemy, (whereby he provoked them rather than did any good else) he turned back again with his companies, and retired into Acrisium,not fearing to make the violence and multitude of the enemies, as left some intestine mischief by this occasion might arise, and that he should find in this tumult and hurlyburly the gates of Acrisium, and the Island that again against him. Marcus being entered within the walls, took his prospect from the higher places, and when he beheld under his eyes the most goodly and beautiful City of all others in those eyes, (by report) he wept and shed tears abundantly, partly for joy that he had brought his purpose to good a pas, and partly in compassion and remembrance of the ancient glory and renown of that City. He called to mind the navies of the Athenians by them sunk and drowned: he thought upon the utter overthrow of two puissant armies, together with the loss of two most noble and famous Captains of theirs: moreover, there came into his memory so many wars fought against the Carthaginians with so great peril and hazard; so many and so mighty Tyrants and Kings that reignned and kept their seat and royal court thereand amongst the rest he could not but think of King Here, of fresh and famous memory, a Prince, who above all other gates which his own fortune and fortune had grace and ended him withal was recommended especially for his many favours and good turns done unto the people of Rome. When all these things presented themselves to his remembrance, with this cogitation besides, how all that beauty and glory within one hour space was ready to burn on a light fire, and to be consumed into ashes: before he advanced his enigne against Acrisium, he sent before, those Syracusians who had converted (as is aore- said) amongst the guards and garrison of the Romans to persuade the enemies with mild and gen-

The speech, yet, to yield the City. It fell out, that the most part of them that warded the gates and walls both, of Acradina, were certain fugitives revolted from the Romans, who had no hope at all, upon any condition whatsoever to be persuaded. These would suffer none, either to approach the walls, or to passe and speak with any. And therefore Marcellus, after he had once frustrated and disappointed, commanded to retire with the ensigns unto Euryalus. This Euryalus is a little mount and fort, situate in the utmost quarter of the City, remote far from Sea, and commanding the high way that leadeth into the fields, and the middle parts and the very heart of the whole Island, a place very commodious for the taking up and receipt of all victuals. The Captain of this bold was Philodemos, an Argive, placed there by Epicides. Unto whom there was sent from Marcellus, Softi, one of them that murdered the tyrant: and after long communication, with partly words abused by him, and colourably put off until another time, made relation unto Marcellus, that Philodemos had taken a farther day of reprieve and deliberation. But he put off still from day to day, trilling out the time of purpose, until Hecocrates and Himilco might come with his forces and legions, making no doubt but if he might receive them into his territories, the whole army of the Romans being now enclosed within the walls, he could be overthrown, and utterly defeated. Marcellussembling that Euryalus was not delivered up, (and forced possibly he could not be) encompassed himself between Neapolis and Tyre (for these two parts of the City named, and may for their bigness go well enough for two entire cities of themselves;) for fear lest he it he once entred into the populous and most inhabited places of the City, his soldiers greedy of pillage, would not be kept together, but run too eagerly up and down to pill. Thither came unto him from Tyre and Neapolis, Embassadors and Orators, with olive branches adorned with sacred veils and insuluses, humble beseeching him to hold his hand from effusion of blood, and bring the City, Marcellus calling his Council about these their petitions, rather than demands after mature deliberation, by general consent of all, gave express and strict commandment to the soldiers, that no man should offer abuse or violence to the body of any free-born person whatsoever: as for all besides, his will and pleasure was it should be their bowty. Now was the camp of Marcellus defended on both sides with housing in deed of a wall, and he believed a good corps de garde at the gates thereof, lying open over against the streets: left when the soldiers ran to and fro in the City, the camp in the mean while might be affailed. Then upon the sound of Trumpet the soldiers fell to their business, ran into all parts, brake open doors, set all on a fearful hurry, but spilled no blood: and they never gave over ranfackling and rilling, until they had call out and carried away all the riches and goods, that had been a gathering a long time, during their wealthy and prosperous estate. Amid these affairs, Philodemos also seeing no hope of succours and refuge, after he had covenanted for his security, to return safe and without harm to Epicides, withdrew his garrison away with him out of the fort, and rendred it up to the Romans.

Now while every man was turned another way, and buried in that part of the City which was forced, Boninrat taking the advantage of one night, wherein the Roman fleet by reason of a violent tempest could not ride at anchor in the main Sea, gartoth of the haven of Syracuse with 35 ships, and having Sea room, hoised up sails, and away he went with a merry gale of wind, leaving 4th behind for Epicides and the Syracusians: and after he had informed the Carthaginians in what danger the state of Syracuse fell, returned within few days with a fleet of a hundred sail, rewarded for his labor (as the report went) by Epicides, with many rich gifts, which the treasurers of King Hiero paid for. Marcellus polled now of the foremost Euryalus, and having planted there a garrison, was well rid of one care yet: for he doubted, left if a new power of enemies had been received behind his back into that fort, they would greatly have annoyed his men, encouered now as they were, and encumbered within the walls.

After this he beleaged Acradina, and invested it round about, and fortified three several camps (in meet and convenient places) against it, hoping to shut them up in such fortharts, that they should be driven to extremity and want of all things. Now when as for certain dayes, the guards of the one side and the other had relented quieter, suddenly upon the arrival of Hecocrates and Himilco they within began from all parts to set freshly upon the Romans. For, first Hecocrates after he had encompassed and well forrihned himself both by the great key, and given a signal to them that kept Acradina assaulted the old camp of the Romans, where Crispini lay with his guard for the defence thereof: then Epicides also fell forth, and brake upon the Comps de guard of Marcellus: and within, the Carthaginian fleet approached close to the land that lieth between the City and the Roman camp, to hinder that Crispini might have no aid sent unto him from Marcellus. And yet for all this ado, the enemies made a greater stir and tumultuous alarm, than any sixtimes to speak of: for Crispini nor only gave Hecocrates the repulse, and drave him from the defences of his own camp, but also followed him in chase, as he fled fearfully in half way: and Marcellus forced Epicides to take the City again, and get it over his head. So as now they seemed very sufficiently provided and appointed against all dangers from thence forth, of their luddain failies and intrusions.

Over and besides all these troubles, there hapned a common calamity unto both, the plague and pellengue: in such manner, as might it seem have withdrawn the minds, as well of the one part as of the other, from thinking any more of war. For besides that it fell out to be the Autumn or harvest season of the year, the place it fell by nature unwholesome, flowering and corrupt (though much more without the City than within) the extreme and intolerable heat of the weather.
A weather mightily distempered all their bodies generally, in the camps both the one and the other. At the first, by occasion of the distemper of the air, and corruption of the place, they both fell sick and died: but afterward by visiting and tending one another that were infected, the disease grew catching and contagious, and so spread and increased more and more: in such manner, as either they that were sickly perished for want of looking to and diligent attendance: or if any came about them, to keep them and minister unto them, they were infected and endangered also as deeply as the other: so as every day a man could go nowhere, but either death, or cories carried forth to their graves, were presented to his eyes: night and day in all places there was nothing heard but weeping, wailing, and pious lamentation. In the end their hearts were so hardened and made savage again, by continual usage to this misery, that not only they gave over to weep over the dead, and to accompany them into their sepulchres with due mourning and doleful plains but also to carry them forth and to inter them: so that the breathless bodies lay scattered all abroad on the ground in the sight of the living, that looked every hour for the like miserable death themselves. The dead killed the living: the sick in cited the sound, party with fear, and partly with the corruption and pestiferous stench that came from their bodies. And because they would die rather upon the swords point, than of this maladie, some of them made offer to go alone among the armed guards of their very enemies, to be killed out of hand, and rid out of their misery. However, the plague was hotter by far in the Carthaginian camp, than among the Romans by reason of corrupt water and much slaughter committed there.

C. 5. And so long siege about Syracuse. For of the enemies army, the Sicilians at the first, so soon as they saw the sicknesse to spread commonly, and increase by reason of the corruption of the place, got themselves away, and fled every man home to the cities nearer adjoyning. But the Carthaginians were fain to lie still, as having no place to retire themselves unto, and so, they together with their Generals themselves Hippocrates and Himilco, died all of them, and not one escaped, Marcellus, when he saw this mortality grow thus hot, brought his people into the city, where the houses and shadowy streets yielded some good refreshment to the sick and weak bodies: howbeit, many also of the Roman army went of it, and turned up their heels. Thus when the Land-fouldees of the Carthaginians were all gone and consumed of the plague, the Sicilians whom had evied under Hippocrates, withdrew themselves into certain Towns, which were not great, yet rare and strong, both by natural situation and also by strength of walls and other defences: the one of them three miles from Syracuse, the other fifteen miles distant from the haven mouth: and thither they conveyed from out of their own cities adjoyning, all manner of victuals and lent abroad for aids of men.

In the mean while Bonarco sett sail once again with his fleet for Carthage, where he made resolution of the state of their confederates in such terms, that still he fed them with some hope, That not only by their help they might be saved, but also that the Romans (notwithstanding they had in some (for forced and taken the city) might be surprized and taken there themselves: and in conclusion perfir'd and prevailed fo with them, that they granted not only to fend with him a great number of ships and caracks, laden with store of all things, but also to furnish him with more ships of war, to enshape his Armado. Whereupon he departed from Carthage with 130 Gallies, and 70 ships of burden, and had forewinds good enough to let him over into Sicily. But those winds kept him from doubling the point of the Cape Pachyrus.

The same and rumor first of Bonarco his coming, and then his delay above mens expectation, that checked it again, wrought diversly in the minds of the Romans and Syracusians, ministring one while fear, another while joy into them both. Whereupon Epicydes fearing left if the same Eadrytters which then stood, and were settled in that corner, should continue many dayes more, the Carthaginian navy would return again into Aeffrick, leaving the guard of Aradus to the Captains of the waged and mercurial fouldiers, failed to Bonarco, riding still with his fleet in the rode that looketh toward Aeffrick, and hearing a conflict at sea, not so much because he was inferior to the enemies either in force or number of ships (for he had more ships than could the Romans) but for that the winds flood more favourably to help the Roman Armado than his: howbeit, in the end he persuaded him to try the fortune of a battaile at sea. And Marcellus for his part, seeing both the Sicilian forces gather and assemble together from all parts of the island, and understanding that the Carthaginian fleet was coming with great store of victuals: for fear left at any time whiles he was shut up within the enemies City, he should be assailed both by Sea and Land: albeit he was short of them in number of ships, yet determined to hinder Bonarco for arriving at Syracuse. Thus rid two armadas of enemies affronting one another, about the head of Pachyrus, ready to play battaile, so soon as the calmes of the weather would give them leave to advance into the main and open Sea. Therefore when the Ealt wind began to lie, for certain dayes had blighted and raged hir Bonarco weighed anchor: and the vanguard of his Armado seemed to gather fill into the deep, only because he might more easily gain the Cape and promontory aforenaid. But so soon as he saw the Romans ships make way toward him, (I wot not what fuddain accidenct it was that affrighted him) he let up all his falls and fell off, into the main Sea: and after he had lent certaine messengers to Hermolaus, willing them for to let again their hulks home into Aeffrick, himself coasted all along Sicily, and shaped his course for Tarentum. Epicydes disappointed thus on a fuddain, of so great hopes that he had, because he would not return again to the siege of a City, whereas a great part was left already, failed to Agrigentum, there to abide and expect the event and small issue, rather than to stir himsell and try any more, how to help them with any succour from thence.

These things being reported in the camp of the Sicilians, to wit, that Epicedes had quit Syracuse; that the Carthaginians had abandoned the whole Iand of Sicily, and in manner yeilded it again into the hands of the Romans: after they had founded first their minds who were beleagued, by talk and conference with them; they sent Embassadors unto Marcellus, to treat about conditions of surrendering the City. When they were grown in a manner to this point, without any squaring or difference at all; That the Romans should have the signory all and wholly which belonged unto the Kings: and that, all the rest the Sicilians should enjoy, with liberty and their own proper Laws: the Embassadors stoueheld called forth to a parley, those unto whom Epides at his departure had committed the government of the affairs, and declared unto them, that as they were addrest Orauts unto Marcellus, so they were from him sent unto the army of the Sicilians: that generally all, as well the beleagued, as those who were without the danger of the siege, should be comprized within the treaty, and abide one and the same fortune; and that neither the one side nor the other should capitulate or enter into any covenant for themselves apart, without all the rest. Who being received and admitted, for to salute and speak unto their kinsfolk and friends, made them desire with the agreement and composition between Marcellus and them: and so after they had presented unto them some good hope of their safety, they periwaded with them so far forth, as to join with them, and all together, for to set upon and assail the bodies of the Captains depurued by Epicedes, namely, Polycleist, Philistus, and one Epides surname Sydus. When they were once made away and killed, they called the multitude together unto a general assembly: where they complained greatly of their poverty, and penury of all things (for which they were wont to murmur secretly among themselves:) "And albeit ye are dilated (as they) with so many miliaries and calamities, yet are ye not to blame for your tune therefore, so long as it was in your own power and choice, either to be delivered from them, or to endure them longer. As for the Romans (said they) it was not hatred, but meer love and charity that moved them to come against Syracuse for to assail it. For when they heard that the government of the state was turfed by Hippocrates and Epides (the ministers first belonging to Anniball, and after to Hieronimus) then they began to lay siege unto it intensing not the overthrow and destruction of the City it self, but to put down and depose the coarse tyrant that rul'd the state. Seeing then, that now Hippocrates is dead, Epides excluded from Syracus, his Deputies and Captains killed, and the Carthaginians driven out of all their hold and possession of Sicily, both by Land and Sea, what reason have the Romans, but to be willing and well content, that Syracuse should continue in peace now as well as if Hiero himself were living, the only maintainer and obfervant upholder of the Roman amity? And therefore, if ought but well should happen, either to the City, or to the Citizens sye may thank your selves, and none else, for letting slip opportunity now offered, of reconciliation and attenment with the Romans. Never look to have the like occasion hereafter, to that, which at this instant is preterred: if ye had the grace to see what a door is opened for you, to be delivered from the yoke of most insolent and proud tyrants. This speech they gave ear unto with exceeding accord and general applause. But before that any Embassadors were nominated to be sent unto Marcellus, it was thought good that new Pretors should be created. Out of the number of which Pretors, there were Orators addrested unto Marcellus. And the principal man among them spake in this wise. "Neither we Syracusians (quoth he) O Marcellus, the first recovered from you Romans; but Hieronymus, impious and wicked Prince as he was: yet nothing to much hurtful to you so as: nor afterwards when peace was knit again upon the murder of the tyrant, was it any citizen of Syracuse, but Hippocrates and Epides (the Kings right hands and ministers, who oppressed and kept us under, with fear of one side, and with despicable dignities on the other) that made the brack, and were the troubler and disturbers of this peace. Nor yet can any man come forth and lay truly, that ever we were at our own liberty; nor entertained not peace and amity with you. And now also I assure you, so soon as by the massacre of these, that held Syracuse: in such oppression and bondage, we began again to be our own masters: and to have the law in our own hands: the first thing you that we do, is this, to come and present our selves unto you, to deliver up our armor and weapons, to yeeld our bodies, our City, the walls, and all the strength thereof, and to refuse no condition, that it shall please you Romans to impose upon us. As to your self, O noble Marcellus, the Gods have given you the honour of conquer, over the most noble and beautiful city of all other in Greece. Behold now, what memorable acts soever that we have at any time achieved, either by Land or Sea all makes to the advancement of the glorious title and dignity of your triumph. See you then, that another day it be not known by bare hear-lay and the trump of fame, how great and mighty a City you have won, but rather that it may stand still and remain for all posterity, for a mark and worthy spectacle to behold: to the end, that whosoever hereafter, shall reform this by Land: who over shall arrive there by Sea, it may present unto them, both our Trophies and worthy victories over the Athenians and Carthaginians: and also this of yours over us, the bravest conquest of all the rest. See (I say) that you leave for your house and family, the City of Syracuse whole and sound, to do homage and fealty ever hereafter, to the name and image of the Marcellus, and to hold of them as of their sovereign LL, in chief and in villegage.

"That
A  "That all the World may see, that the late remembrance of Hieronymus, beareth no greater stroke "with the Romans, that the ancient name of King Hiero, a noble Prince of famous memory, "Much longer was he a friend, than the other an enemy. His good deeds and many favours ye "have tafted and felt with great contentment: the folly and madness of Hieronymus, hurt none "of you, but wrought his own confusion and overthrow. There was nothing but they might "have obtained at the Romans hands: all was cleer there, and no danger from thence. But a "mong their own selves they were at more war: there was the peril, there was all the mischief, "for the Roman rebels, who were run from them, doubting that they should be delivered over "into their hands, and not comprized within the terms of the composition and protection, drove "the auxiliaries also that were waged foildiers into the fame scruple and fear, They hastily there- "fore took arms, and first killed the Pretors: and afterwards, ran all about to maleface the Syra- "cutians. Look whom they happened to meet, them they murdered in this furious fit of choleric. "Whatever came next to their hands, and lay handfome for them, they rifled. And because "forsooth, they would not be without their leaders, they created his prohols or Captains, that "three should govern Acradina, and other three Noftos. At the last, after the uprore was "appealed, the mercenary foildiers afoead, followed the matter throughly by leach and "diligent inquiry, what were the capitulations indeed agreed upon with the Romans: and "then began the very truth to appear, namely, that their condition and the fugitives were far "different, C  These Embassadors in very good time returned from Marcellus, and certified them that they "were carryed away with a wrong fumme and tale imitation, and the Romans had no just caufe to "punith them. Now there was one of thole three Prohols of Acradina, a Spaniard named Meri- "mus. Unto him there was sent for the none among thole of the retinue and train of the Emba- "sadors aforefaid, one of the Spaniards, who were auxiliary foildiers, ferving under the Romans, "who finding Meriues alone without other company, gave him to underftand especially above all "things, in what terms he had left Spain (and from thence he was newly come) namely, how the "Romans there were grown mighty, and held great hand over them with their forces. And "that himself, in cafe he had a mind to do and worthy deed, might alone rife, and be a great man "in his country: chufe whether he lift tofe under the Romans, or return again into his own "D  Home, Contrarywise, if he went on thill in this confue he liad begun, and minded thill to be "beguiled, what long abiding place could he have there, flutt up as he was from Sea and Land? "Meriues pondered well thefe reafons: and when it was agreed, that there fhould be addreffed "new Embassadors unto Marcellus, fent his own brother with them, who by the felf fame Spani- "an was brought forth from all the rett unto Marcellus: and after he had a proteftation granted, he "laid the plot, and ordered all the matter how it fhould be done, and fo returned to Acradina. "Then Meriues becaufe he would withdraw mens minds from all fupposition of treason and that he "intended nothing lefle, than to betray Acradina, gave it out. That he liked not, and would no "more of this recurrence, ever and anon, of Embassadors between: and therefore as he would ad- "mit of none to come from Marcellus, fo he would fend no more to him. And to the end, that "all the guards fhould be kept more diligently, he thought it good to divide conveniently among "the Prohols, the quarters of the City, and allign to every one his ward by himself, and that each "one fhould be bound to answer for the fafe keeping of his own division, and for no more. Then "all gave their content to part accordingly, and to himfelf befel the charge of that quarter which "reacheth from the fountain or well Arthebus unto the mouth or entry of the great key or haven. "And hereof he gave notice and intelligence to the Romans, Who upon Marcellus caufed a great "Hulk, laden with armed foildiers, to be baffned by an halting rope unto a Gally of four conie of "oars, and fo in the night by strength of oars to be tewed and drawn up after it unto Acradina, and "lindeth the foildiers over again the gate, that is near to the fountain Arthebus. This being done "about the relief of the fourth watch, Meriues received the foildiers that were fett afore at "the gate, according as before it was agreed. And Marcellus by the dawning of the day, with all "his forces gave a Camifado upon the walls of Acradina, in fuch manner, that not only he turned "thither unto his affualt all thole that kept Acradina, but also from Noftos there came running "whole squadron and companies of armed men (leaving their own wards) for to repel and put "back the violence and affault of the Romans. In this turmoil and trouble, certain Barges ap- "pointed and fubmitted thereto afoead, were brought about to Noftos: and there fett other foildiers "and who coming at ennuers upon the corps of guards that were left halfnaked and very weak, "by reafon of the departure of their fellows, and finding the gates wide open, at which ewehile the "foildiers ran out, with small ado were matters of Noftos, left, as it was, forborn of warders, "who in fear made halt to run away and escape. And none of them all had lefle means to de- "fend themselves, or smaller mind to tarry still, than the fugitive rebels, for they durft nor well "trust their own fellows, and fo in the hottest of the skirmiff made an escape. Marcellus fo "soon as he understood, that Noftos was won, and likewise that one quarter of Acradina was held "and kept for him, and that Meriues with his guard had joyned to his foildiers, founded the re- "treat: for fear, that the Kings treasure, which was more in name than in deed, fhould be rifed "and spoiled, Thus by suppressing the violence of the foildiers, both the rebel fugitives that were in Acradina, had good time and place to fhift for themselves and get away, and also the Syracusians delivered now at last from fear, opened the gates of Acrocidia, and sent Orators unto Marcellus, H craving nothing but life for themselves and their children, Marcellus called his Councel together, and those Syracusians likewise, who in the time of civil dissention, were driven to forsake their houses, and remained among the garrisons of the Romans: and then he made the Embassadors this answer. "There have not been (quothe) more benefits and good turns for the space of fifty years received at King Hiero his hands by the people of Rome, than detriments and mischiefs intended against them within these few years, by them that have feized and possessed the City of Syracusa. But most of those mischiefs in the end, have lighted upon their heads right justly, who duly deferred the fame: and for the breach of league and covenant, they themselves have suffered at their own hands more grievous punishment by far, than the people of Rome I would willingly ever have required. As for me, this is the third year that I lie in siege before Syracusa's: nor, I assure you, with this intent, that the City should not be relieved safe and sound for the natural people thereof to keep and inhabit, but that the Captains and ring-leaders of fugitives and rebels might not seize it, and to hold it in captivity and oppression. How much the Syracusians might have done with me at first, may be easily seen by the example either of those Syracusians who converted among the guards of the Romans, or of the Spanish Captain Meriones, who yielded up his garrison. Yea, and the hardy and resolute course in the end taken (although it were with the latest) by the Syracusians themselves, may sufficiently relieve the fame. Whereby also it may appear, that for all my travel and pains which I have undergone, for all the perils which I have adventured and passed through, about the walls of Syracusa, both by Land and Water, this long: I have gathered no fruit so sweet and pleasant as this, that it may be said, how I was able, yet at last, to win and conquer Syracusa."

Then the Quoeter was sent, attended with a guard, unto Naos, for to enter upon the Kings treasure there, and to keep the fame in safety. The pillage of the City was given to the soldiours: but there were appointed certain warders over every house of theirs, who were among the garrisons of the Romans, for to keep the same. Amidst many cruel, frightful, and foul examples of anger, malice, and covetouness, which happened to be committed during the time of this laccage, it is reported, that in so great hurlyburly as possible might be, when a City is newly taken, and hungry soldiours run to rilling, Archimedes was busily occupied, and studying upon certain Geometrical figures that he had drawn out in the dust, and happe'd to be slain by a soldiour, that knew not who he was. Whereat Marcellus was much offended and displeased: and therupon gave especial order, that he should be honorably enter'd: yes, and caus'd his kinfolks to be sought out; and all they in remembrance of him, and for his name fake, were not only laid but also well accounted of, and had in good reputation. Thus you see in what sort, and by what means especially Syracusa was won. A City wherein was found such store of wealth and riches, as hardly would have been gotten in Carthage, if it had been forced then: notwithstanding it was able to hold out with Rome, and maintain war with equal force and power. Some few days before the winning of Syracusa, T. Othoelius with fourkore Gallies, of five ranks of oars, crossed the Seas from Lilybcum to Ierica, and being entered the gate before day light, chanced to take by the way certain Caeticks charged with corn. After he was disembark'd and set a Land, he waited grievously part of the territory about Ierica, and returned to the City with booty and prizes of all sorts. And the third day after he went from Lilybcum he returned thither again with 30 caracks full of corn and other booty: and that came forthwith to Syracusa: which if it had not come as it did in good time to help the present necessity, the conquerors as well as the conquered had felt the smart of most extreme and grievous famine. In the same summer, the Roman Generals in Spain (who almost for two years had done nomemoa but there but warred by policy and stratagemes more than by force of arms) dislodged from their forces and winter harbours, and joynd their armies together. Then they called a Councel, where they jumped with one general accord in this opinion. That considering all this while they had effected this much only, as to empeach and stay Aesralbal from all means of passing over into Italy, it was now high time to make an end at one of the war in Spain. And to effect and bring this to passe, they inpepted verily that their strength was well amended and sufficient, by reason that in the winter time they had levied and put in arms thirty thousand Celtiberians. Now the Carthaginians had in Spain then no fewer than three armies. Aesralbal the son of Gisco, and Magn, were encamped with all their forces together, distant from the Romans almost five days journey: Aesralbal the son of Amilcar, an ancient warrior, and an old Captain in Spain, was somewhat neeterer with his whole power, before a City named Antigros. Him the Roman Generals were desirous to defeat and vanquish first: and in good hope they were, that they had strength enough and to spare, for to accomplish that: marly, this was their only doubt and fear, left upon the dilcomfiture of him, the other Aesralbal and Magn would for fear retire themselves into the insuffable woods, and take the wilds and mountains, and so maintain a long war. They suppos'd therefore it was the beft course to divide their power between them in two parts, and at once to compass the whole war of Spain. And thus they agreed to part their forces: namely, That T. Cornelius should lead two third parts of the army, consisting of Romans and allies, against Magn and Aesralbal: and that Cn. Cornelius with the other third part of that old army should joyn with the Celtiberians, and war against Aesralbal the Barchine [i, son of Amilcar above-said,] Both their Captains with their hosts set out together in their journey, putting the Celtiberians berians before in the vanguard, and encamped near the City Armorgis in the fight of their enemies, having but the river running between. And there Ca.Scipio laid behind, and made his bode with the power aforesaid: but P.Scipio went onwarde to perform that part of the war which he purposed and intended, Asdrubal after he perceived that there lay in camp but a small power of Romans, and that their whole hope reined upon the aids of the Cimbrians: as one that could well skill of the fallhood and treachery of the barbarous people, but especially of all those nations, among whom he had been so long a founder: by reason that both camps, as well his own as the other of the Romans, were full of Spaniards, he used by the means of reciprocal commenece of their language for to have secret speech and conference with the principal heads of the Cimbrians, and so treated with them, that in consideration of a great sum of money, they were persuaded and yielded in the end to withdraw all their forces from thence, and give the Romans the slip. And this they propos'd was not so heinous and odious a fact. For why? they were not dealt withal to turn their swords upon the Romans, and to war against them: again, they were to have as good pay and wages to fill their bellies, and not to serve, as was sufficient to bind them for to bear arms, and fight: and last of all, rest it fell, and sleeping in a whole skin, together with their return home to their own, and the joy and pleasure of visiting their friends, and seeing their goods and lands, were plausible and pleasing inducements to every man. And therefore the Captain: the milties were no sooner drawn thereto, than the very multitude, Over and besides, to strike it dead sure, they stood in no fear of the Romans (being so few as they were) that they could possibly keep them perforce. And surely, this might well serve, to be a Caelest for Roman Captains ever here after, and such precedent examples and instances as this, may stand in stead of good leasons indeed, to teach them how they must trust again the aids of foieiners: and never to relieve themsoe much upon them, but that they always have in their camp the greater part of their own forces, and the more number of their natural foildiers. All on a Judain therefore the Cimbrians dislodged, plucked up standards, and departed from them, and never bad them farewell. And when the Romans demanded the cause of this change yes, and befought and importun'd them to tarry, they made them no other answer but this, That they were called and sent for home by occasion of wars in their own country, Scipio seeing that these Allies of his were so slippery, and could neither be intended nor enforced to stay: and that himself alone without them was not able to make his part good with the enemy: and to joy again with his brother, was a thing impossible; for want of other good means, for the present, when he saw no remedy else, determined to retire himself as far backward as he could: having this especial care above all things, not to encounter and joy with battle with the enemy in plain feld, without some advantage, who now was passed over the river, and traced him hard at heels in his_church.

About the same time P. Scipio stood in the like terms of fear, but in more danger by the coming of a new enemy and that was Mosquitus the young Prince whom then was a friend and penionary foildier of the Carthaginians: but afterwards mighty and renowned for his amity with the Romans, He with his Numidian Horsemen first encontrol'd P. Scipio, as he marched on his journey, and afterwards both day and night molested and troubled him very severely: in im. fort, that not only he would intercept and catch up those that were gone out wandering and bragging far from the camp, a fueling or foraging, and send them short of home: but also ride braving even before the camp. Many a time would he venture, yes, and enter upon the thickest of the landing corps de guard, and make fencet work and trouble among them. By night also he used oft to make many starts upon a fuddain, and silence the gates of the camp and the rampart, and put them in exceeding great frights. So as the Romans at no time, nor in no places could be at rest and quiet for him, but ever in fear and doubt of some fureweld turn or other of him: so as they were driven to keep within their rampart cut off from the use of all commodities abroad, and in a manner as good as besieged: and more frightly yet were they like to be beleaguer'd, in case Indubius, who was coming (as the rumor went) with 7000 Sefellatans, were once joyed with the Carthaginians. Whereupon Scipio a wary warrior and prudent Captain otherwise driven to the hardest extremities, and forced to make shifts, entr'd into a rath and inconsiderate assignmen, even to go on and meet (forsooth) Indubius in the night, and in what place forever it should be his hap to encounter him, there to bid him battle, and fight with him. Leaving therefore a gueard to keep the camp, and T. Fonteius his Lieuenent, as Provoif and Captain, he let out at midnight and meeting with his enemies, joyed battle with them: but they skirmished rather by loose companies in their march, than with their united forces in set and right field. Howbeit, the Romans had the better hand so much as it was, considering what a conuiled and disorderly conflict there might be. But the Numidian Cavalry, whom Scipio thought he was secured of, and that they were not aware of him, all on a sudden flank'd the sides of the Romans, and mightyli terrified them. Against theire G Numidians, whiles Scipio made head again aforeth, behold a third fort of enemies also charged upon his back, even the Carthaginian Captains, who by this time while the other were in fight, had overtaken their allies and were come thither. So as the Romans were to mainist battle on all hands and were at a stand and in doubt with themelves against which enemy to turn first or what way with a close confined squadron to give the venture for to break through. As the General was thus manfully fighting, and encouraging his foildiers, presenting and opposing him forward, where was most need and danger, his chance was to be run through the right side of the body with a Lance: and that maffive band of the enemies which had charg'd upon the thick

...battle, which environed their Captain, seeing Scipio falling from his Horse ready to die, in great joy and mirth let up a cheerful shout, and ran all over the army, and carried glad tidings that the Roman General was slain. This noise being once spread all abroad, caused both the enemies to take themselves undoubtedly for victors, and the Romans to make no other attempt but they were vanquished. Whereupon they having lost their Leader, began forthwith to fly out of the field. But as it was no hard matter for them to make a lane and break through among the Numidians, and other auxiliary soldiers lightly armed; so to escape and go clear away from so many Horfe, and Footmen also, who were as swift on foot as the horsemen, it was almost impossible. Thus they were more in manner slain in their flight now, than in their fight before. And there had not one remained alive, but that the day being far spent already, and toward evening, the night came on space and overtook them. The Carthaginian Captains, and those also of Afric, taking the full benefit of this their good fortune, slept not their business, nor made delay; but presently after the battle, stately allowing their soldiers so much sleep as would content nature. marched in great haste toward Africas. the son of Amilcar: making an accompart astirly, that when they had joined their power with his, they should break the neck of this war, and end it once for all. When they were come to him. great joy and gratulation there was between the Captains and the hoots of both sides, for this fresh victory newly archived: and seeing they had already defeated so brave a warrior and great commander, together with his whole army, they made no doubt but expected certainly to have another hand as good as this.

The news verily of this so great a foil and overthrow, was yet not come unto the Romans: but yet they were strucken into a sad dump and deep silence, and more than that, into a secret prejudice and fore-deeming of some unlucky tidings: as commonly mens minds are to fore-give and tell aforehand, when there is some mischief and ill toward them. The General himself besides that he saw he was abandoned and forlorn of his associates, and knew the forces of the enemies so mightily reenforced by good opportunities and gueyies, yea, and by very reason, was induced to suspect some loss and calamity received already, rather than enclined to hope after any good successe and happy speed. For thus he discoursed with himself: How is it possible that Afric and Mago should bring their armies together without conflict, unless my brother be slain in fight, or have forgotten to be a warrior? how cometh it that he withflood them not? or how happeneth it that my brother followed not hard after them fift upon their backs? At lastwise, if he had not been able to keep them afunder, but that both Captains and armies mutt needs meet and joyn in one, yet he him elfe thinks, at lastwisefould have come by this time to his brother, and brought his own power to his. In this perplexity and anguish of spirit, he thought yet, for the present time, that the only good course he could take, was to withdraw himself back from thence as far as he could, and to all that one night unawares to his enemies (who to long only were quiet) he marched a great way and won much ground of them. The next night, as soon as the enemies perceived that the Romans were dislodged and gone, they sent out the Numidian light Horsemen and began to follow after them spaece, and put them as fast as possibly they could: and before night the Numidian Cavalry had over taken them, and skirmished one while with the tail of their march, another whiles at their sides and flanks, and gave them no rest: whereas the Romans made as it were a stand, and began to defend and save their army as well as they could: yet with great warines and regard of security, Scipio encouraged them so to fight, as they might march on ftil and gain ground, before the Infantry overtook them. But as one while the army was one foot, and another whiles ftood still, in long time they rid but a little ground. And Scipio seeing the night draw on space, reclamed his soldiers from farther skirmishes: and after he had rallied them together, he retired with them up to a little mount, no sufficient place (God wot) of safe retreat for an army especially so troubled and affrighted already, yet higher than any other place all about. There the first thing that he did, was to beftow the baggage and cavalry in the midst within his forces: and at first the infantry ranged round about in a circle, made no difficult matter of it to put by the violent charge of the Numidian Horsemen. But afterwards when the three Generals marching with three full armies approached their Captains, Scipio perceiving that he was never able to keep that place without some fortification, began to call his eye about, and to bethink with himself, by what means possible he might empale himself round about as it were with a rampier: but the hill was so naked of wood, and the soil of the ground besides to fiery and craggy, that he could neither finde any underwood fit to cut out stakes for a palisado nor earth meet to make turfs for a bank, or minable for a trench: and in one word, all things onward and unhandsome for a mount, and to fortifie withall. Neither was there any place there, to speak of, so steep and upright, but the enemy might at eafe mount up and limb it. All the hill on every side, had a gentle rising and ascent up to the top. Howbeit, to represent some flew and remembrance yet of a rampier, they were for ed to take their pack saddles, with their packs tied fast to them, and to round about to pile them and raise them to the utmost height of a mount: And where these wanted pack saddles to make up the work, there they were fain to heap together, all sorts of fardels, trusses, and other carriages, and to put them between the enemies and them. The Carthaginian armies when they were come, marched very easily up against the Hill. But the new fashion and manner of their defences and fortifications, was very strange unto them, so as at the first the fouldiers marvelled much...
A and were attionied thereat, and stood still. But their Captains on all sides cried out upon them, and why tland ye gaping (lay they) so and do not pull in pieces and pluck away that foolish ba table there, good to make sport with? A very toy, that women and children would dare hand about thus long? Why, the enemy is taken already in a pinfold, and ieth lurking and hiding himself behind the hurdles and other carriages. After this manner (I say) the leaders rated at the foulators. But it was not to easy a matter, either to get over that Barricado of the packs or to re move and rid them out of the way, as they lay piled close against them: nor yet to unfold and unwrap the pack-ladders, lying overwhelmed as they did, under the packs, and entangled together with them. Thus they were hindered and held a long time: and when at length they had put this bag and baggage aside that was set in their way, and made passage and entrance for the armed men, B and that in divers places, the camps and tents were soon taken on all sides; ere a man could turn about: and so being few to many, and frighted men to late conquerors, no marvel if they were killed and hevno in pieces in every place. Howbeit, many of the fouldiers: having fled for refuge into the forret's near by escaped into the camp of P. Scipio, whereof T. Fontius his Lieutenant had the charge. As fo Co. Scipio: (some write that he was slain upon that mount at the first onfe and affault made by the enemies: others report that with a few others he fled into a Tower hard by the camp: and that there was a fire made round about it, and so when the gates thereof were burned, which by no violent means otherwise they could break open, the enemies enter'd and took it, and they within were killed every one. Captain and all, Thus Co. Scipio came to his end, in the seventh year after that he went into Spain: and on the nine and twentieth day after that his brother lost his life. Their death was bewailed and lamented no less on all Spain than at Rome. For among the citizens at Rome one part of their sorrow they took for the los of the armies, another part went for the distraction and alienation of the Province and a third again was spent in the cogitation of the publick calamity: but Spain from one end to the other, mourned only for their Governors and Captains, and had a great miff of them. And Co. of the twain, was more bewailed, becaused he had been longer time their ruler, and had won the favours and affection of men, and polished their hearts before the other:

and was the first that ever gave them in those parts a proof and tail of the Romans just and temperate government;

When the army was thus defeated and brought to nothing, so as Spain seemed litterly loft, there were one man yet, that recovered all again, and brought the decaied state to the former perfection. There was in the army one L. Martius, the son of Septimius, a Gentlemen and Knight of Rome, a forward young man, meritorious courage and wit, far above the degree and condition wherin he was born. Besides this excellent and most toward disposition of his by nature, he had great helps by the discipline and instructions of Co. Scipio: under whom, for so many years he was trained and had learned all military knowledge and skill meet for a soldier, This Martius what by rallying the dispered fouldiers who were fled, and what by drawing others out of fuddry gar-rions had rais'd and assembled together a reasonable good power, and prov'd, in with T. Fontius, the Lieutenant aforesaid of P. Scipio. But the Roman Knight, above all others, grew to so great credit and reputation among all the fouldiers, that when they had forti'd their camp within the River Tiberis: and were determined among themselves, to chuse one General over the armies, in a solemn assembly of fouldiers, even by their own military election: they went one by one in course one after another, unto the main corp de guerard that defended the rampier: and to the other wards belonging unto the camp until they had all given their voices: and so by general consent created him their General, At which time they had ather and that was but small) they employed in fortifying their hold, and conveying thither corn and videl: and what chargeover was imposed by him upon the fouldiers, the fame they executed readily and willingly, and without any threw that their hearts were dismayed, and cast down any jot at all. But after that news was brought, that After the the son of Gisago, was coming against them, to dispatcch clean the relics of the war that he had pass'd over Tiberis: and approached near: and the fouldiers saw once the Foggia of battle put forth unto them by this new General: calling to mind, what noble warriors they had served under but a while before: what worthy leaders they were wont to have, and with how puissant armies they used heretofore to go to the field: they fell a weeping every one, flanking and beating their heads: some lit up and stretched out their hands to heaven, blaming and accusing the Gods: others lay along upon the ground, calling every one upon his own Captain by special name. Neither could their piteous moans and plaints be hid: notwithstanding the Centuctions: encouraged what they could the fouldiers of their companies: notwithstanding (I say) that Martius himself sometimes spake them fair, sometimes rebuked them, for giving themselves to such foolish and vain putting-like women: and not rather resolve to raise up their hearts, and with him to quicken and whet their pomacks in defence of themselves: and of the commo-

G wealth: and not to suffer their former Captains and Leaders to lie dead and unrevenged. By this time now all on a sudden, the shout of the enemies was decliv'd, and the sound of the trumpers were within hearing being come close under the rampier. Whereupon all at once running their forrow and weeping into anger and indignation: they ran every man to his armor and weapon: and as if they had been no mind they hali'd from all parts to the gates and entries of the camp, and charged upon the enemies as they came careless and without order and array. Immediately this unexpected and fuddain object, stroke an exceeding fear into the Carthaginians:

as wondring from whence so many enemies should start up so soon, considering the armies were not lately clean in a manner destroyed: and how it came to passe, that being newly vanquished and put to flight, they should be so soon, so bold and confident of their own selves: who a Gods name, should be his General, after the two Scipios were slain: what Captain and Governor had they over the camp: and who gave out the signal of battle: marvelling (I say) at these premisses, and so many particulars, that they once imagined not afore, at first hand they wift not what to do, but as amazed men, began to give ground and retire; but afterwards, being still fiercely followed upon with a violent charge, they were plainly beaten back and put to flight.

And verily, either there had been a foul havoc and slaughter of them that fled, or a rash and dangerous enterprise for them who would have followed the chase: but that Marius having to found the retreat, and opposing himself against the foremost ensigns of the vanguard, yes, and taking hold of some of them himself, laid the main battle and reproved their violence, who were upon the point already to pursue them with heat. And so be reduced them back again into the camp, as greedily as they were full of murder, and thirstily of bloodshed. The Carthaginians, who at the first were driven from the rampart, and for fear hasted away: after that they saw none to follow them, supposing they had been afraid, and therefore (said full: whereupon they departed to their camp again in relentless manner, fair and softly. And as careless as they were in their retire thither, so negligent were they in guarding the same: for although their enemies were near, yet they remembered and thought again, that they were but the tail and relics of two armies, vanquished and defeated a few days before. Upon this resolute pervasion of theirs, and bale conceit of the enemies, they were very negligent every way within their camp: whereof Marius having by his epial, certain intelligence, resolved upon a desigination, which at the first sight seemed more like a project of hazard, than an enterprise of hardiness: and it was no more, but even upon a bravely to set upon the enemy in his own camp, and give him a camilado. For as he thought it an easier emprise, to force the hold and pavilions of Aframuli, being but one, than to defend and keep his own, in case three armies and three Captains should join together: so he considered withal, that either if he sped well in this exploit, he should restore and let up again unto the Romans, the decayed and prostrate State of Spain: or if he were discomfited and put back yet by giving the adventice first upon the enemies, he should not be altogether contemned: and of no reputation. But left this attempt so sudden, and the terror and error which may fall in the night-time, should happen to trouble this his designed plot, and the course of his good fortune: he thought it not amiss, to make a speech unto his fellow-soldiers, and to exhort and encourage them aforehand. And therefore calling them together to a general audience, in this manner he discoursed unto them of his intent and purpose.

"My valorous and loyal soldiers, either the reverence and affectionate love of mine, towards our chief Captains during their life, and after their death; or the very present condition and fate wherein we all now stand: may be a sufficient testimony and proof to any man whoiover, that this charge and government of mine, as it is in regard of your judgement of me right honourable, so it is in truth, and in very deed, to me most weighty, and full of care and trouble.

"For at what time as (but that fear took away all fence of terror) I was not so much matter of grief to minifie consolation unto the common misfortune and calamity of you all. And surely I have no litt at all (the harder is my cafe) to avert my mind from continual grief of heart, not so much as even then, when as I am to live and die, by what means I may be able to preserve (for the behoof of my country) these small remnants of two armies. For why the grievous and bitter remembrance of calamities past, is ever before me. The two Scipios trouble me all the day time with careful thoughts, they disquiet me in the night season with fearful dreams, they make me oftentimes to start out of my sleep, willing and charging me, to suffer neither them nor their soldiers, (who were your fellowes and companions) and for the space of eight years in those parts where they served, never received foil nor yet the Common-wealth, to continue unrevenged: warning me withal, to follow their discipline, their precepts, rules, & good instructions. And like as whiles they lived here among us, there was no man more obedient than my self to their directions and commandments: even so after their decease, whatsoever in my conceit, I judge they would have had especially done in all occurrences, the fame my define is, that you also (my fellow-soldiers) would like of and approve for the very best, I would not have you to weep, wail, and lament still for them, as if they were extinct and gone for ever; (for they live still, and shall, so long as the world endureth, and continue immortal in renown and fame of their worthy and noble acts) but rather so often as you remember and think of them, to go like hardy and valiant men to a field, even as if you heard them speaking unto you, or saw them giving the signal of battle. Neither was it (I assure you) any other object but that, presented yesterday unto your eyes and minds, which effected so memorable a piece of service as it was: by which ye have made good proof into your enemies, and given them to understand, that the Roman name did not together with the Scipios: and that the vigour and virtues of that people which was not extinct and buried, by the overthrow at Cannae, will ever rise again (ye be may be sure) out of all adversities, let cruel fortune storm and rage alms as ever she can. And now, since ye have shewed such valour and hardines already of your own accord, I have a mind, and A and would gladly fee, how bravely ye will bear your felles upon the direction and commandment of your Captain. For yesterday, when I founded the retreat unto you, at what time as you followed freely upon the enemy, being troubled and disheartned: my desire and meaning was not to reprefs and abate your bold courage but to defer and relieve it against some greater opportunity or advantage, and for a more honourable and glorious exploit: which upon the first occasion, you advantage and prepared, might surprize them at unawares, and not flan-ding upon their guard, armed and well appointed, affall them dismayed & naked and that which more is, whiles they are in their bedstaff and sound asleep. And the hope that I conceive of this good opportunity and effect thereof (my fouldiers) arife not upon some fantastical imagination of mine own brain by hap-hazard, and upon vain presumption, but grounded upon good reason and present experience. For verily if a man should demand even of you your owne, What the reason was, that being but few in number, and lately diffumated, ye were able to defead your camp against many more than your felles, and those harteneed with treflis stories, ye would make no other answer but this, That you fearing that which followed, had both forticed your camp in every repect with strong munitions, and were your felles well appointed and furnished, yes and ready to receive them when ever they came. And surely, by this, and we find it true by experience: Men are least sure and respectfull against that which fortune fainth is fcarles, and need not to be prevented, because that which we neglect is evermore open and exposed to all dangers. Now the enemies doubt nothing lesl at this time, then that we, who were so lately our felles besieged and affallied by them, will now come to give an affault upon them in their hold. Let us adventure to do that which no man would beleve that ever we durft entreprize.

B our felles besieged and assallied by them. we will now come to give an affault upon them in their hold. Let us adventure to do that which no man would beleve that ever we durft entprise.

C the selfsame cause which teemeth to make the thing most difficult. shali effect it looneft of all others. At the change of the third watch I will lead you forth without any noise at all in garments silence. Well entombed and retired I am, that in the camp the Sentinels are not relieved in due course and order, neither yet the ordinary corde de guard kept as they ought to be. Your hour and order shall not to soon be hazed at the gates, nor your first charge and affall given, but ye shall surely be matters of the camp. Then let me fee you perform that daunger and exec-tution among them heavy and dead asleep, affrighted with an unexpected siren, and taken on a sudden unarm'd and in their beds. from whom yesterday ye thought me, that ye were called away and reclaimed, I wot well that this teemeth unto you an indirect entubre and full of hazard, but when things go crofs and stand in doublt terms and when other mens faint the hardest attempts, yes, and the most venturous and desperate couries, are over fated and speed best. For that a man fly not to little at the very instant when a thing is to be done (whereof the opportunity passeth and flie away ere one would think) immediately when it is once gone, he may fling his cap after well enough, and complain thereof and say, I had but, but never the nearer, One Army they have hard at hand, and two more are not far off: now if we venture of them here, our opportunity and advantage is as good as theirs. And once already ye have made trial of their forces and your owne: put we it off another day, contenting our felles with the bare name of yesterdays fall, and give over so, it will be great doubt and danger, left all E the Generals with all their armies be rallied and re-united. And shall we then be able to hold our owne against three Generals and three hots, whom Cn, Scepius having about him his whole princedom, forth and in good plight, could not withstand nor abide? Our Captains by dividing their forces, and dissipating one compleat army, were defeated and outworne: iemblably may our enemies, part while they be, and forced tondaver be dissimulated and brought to thought. Lo, this is the only way for us to ware and none other. And therefore let us wait no longer than the commodities opportunity of the next night. Go ye then a godbelling make man y of your felles, take your repat and repose, that ye may be ftreth and lusty to break into your eneemies hold with the same resolute courage, wherewith ye defended your owne. The fouldiers, as they gladly gave ear to this new counsell of their new captain, to the more and ac-Fous and adventurous that it was, the better it pleased them. The rest of the day behind they spent in furnishing and making ready their harness and weapons, and in cherishing their bodies, yes, and the better part of the night they slept quietely. And so at the relief of the fourth watch they felt toward.

Now were there other companies also of Carthaginians, beyond this nest camp above said, about six miles distant from them. A hollow way and valley there lay between, standing thick of trees. In the midst of this wood, for a long space well near he hallowed closely a cohorte of footmen, yes and certain horfe-men of Romans: but by his leave this was but a caffy and life trick, borrowd of the Carthaginians. Thus the middle way being intercepted and taken up, the rest of the forces were conducted in a still march toward the enemies in the nest camp. And finding no G guards before the gates, no Sentinels upon the rampier, they entered in as it had been into their own holde and no man made resistance: then they sounded trumpets and gave the alarm. Some fell killing of the enemies half asleep: others fying dry hither and thither for to kindle fire upon their huts and pavilions: others some again keep the gates, that none should line forth. So the fire the outer and middle all together put them out of their right wits: and made them as it were besides themselves: that neither hear they could, nor yet make any hit for themselves. Unarmed and naked men fell among the bands of armed fouldiers. Some run in battle to the gates, others finding the wails and pavilions befire run upon the rampier: and look as any escaped and got away

from thence by that means he fleith straightways directly toward the other camp. Where they H were caught up by the cohort of footmen, and the coret of horsemen, which role up suddenly out of their Ambulaco: and being enclosed on every side, were killed to the last man. And yet, if it had been any ones good hap to have escaped from thence with life, so swifly, and with so great expedition, the Romans after they had got the nearer camp, piped themselves to the other, that he could not have recovered it before them, to bring news of the defeat. And even there likewise, the farther they were off from their enemy, the more negligent they were: and because some also a little before day were lift away a foraging, fueling, and plundering, the Romans found every thing more loible and out of order, than in the other camp. Their weapons only stood reared up in their corporis guard, thebufilders themselves were unarmed, either sitting and lying all along on the ground, or walking up and down before the gates, and under the rampier. With these fouldiers to lecture, to rob, to steal, is disarmed and disordered (the Romans being yet in their hot blood, and not cooled upon their fresh merchandise, and more than that, lusty and brag for their new victory) began to make a fray, and to skirmish. But the Carthaginians were not able to keep them out of the gates. And so within the Camp there was a hot and cruell fight: for, from all parts thereof, they ran together upon the first alarm that arose in the beginning of the tumult and sfielling. And long had that skirmish continued, but that the Romans bucklers and targets seen al bloody were a pattern unto the Carthaginians of former execution; and thereupon drove them into a mighty fear. This fear full sight causeth them all to turn back and take their heels: and thus as many of them as escaped killing got out by heaps wherefoever they could make shift to find way and were clean turned out of their camp, and all that they had. So in the compass of one day and night, by the conduct and direction of L. Martius, there were two encampments forced and won from the enemies: in which there were 37000 of the enemies slain, Faith Claudia, who translated the Annals of Acilius out of the Greek tongue into the Latin, and 1830 taken prisoners besides the gain of a mighty rich booty, in which pilage there was found a shield of silver weighing 138 pound, with the image and portraiture of Afric[u]n the Barchine, Volturn Annius recethed, that the camp only of Mage was taken, and seven thousand men slain: and that in another battell with Afrinc, l upon a tally forth, there died ten thousand, and 4230 were taken prisoners. Piso writeth, that when Mage followed after our men in an hot and disorderly chase (for they seemed to give back and retreat) there were five thousand men killed by the train of an ambusc. But all writers do blesse on the great honour and fame of Duke Martius. And L. bel des the very truth of his glorious name, they make mention also and speak of some miracles: namely that as he made the Oration unto his foildiers, there was seen a flaming fire burning from his head without any lense and feeling of his to the great wonder and fear of the foildiers that stood about him: and that in the memorials of his brave victory over the Carthaginians, there remained in the temple of Jupiter, until the Capitol was burned that foreaided shield, with the Image of Afrinc, and it was called Martius his shield. After this, Spain was quiet for a long time, whilst both sides after to many overthrows given and taken between them, were loath to hazard the main chance in one battell.

In the time that these affairs passed in Spain, Marcellus upon the winning of Syracuse, having fet all other things in order throughout Sicily, with great felicity and uprightness, that not only he greatly augmented his own city but also enlarged the majesty of the people of Rome, brought over to Rome, all the goodly and beautiful ornaments of that City, their g-images and molten images their pictures and painted tables, whereof there was great fore in Syracuse. These braveries (no doubt) at the first were no more but the spoils of enemies, and lawfully acquired in right of war and conquest. But from thence began our great love and liking to the cunning workmanship of Grecian Artisans: and from hence came afterwards our licentiousness and outrage in spoiling and robbing, so commonly & ordinarily, all sacred and profane places, whereof these things were to be had: which flaid not so, but proceeded and turned at length to the spoiling of the Roman gods themselves, and to that very first Temple, which Marcellus was beautified and adorned principally above the rest. For strangers and forrein travellers used in pilgrimage to visit the Temples which were dedicated by Marcellus at the gate Capena, in regard only of the most rare and singular workmanship of the ornaments in that kind, of which at this day there is very little or nothing to be seen.

Now from all City well near of Sicily, there reformed Embassies unto him: as ther causes were divers and unlike; to their conditions were not all one. As many as before the winning of Syracuse had either not rebelled at all or became reconciled and in favour again they were accepted in the quality of faithful Allies and made much of: those who for fear after the loss of Syracuse yielded were esteemed as conquered, and received laws and conditions at the will and pleasure of the Conqueror. There remained yet no small relieves of war about Agrigentum for the Romans to dispatch: namely, Epicles and Himera the Captains of the former war and a third, a new from Annibail in the room of Hippocrates, a Citizen of Hippis (his countrymen name him Mutti) seduced from the Labini, with an army of Action, and one who under Annibail had been brought up, and taught all sorts of arms and skill of warfare, unto his charge were committed by Epicles and Himera the Numidian Auxiliaries, with whom he over ran all the countries belonging to the enemies; he went unto all the Confederates, and so brought with them to continue satt in their allegiance, and to send aids to every one in due time accordingly: in such fort, that within A within short time he got himself a great name throughout all Sicily, as the favorites and faction of the Carthaginians had no greater hope in any than in him. And therefore both Captains, as well Hann, the Carthagian, as Epictetus the Syracusan, for a time had been pent up within the walls of Agrigentum, bearing themselves as well upon the fidelity as policy of Mutinian, boldly advenccd to come forth of the walls of Agrigentum, and upon the river Himera encamped themselves. Whereof Marcellus having intelligence, forthwith removed with all his power, and took him down encamped, almost four miles from the enemy, minding to wait and expect what they were to do and went about, but Mutinian gave him neither opportunity of place to call him long, nor repulse of time to take counsell in, but crossed the river, and with exceeding terror, and tumultuous noise affaid the standing guards of his enemies; yet, and the morrow after gave them batteall as it were in a pitch field, and drew them within their folds and fortifications. But being called from hence by occasion of a mutiny of Numidians within the Camp (who to the number almost of three hundred were departed to Heraclea Minor) he went to appeale them, and to reclaim them to due obedience: but he gave the rest of the Captains (by report) a great charge and express warning, not to fight with the enemy, however they did in his absence. But both the Captains were greatly offended thereat, and Hann especially, who was already malecontent, and repined at his glory. What? faith he, thinketh Mutinian, a base African, and not of the right hand neither, to rage and rule me a Carthagian General, sent with Commission from the Senate and people? He prevailed therefore Epictetus effectually to pass over the river, and to strike a batteall: for quoth he, if we should stay for him, and then hap to have a fortunate day of it and win the victory, then no doubt shall redound to Mutinian.

But here, Marcellus thought this a great indignity, that he, who had repulsed at Nola Anabal, even when he bare himself bravely upon his preth victory at Conae, should give one foot to thee petty enemies, vanquished already by him both by sea and land: whereupon he commanded his soldiers to arm in all haste, and to bring forth the standards and ensigns. But as he was arranging his men in batteall array, there came riding unto him all on the spur, with bridles on the horse neck ten Numidians from out of the army of the enemies, with these tidings and intelligences, affurming them, “That their countrymen, who first were offended and discontented by occasion of that mutiny aforesaid, wherein three hundred of their company departed and went away to Heraclea; and then afterwards, because they saw their own head and leader, by the practice of those other Captain, who maligncd and envied his glory, sent far enough out of the way, even against the very day when the batteall should be fought: were not disposed at all to fight, but would stand still and not stir. A kind of people these were, deceitfull otherwise, and used to break promises howbeit now, they were just and true of their word. Upon this, as the Romans took better heart unto them; for there was a speedy purveyor or courier sent throughout the batteallion, from company to company, for to signifie unto them, that the enemy was disappointed and abandoned of his Cavalry, whom they feared most of all other, the enemies were mightily dismayed and put in fear: for over and besides, that they had no help from them who were the greatest strength of their army, they were in a deep fear left their own horsemen would fret upon them. By which occasio the conflict was not great, for at the first sliote and thckck given, well it was seen which way the game would go, and the matter was soon determined. The Numidians, who at the first encounter, and during the conflict, had stood quiet in both points of the batteall, seeing their own fellows turn back and flee, bare them only company for a while, as they fled: but after that they perceived them all to make haste forwar to Agrigentum: fearing also themselves there to be befoged among them, flit away every one to their own Cities. Many thousands were there slain and taken prisoners: and eight elephants besides taken alive. This was the last field fought by Marcellus in Sicily: upon this victory he returned to Syracuse. By this time now was the year almost come about and growing to an end. And therefore at Rome the Senate decreed, that P. Cornelius the Prtoor should send letters to the Conuls, lying before Capua, purporting this tenor: That forasmuch as Anabal was far from them, and no great matter of consequence like to be performed the while at Capua: the one of them (if they thought to good) should repair to Rome, for to create new Magistrates in the room of the old. The Conuls having received the letters agreed between themselves and took order, that Claudius should go to hold and accomplish the solemn election of Magistrates: and Ennius remain still at Capua, So Claudius created new Col. Gn., Ennius Centumaldus; and P. Sulpisius Galba the son of Servius: a man that had not borne any curule office of state before. After these there were Prtoors chosen, 1. Cornelius Lentulus, 2. Cornelius Veturius, 3. Sulpisius Caelum, 4. Sulpisius Cae, Unto Pto at this time held the jurisdiction within the City. Sulpisius had the government of the Province Sicily. Caelum of Apulia: and Lentulus, of Sardinia. The Conuls had the government of their Provinces proregu for to continue one year longer.
The six and twentieth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius, from the Foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the fix and twentieth Book.

Annibal encamped himself at three miles from Rome, fast upon the river Anio. Himself in person, accompanied with two thousand men of arms, rode to the gate Capena, to review the city. And was standing there for three days, that the army of both sides were come into the field ready to be attacked, yet they were joined in conflict, by reason of the tempestuous and stormy weather: But even as they were returned again into their camps, presently it proved fair. Capua was won by Q. Fulvius, and Appius Claudius the Pro-Consul. The Nobles and principal Citizens of Capua present the life of their Jews. When all their Senators stood bound to stakes (for to be whipped) and then to lose their lives, there came letters from the Senate of Rome unto the Pro-Consul Q. Fulvius, with directions and orders, that before he would read them, he should put them up into his bosom and himself K. the winds from the windows, to let the Law bare the course, to do his office, and so he went through with the execution. It seemed that in a solemn assembly of the people there was much debate and question, who should govern. L. Dupius, the Pro-Consul of Spain, and now was not willing to undertake that charge. Publius, one of the Senators, with certain people, who was in Spain, made offer to go that voyage, and by the way generally of the people, and with one accord, all was better set. In one day he assaulted and overthrew New-Carthage, being a young man, not fully 24 year old. And there went an opinion of him, that he was descended of some heavenly race: both for himself, of he was come to seventeen years of age, and had put such as many steps, covered within the Capitol, and also because there was a lack of soldiers, few officers in his masters bedchamber. This book contains besides the affairs in Sicily, the army concluded with the Macedonians and Philip King of the Macedonians.

The six and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

Cnæus Fulvius Centumalus, and Publius Sulpicius Galba the Consuls, when they had entred into their Magistracy upon the Ides of March, assembled the Senators into the Capitol, where they coniured with the LX. about the state of the Common-wealth, concerning the administration of the war, and the Provinces and the Armies. Q. Fulvius and Ap. Claudius, the Consuls of the former year, continued till their rule and full command, with the charge of the same forces which they had before under their hands. And over and besides, they were expressly commanded, not to depart from Capua (before which they lay at siege) until they had forced and won the City. For at that time the Romans among all their other affairs were much amused upon it: not so much for anger and malice, (whereof they had never against any one City greater and fuller cause) as in this regard, that being a state so noble and mighty, like as by revolting itself it had drawn and induced certain other Cities to do the same, so if it were recovered and regained, like it was to reduce their affections again to look back and return unto their old allegiance and obedience to their wonted deńomy, from Rome. The Praetors also of the former year, M. Junius in Tuscany, and P. Sempronius in Gaul, continued in their places of regiment, with two legions a piece under their conduct the same which they had before. And so M. Marcellus remained as Pro-Consul behind in Sicily, for to finish and dispatch the reliques of the war there, with the power of that army which he had already; and had commission (if need were of new supply) to make up the number of his companies, out of those legions which were commanded by P. Cornelius the Vice-Consul in Sicily, that were divided to such effect, that he chose no fodder out of those bands, unto whom the Senate had already denied, either licence to be discharged, or pay to return home into their country, before the war was fully ended. Unto C. Sulpicius, whole lot it was to govern the Province of Sicily, were assigned those two legions, which P. Cornelius had before: with a fresh supply out of the army of Cnæus Fulvius, which the last year was shamefully defeate and beaten and put to flight in Apulia. Thesewoulders, all the lot of them, had the time limitation of six, ten and no other, appointed and let down by the Senator, that the latter who remained after the overthrow at Canus, and this disgrace they had besides, as well the one company as the other. That they might not winter within any town nor build them any standing camp for wintering harbours within ten miles of a City. L. Cornelius the Lord Deputy in Sardinia, was allowed to have the conduct of those two legions which were under the leading of Q. Minucius. And order was given unto the Consuls, to levy and enroll a new supply thereto, if need required. T. Oebeliuins and M. Valerius were appointed to guard and defend all the sea-coasts of Sicily and Greece, with the
A the help of those Legions and Armadoes which they had already. The Greeks had fifty sail in their fleet, and were manned with one Legion. The Scilians had one hundred ships, and two Legions to furnish them. So that in this year the Romans maintained three and twenty Legions, to wage war both by sea and land.

In the beginning of the year, when the letters of L. Marcius were read and fanned in the Senate house, the II. there assembled, liked well of the contents, and spoke highly in the praise of his worthy acts: but many of them were offended at the superficition, because he took upon him the honourable title of a Pro-Praetor in his title, and wrote thus: [L. Marcius the Pro-Praetor to the Senate] considering, that his command was neither granted by the people, not allowed and confirmed by the Senate. An ill precedent (lay they) it is, and of bad contention, that Generals of the field should be chosen by armies, and that the solemnity of Elections, do devoutly begin in the name of the gods, and with the religious observation of the Bird-flight, should now be transferred into the Camps and Provinces, far from Laws and Magistrates, and committed to the inadvertent wills of rash affectionate fouldiers. And when some there in place were of opinion, that the matter should be put in question at the Council Table, it was thought better to defer that contafation, until those gentlemen of service, that brought the Letters from Marcius, were gone and departed. As concerning corn and apparel for the army, they agreed to write back unto him, that the Senate would take order and provide for both: but they would not allow in any case to give him this addition, and to write [To Marcius the Pro-Praetor] lest that they might seem to approve the very same thing by their prejudice and doom elsewhere, which they had left for to be decided and determined afterwards. When the Gentlemen aforefaid had their dispatch, and were dismissed, the first thing that the Consuls propounded was this, and no other: and generally they jumped in this one point, for to deal with the Tribunes of the peoples, that with all speed possible they would move the Commons, and propound unto them, for to know, who their will and pleasure should be sent L. Deputye into Spain, for to have the government of that army, whereof Con. Scipio L. Generally had the conduct.

This matter, I say, was treat of with the Tribunes, and a bill preferred thereof unto the Commons: but there was another greater contention in terms, that had perplexed their minds already. For C. Sempronius Blafiae had commenced a criminal action against Cn. Fulvius, accusing him for the loss of the Army in Apulia, and cited not in all the terms of the people to make invective against him, charging him. That being Captain General through his much folly, ignornace, and rashness, he had brought his Army into a place of danger, repining him more over and saying, That never any Captain but Cn. Fulvius had corrupted, marred, and infected his legions with all kind of vices before he had beat them to the enemies, to such a degree that he might be well and truly said, that they were altogether spoilt and defeated before they had a fight of their enemies: and were not vanquished by Aemilius, but by their own Colonneal and Commander. See (quoth he) the disorder that is in Elections; and how no man, when he is to give his voice doth well weigh and consider, who it is, that elechs a General & unto whom he commeth the charge of an Army. Behold the difference between Great Fulvius, and T. Sempronius, This man having the leading of an army of bondlives, by discipline, good order and government, within short time brought his fouldiers to that good paft, that there was not one of them all throughout the army remembered and regarded how barely he was born, and of what parentage defcended, but all in generall bare themselves so, that they were to their friends a great service, and to their enemies a terrible terror: and after that he had recovered them at Beneventum, & other Cities, (as it were), out of the jaws of Aemilius, he restored and delivered them safe & sound to the people of Rome. Whereas contrary wise Cn. Fulvius having received an army of Roman Citizens, well and worshipfully born, liberally and honestly brought up, had taught them servile vices fit for slaves, and trained them, that with their friends and allies they were proud, and unruly; and among their enemies were cowards & very dastards: & so far short they were to bear off the violence of the Carthaginians that they were not able to abide so much as their first cry and shout, And no marvel I affire you that the fouldiers could not stick to it in the battle, and hold out manfully; when the General himself was the first that ran away beastly, I rather wonder at it, that any of them fled to it and died in the field, and were not all of them as fearful as Cn. Fulvius, and took not heed with him for company. Yet C. Flaminius, L. Paulus, L. Postumius, both Scipios as well Cn. as Pub. chose rather to lose their lives in battle, than to forsake their armies when they were environed round with enemies. But Cn. Fulvius, he was in manner the only man that returned to Rome with news of the army defeated and overthrown, Now verily a great indignity it is, and a flame indifferently of proceeding, that the residue of the army, after the overthrow at Comae, because they fled out of the field, were confined and transported over into Sicily, with express condition, not to return again from thence, before that the enemy were clean gone and departed out of Italy: & that the very fame rigorous and heavy decree was like to have been executed against the Legions of Cn. Fulvius, and Cn. Fulvius himself, who fled out of the battell, which was through his own folly and rashness begun, should go away clear, and escape without all punishment; that himself. I say should lead his old age in taverns, before and brothel-houses, where already he hath spent his youthful days: while his poor fouldiers (who had faured in nothing, but that they were like unto their Captain) be sent far enough off, and packed away (as it were) into exile, and endure fame.

The Oration of T. Sempronius Stellae against Cn. Fulvius.
The answer of Calpurnius.

"Full and ignominious fouldiery. I. o, how unequally at Rome the freedom of the city is parted H between the rich and the poor; between men of nobility and high calling, and those that are of mean parentage and low degree.

Thus much spake the plaintiff C. Sempronius Bifius, The defendant on the other side shifled all the blame from himself, and laid the whole fault upon his fouldiers, alleging and pleading thus, "That when they called upon him hastily, and with great wilfulness for to give battle, he brought them forth into the field not on that day which they would themselves (for it was late in the evening) but the morrow after when both time and place were meet and convenient for the purpose: and notwithstanding they were well appointed and orderly embattled, yet were they not able to sustain, either the fame or the fury of the enemies, I know not whether. And when they all fled away amain, he also was carried away in the throng of the rout, like as Virro the Consul, at the battle before Camna, and as many other Generals elsewhere. And what good could be done to the Common-wealth, in case he had laid behind alone? unless peradventure his death might have cured and remedied the publike ills and maladies, or made his allowance for the common loss. Neither was it for want of victuals, nor for that he lighted unaware upon places of disadvantage and danger: nor yet, because he was entrapped within the trains of an ambush, marching on end forward, without sending his epilates before, that he was overcome: or that even by mere force, by dint of sword, in open field, and in a sight battle. And it was not he could do withall, if his own men were fearful and timorous, and the enemies hardly and venturous, he had not the rule of their hearts. It is long of every one his own nature to be either bold or heartless.

Two several times was he judicially accused, and at both times a fine of money only set upon his head in case the matter should go against him. At the third Session the witnesses were produced forth, to be depos'd and give evidence: and after that he had been shamefully revil'd, and charg'd with all manner of reproaches there were very many upon his oath testified, That the first beginning of the fight and flight both, was occasioned by the Pretor himself: and that the fouldiers being themselves forsaken by him, and supposing verily that their Captain and Leader was not afraid of his own shadow but had great reason to fear, they likewise turned their backs and fled. Upon which evidence, the whole Court was so incensed against him with anger, that they cried all with one voice, to commence a capital action, for that he was worthy to die. Whereupon arose a new debate and controversy: whereof the Tribune had twice before laid L a penal action upon him of money, and now at the third time said that he would have a jury of life and death go upon him: then he called upon the other Tribunes for their helping hand to mitigate this rigour of the Court. But when they did not come to this suit, and said they would not oppose themselves nor hinder his course, but that he might proceed in the fair at his own good pleasure, more mea non, i.e. [according to the ancient manner used by their forefathers] neither by order of law, or rule of custom, and bring him being but a private person to the trial either of a capital crime, or penal tr踩ps: then Sempronius spake and laid flatly, that he laid upon him a criminal action of treason against the State: and required of C. Calpurnius the L. chief Judge of the City, to hear a day of hearing and judicial trial by the people. Then the defendant cast about to help himself by another remedy, namely, in case he could compass that M Q. Enius his brother might possibly be present at the Session when he should be judged: who at that time was a man of great credit and reputation, in regard both of the name that went on him for his noble acts, and of that great hope which men had of him, that he was like presently to be Mæfler of Capna. But when this said Q. Enius had requested so much by letters, endorsed to that purpose as effectually as he could devise, and to move commissation and pit in behalf of the life of his brother, the LL of the Senate returned this answer unto him again, That it was not for the good of the State that he should depart from Capna; thereupon, before the Sessions day was come, Cn. Enius departed of his own accord into exile to Tusculumni, and the Commons made an act and confirmed that banishment of his to be a just, due, and sufficient punishment for his offence.

During these busineses at Rome, the whole strength and force of war was bent against Capna, and yet the City was rather straitly beleaguered than forcibly assailed; insomuch as neither the servantes or bondmen, nor the common people were able to endure the famine any longer: and send unto Ambulud any emissaries; they possibly could not, by reason of the strict watch and ward that the Romans kept, so near one unto the other. At length there was a certain Numilien offered to go and to escape clear away, who having taken letters unto Ambulud to put him in mind to be as good as his promise, departed in the night, and passed through the midst of the Roman camp, and put the Companys in very good hope, to fly forth at all the gates, and to make a full upon the enemy, whiles their power and strength served them. And verily in many scurries and skirmishes which they made, they got the better for the most part in borse-fight but lightly their footmen had ever the worse. The Romans for their parts were nothing so much pleased when they had the upper hand at any time, as they were diddodmented and ill spair'd, to receive a load in any kind of service of them, who were not only beleaguered, but in manner overcom already and conquered. So they devised a means in the end, to make up and supply by industry and policy the defect they had in strength and force. They chose out of all the Legions certain huy young men, such as for clean strength of body, and lightness withall were most nimble and swift, Afright. They had every one of them, a light buckler or target, shorter than commonly horsemen have; and seven javelins or darts spuce, four foot long, with iron heads at one end, like as those Javelins have, which they call lance, that are lightly armed, and begin skirmishes. And every horseman took up one of these behind him on horseback, and tied them, both to fit the horse and ride, and also to leap down on foot, with great agility and agility, at the signal and token given them. Now, when as, after daily practice and exercise, they were able to do it nimble enough, and without fear, they advanced forth into the plain, springing between their camp, and the wall of the City, and affronted the horsemen of the Carthaginians as they stood arranged in battle array: and to foos as they were come within a dart's call, the light javelottiers advanced, fell dismounted from their horses, at a sign given them: and behold, all of a sudden, one of the Cavalry there was a battallion of footmen arranged, who charged the men of arms of the enemies, and let fly their darts with great force, dart after dart, which they hasted to think, that they galled many a horse, and wounded also many horsemen. Howbeit, their fear was much greater by reason of the strange and unexpected manner of fight. The Roman horsemen seeing their enemies thus affrighted set too hard, and charged them upon lightly, and beat them down even to the City gates. After this the Romans were the better in horsemanship. And hereupon began the manner from henceforth to entertain such light armed javelottiers called Felicers, even among the Carthaginians. The first devise of this mingling of footmen among the horsemen they say was one C. Numa a Centurion, and that he was highly honoured by the Generall for his invention.

Whiles things stood thus at Capua, Annibal was greatly distressed in mind, and pellotted with two contrary cogitations, whether he should go to gain the Cattle of Tusculum, or to relieve and save the City of Capua. At last the regard of Capua prevailed with him: for he saw that as well friends as enemies depended thereupon, and had their mind and eye wholly bent that way; as being a City like to give the very trial and proof, what would the issue be generally of all the revolt and rebellion from the Romans. Leaving therefore behind him a great part of his carriage in the Britanni country, and all his footsoldiers heavily armed, he made haste into Campania with an elect power of foot and horse, such as he tipped off most meet and best appointed for expedition and readiness of way: yet as fast as he marched, there followed after him thirtieth and Phoons, and so he fate him down closely in a立刻 valley behind the mountain Tifata, which overlooked the City of Capua. At the first coming he pointed the fort called C. Judir, and compelled the garrison there to quout the place, and then he turned and opposed himself against the enemies who belonged to Tifata. But he dispatched certain couriers thereunto Capua to signify unto them at what time he minded to set upon the camp of the Romans: and they also at the very instant might be ready to issue forth at every gate of the City to do the like. The Romans having no fore-knowledge by their epipals of this occurrence; were mightily terrified: for Annibal himself suffred them one way, and all the Campans as well foot as horsemen (together with the garrison soldiers of the Carthaginians under the leading of Ptolemy and Hannibal their captains) rallied out another way. The Romans therefore being driven to their fizzes as well as they might, no longer delay'd each before the fire, but came together, and marched by the Capitol, as far as the Campans. But Felicio i. e. the Captain of the troops, caused the men to go slowly, that they might not lose the fire. The Carthaginians turned to flee, and the footmen made light to run away, and the horsemen to fly. But after the latter part, they made a great battle, but could not be assailed in any way, or driven. But yet when the Carthaginians were driven to their last ditch, and found themselves not able to escape thence, then Appius Claudius opposed himself against the Campans, and Fulvius against Annibal. Claudius, the Vice-Prator, with the horsemen belonging to the sixth legion, quartered upon the way leading to Scaccia; and C. Fulvius Flaccus, the Lieutenant with the horsemen of Allies, took up his standing and planted himself over against the river Valentinus. The battell began not in the usual manner, only with showers and outcries, but besides all other clamours of men neighing of horses, and, yelling, and roaring, there was a multitude of Campans good for no other service of war, placed upon the walls, who together with ringing and sounding of basons and vellums of braze (as the manner is in the still dead time of the night, when the moon is in the Tropic) made such an hideous noise, that it cauased even them that were in fight to be assuited thenceupon, and to listen after it. Appius with small ado repulsed the Campans from the trench and rampier, but Fulvius on the other part had more trouble to deal with Annibal and the Carthaginians, who charged fiercely upon him, that the sixth legion there gave ground and retreated: which being once beat back, a Squadron of Spaniards and three Elephants fellow for as far as the rampier, and had already broken through the main battell of the Romans: but they were in happle between doubtfull hope and present danger, thinking one while to break through and pass into the Camp: and still another while to be excluded from the rest of their companies. Fulvius seeing this fear of the Legion and possible where in the Camp, stood encouraged and exhorted Q. Numa and other principal Centurions, to affail valiantly, to kill and hurt in pieces that one company of the enemies which were fighting under the commander. For all now lieth a bleeding, quoth he, and in extrem hazard: for either you must give the enemies way, and then will they more easily enter into the camp; then they had already pierc'd through the thick squadron of the battell; or else ye must defend, and fly them in the place even under the trench. And that quoth he were no difficult piece of service, considering they are but few in number; feuered and shut one clean from the in course of their fellows: and the same Roman battallion which fcameth now disbanded and open, whilst it is alighten, if to be it would make head and run both sides upon the enemy, were able to com-
tcases within the midst, Numius had no sooner heard the General speak these words, but he caught the ensign of the second band of Hosts from the ensign-bearer, and disposed it in the faces of the enemies, threatening to fling it among the midst of them, unless his soldiers made the better hate to follow him, and settle themselves to fight. He was a goodly tall and personable man of body, his brave armor besides set him out and beautified his person; and withall, the advancing of his ensign on high, drew every man's eye upon him as well enemies as friends. But when he was approached once to the banners of the Spaniards, then from all hands they spared him not, and lifted at him their barred javelins, and the whole battell in manner was bent only against him. But neither the multitude of enemies, nor the volley of their shot, was able to repulse and rebut the violence of that one man. Likewise M. Atius a Lieutenant, caused the ensign-bearer of the first band of the Principes, belonging to the same Legion to enter with his ensign upon the cohort and troop of the Spaniards. The Lieutenants also L. Polcris Licinius and T. Popilius, who had the guarding of the camps fought valiantly upon the rampier in defence thereof, and killed the Elephants upon the very counter-scarp, as they were passing over and entering the camp. And by occasion that their bodies filled up the ditch, the enemies had a passag made them into the camp, as if it were over a cauay or bridge raised of purpose to give them way: and there over the very car-kazes of the Elephants there was a cruel slaughter committed. But on the other side of the camp, the Campans and the garrison of the Carthaginians had the reptiles already: and under the very gate of Capua which openeth upon the river Vulturas, there was another skirmish, where the K Romans fitting to enter the town, were not so much put back and withfoord by force of armed men, as by brakcs, scorpions, and other engins of ordinace, which being mounted and planted upon the very gate, dischargetl hot so violently, that they drive the enemies farther off. Over and besides, the terrible and furious assault of the Romans was danted and suppresst, by reason that their General himself, Ap. Claudius was hurt; who as he was encouraging his men to fight in the very forefront of the vanguard, hapened to be wounded with a dart above in his brest under the left shoulder: yet there were an exceeding number of enemies there slain before the gate. And the reit were driven for fear to make haste and get the City over their heads. Anniul also perceiving the Cohort of the Spaniards lying along dead, and the camp of the enemies so manfully defended even to the death, gave over his affault, and began to retire his ensigns, and to turn backward T. all his footmen, intercepting his horsemens behind them, for fear the enemy should charge them on the till. The legions were exceeding eager to pursue after the enemies: but Flaccus comman-ded to found the retreat, supposing they had done well enough already, and effected two things, to wit, that both the Campans law in bow little speed Anniul left them: and also Anniul himself knew and perceived no less. Some writers that have recorded this battell, set down, that of Anniul this Army there were slaine that day eight thousand men, and of Campans three thousand: that the Carthaginians lost fifteen ensigns, and the Campans eighteen. But in others, I find that the conflict was not so great, and that the fight was much more than the skirmish: for when as the Numidians and Spaniards together with the Elephants brake at unwares into the Roman Camp, those Elephants as they paied through the midst thereof, overthrew and laid along many of the tents and pavilions: and the Sumpter-horses and other beasts there for carriage, with great noize brake their halters, and collars, fled for fear, and bare down all afore them as they went. And that besides this tumultuous fright and confusion, Anniul dealt fraudulently, by lending in among the rest certain that could speak the Latin tongue (for some such he had about him) who in the Consuls name gave commandment (since the Camp was lost) that every loundier should make shift for himself, and flee to the next mountains, But this deceit was soon eipied and prevented with the loss and slaughter of a number of enemies: and the Elephants were cou'ded out of the Camp with fire. But howsoever this battell was either begun or ended, the lat it was fought there, before that Capua was yielded up and surrendred.

The Meditations (so they call the head Magistrate and Governor of the City of Capua) for that year, was one Seppus Lefius, a man of base parentage and mean calling. The report goeth, that his mother upon a time as she made satisfaction in the name of him (being then fatherless and under age) by a purgatory sacrifice, for a prodigious dometical portent, that hapned in her house, was told by the Soothsayer out of his learning, that one day the chief government of Capua should belon to that child: whereas, the feeling no likelihood nor hope at all of any inch matter, said thus again, You talk of a poor City of Capua when that day comes: and God fave all, when my Ison shall be advanced to the highest place and government thereof. But these words spake at random and in jest proved afterwards good earnest, and true indeed. For when as the Citizens were driven to great straitures, through sword and famine, and were past all hope of recovery in such fort, as they that were of service and worth or honour, redued to be in place of authority, this Lefius complaining that Capua was fostered, betrayed and abandoned by her own nobility, took upon him the chief Magistracy, and was the lait of all the Campans that bare soveraign rule in that City.

Anniul perceiving that neither his enemies would be drawn forth any more to fight: nor possibly he could break through their camp for to come into Capua: for fear lest that the new Consuls from the other passages, and intercept his purvasance of victorious, determined to dislodge without A without effecting his purpose, and to remove from Capua. And as he call and tosed to and fro in his mind what course to take, and whither to go; it came into his head to make no more ado, but to march directly to Rome, the very head and feast-City of the whole war. This was the upshot of all, and the emprise that he most defined. Howbeit as others much grieved and greatly blamed him that he had over-flipp'd the opportunity when it was even presently upon the barbells at Cannae: so himself acknowledged no less that he was mightily overtaken. And yet the thing was not so far past (he thought) that he should despair, but upon one hidden at last and unexpected tumult he might feize of some quarter of the City or other. And if Rome were one in that hazard, then either the Roman Generals, or one at the least, would immediately leave the siege of Capua.

B Who if they had once divided their forces, both of them would be the weaker, and minifter either unto him or to the Campans some occasion of good fortune. The only thing that troubled his mind was this, for he left that as soon as his back were turned, the Campans would yield themselves unto the Romans. He therefore with large and liberal rewards induceth a certain Numidian (an audacious and adventurous fellow, one that cared not what dangers he undertook) to be the carrier of certain letters, and to enter into the camp of the Romans, counterfeiting him to be a fugitive, from the adverse part unto them: and so when hefreed his time to slip secretly from the other side of the camp to Capua. The letters were very comforting, importing unto them, "That his remove and departure from thence was for his good and safety, whereby he "meant to withdraw the Roman Captains and their forces from Capua to the defence of their own City of Rome; willing them not to let fail their hearts and be discouraged; for by patient "abiding some few days they should be wholly freed and delivered of the siege. Then he made "stay all of the shipping and vessels that he could find upon the river Volturnus, and commanded "them to be brought to Cannina, which he had fortified aforesite with a pile or Castle to guard "and keep the place with a garrison. And having intelligence that there was much store of barges and bottoms upon the river, "as would serve to transport in one night his whole army: he made "provision of victuals for ten days, brought down his army by night to the river side, and "crossed the water with all his power before the next day-light. But this was not carried so secretly, but "before that it was effectecl, intelligence was given thereof by certain runagate fugitives: where "upon Volturnus Flaccus addressed his letters unto the Senate of Rome, and gave voice thereof. At "which tidings men according to their fundry fancies and humour were diversly affected: and as "so fearfull an occurrence inconspicuously the Senate assembled.

P. Cornelius, unsometer Afrons, was of opinion, that all the Captains and Armies whatsoever "should be called home out of all parts of Italy, without regard of Capua or any other exploit be "sid, save only the defence of the City. Fabius Maximus thought it was a disfashion, lewd, and a "thefameful part to depart from the siege of Capua, and to be scare to turn here and there, and to be "carried away with every copy of Anniubal his countenance, and with his vain threats and "menaces. He that won a victory at Cannae, and durft not then go forward to the City, hath he "conceived any hope now to win Rome, being also repelled from Capua? No, he marcheth to "ward Rome, not minding to besiege it, but hoping to split the fiege from Capua. And however it "be, I am allureth (quoth he) that Jupiter (the witness of covenants broken by Anniubal) and oth "ers gods besides, will defend us with the help of that army which we shall find at home in the "City. Between these two opinions P. Varus Flaccus held the mean, and prevailed: for he had a "regard and due consideration, both of the one and the other: thought good to write unto the Colonels that lay before Capua, and to certify them what strength they had of able men to de "fend the City: as for the forces of Anniubal, and what power was needful to maintain the siege "at Capua, they themselves knew well. Therefore in case that one of the Pro-Conuls there, and "part of the army might be spared from thence and sent to Rome, and nevertheless, the fiege con "inue with the conduct of the other Pro-Conul, and the rest of the army: then Claudius and Ful "vious should so order the matter between themselves, that the one of them might remain still be "fore Capua at siege and the other repair to Rome, so to defend and keep their native country from "the same danger. Hereupon the Senate agreed, and made an Act: which being brought unto Capua, Q. Fulvium the vice-Conul who was to go to Rome, by reason that his Colleague was sick of "his hurt, chose out of three armies certain companies of soldiers, and with fifteen thousand "footmen, and one thousand horsemen, passed over the river Volturnus. Then having certain intel "ligence, that Anniubal minded to march along the Latin street way: he took his journey through "the towns and burrtrs, and matters in the way Appia, and sent his couriers before unto Setia "Sa "a and Latinaim, which are feared near unto it, not ony for to lay provision of victuals ready for "him in their Cities and towns, but also from the country villages farther out of the way, to bring "their provision to that port through-fare: and to draw forces into their own defence, and every one to stand upon their good guard, and to look unto their place, as well pub like "Gas private, Anniubal the same day that he had crossed Volturnus encamped not far from the river. And the "morrow after entered into the territory of the Sidicins, and led his boll near unto Celes. There, "after he had laid one day, foraging and spoiling the country, he marched by Scefiila, into the terr "itories of Albus and Caphenn, by the way of the Latin street. Under the town Caphenn he "abode in camp two days, and raised hostages here and there in every place. From thence leaving Interamnna and Aquinum, he came into the country about Frasello, as far as to the river Lucus, where where he found the bridge cut down by the Fregellans for to impeach and let his journey, Fulvialikewise was slaid at the river Tiberinus: by reason that the barges and bottoms were burnt by Annius: and much ado he had, for the great city of timber and woods, to make punts and boats for to let over his army. But Fulvia, after he had once transported his men in such boats and planks as he made shift withall, had afterwards no hindrance in his journey; but found not only store of viuitals in the Towns and Cities as he travelled, but also plenty thereof brought ready for him to the waies side right curteously. Then the soldiars as they marched on foot cheered and encouraged one another to mend their pace and make speed, considering they went to the defence of their natural country. Now there was a poft lett from Fregella, who rode night and day and never made stay, and he put the City in excceeding fear. The running together I besides of the people, that ceased not to make everything more than it was, and to invent some what of their own fingers ends, and put it to the news that they heard, made a greater hurry than the messenger himself: and set the City in an uprour. And not only the women were heard to weep and weep in their own private houses: but also from all parts the Dames of the City came flocking into the streets, running about to all the Churches and Chapells of their gods and goodeffes, sweeping the Altars with the trefles of their hair hanging down, kneeling upon the bare ground and streching out their hands uppe in heaven unto the gods, pouring out their prayers and supplications. That they would vouchfaile to preserve the City of Rome out of the hands of the enemies, and to save the Roman wives and their little children from harm and all abufe. The body of the Senat gave attendance upon the Magilitrates in the common place, ready to give K them their advice and counsell. Some receive of them direction, and departed every man to execute his charge; others offer themselves to the Magilitrates, to be employed in any service whatsover. Snidry guards were betollow in the Cottage, in the Capitoll, and upon the walls: all places about the City were well manned. The Alpine mountain also and the Castle of Tusculum were fur nishe with good garrisons. Amidst this alarm tidings came, that Q. Fulvia the Pro-Conul, was departed from Capua, and onward on his journey to Rome with an armie. And because he should not be abridged of his power and authority, after he was come into the City, there was a decree gamed out of the Senat-Houfe, that Q. Fulvia should have as large a commissione of rule and comand as the Conuls themselves. Annius, after he had made fouler work and havock in the territory of Fregella, than in other places, for anger that they had cut down the bridges against his coming, led his army through the Frutina, Ferentina, and Anganigne countries, and came forwards into the territory Lucina: and to by Adjutae he marched toward Tusculum. And when he could not be let in there within the walls, he defended beneath Tusculum, on the right hand to Cabi: from whence he conducted his armie into Pupiniana, and eight miles from Rome encamped. The nearer the enemy approached to the City, the greater slaughter was made of the peafants that fled from him, by his vancouers, the Numidian light-horfeomen whom he sent alore to make riddanne. And many there were of all conditions and ages that were taken captive.

In this tumultuous trouble, Fulvia Flacca with his armie entred Rome at the gate Capena: from whence he went through the midit of the City, along the street Carina into the Exquilia, and from thence he went forth, and between the gates Exquilina and Collina pitched his tents, Thither the Ediles of the Commons brought viuitals: the Conul and the Senate refered to him into the camp, which they gave in Council about the State of the Common-wealth. And agreed it was, That the Conuls should be encamped likewise about the gates Collina and Exquilina: that C. Calpurnius, Praetor of the City, should have the keeping of the Capitoll and the Castle with a guard, and that the Senators keep residence continually in good number within the compas of the Forum, what need forever should be of their counsell and advice, against all sudden accidents. By this time Annius was come forward as far as to the river Anio, and within three miles of the City lay encamped, where he kept a standing Leaguer. But himselfe in person with 2000 horfeomen advanced forward toward the gate Collina, even as far as to Hercules his N Temple, and rode about as near as he well could, to view the waies, and the situation of the City. Flacca took foul dispair theras, and thought it a shamefull indignity, that he should brave it at his pleasure loflornfully without revenge, whereasupon he sent out certain of his own Cavaly, and gave commandement, that they should let the enemies horfeomen further off, and chase them back into their Camp. Whiles they were in skirmish together, the Conuls gave orde rs that the Numidian horfeomen, such as were fled from the enemy, and turned to the Romans (who were at that time to the number of twelve hundred upon the Aventine hill) should pass through the midit of the City to the Exquilia: supposing that there were none more meet than they, for to fight among the valleys, the garden houes, the lepulchres and hollow waies on every side. Whom, when some from the Castle and the Capitoll, espied riding down the Q. decifent of the hill, called Clivus Pupilina, they ran crying about the City. The Aventine istaken, The Aventine is taken. Which alarm caused a tumult, and gave such an occasion of fear, and running away, that if the Camp of Annius had not been without the walls, the fearfullmultitude doublets would have abandoned and quit the City. But they took their houes, and got every man up to the terraces and lead thereof: from whence they pelted with stones and other shot, their own friends instead of enemies, as they rode scattering one from another in the streets. This tumult could not be restrained, nor the error appear, by reason that the waies were so pestered with A with a number of the country planters, and of cartell besides, whom hidden fear had driven into the City. Howbeit the horsemen fought fortunately, and the enemies were removed and set back. And because it was necessary to stay all disorders and uproars that attended upon small occasions to Nine, it was thought good and agreed upon, that all those who had been either Dictators, or born the office of Centurions, should have their full power and authority until such time as the enemy was well departed from about the walls. And that was to good purpose: for all the rest of that day, and the night following, there were divers and sundry garboiles, without any cause or occasion raised, and the same filled and appeased by that means.

The next day Annibal took over Rome, and brought forth all his whole power into the field. Neither were Florence and the Conti's behind hand for their parts, but ready for battle. When both armies stood in order on both sides, aimed upon the site and event of one fight, which was for no less a prize and reward to the victorious part, than the very City of Rome; there fell Such a mighty storm of rain and hail together, and so troubled both rolls, that they could scarce hold their weapons in hand, but were driven to retire themselves for safety into their several camps, fearing not less than their own enemies. The morning after likewise, when they fell in the same place in battall array, the like tempest parted them asunder. And they were not to soon retired into their Camp, but the day was wonderful lairs, and the weather calm again.

The Carthaginians took this as an omen of preface to them of ill luck. And Annibal was heard (by reports) to say, That one while his mind another while his fortune would not give him leave to win the City of Rome. There were other preages besides, as well small as great that discouraged him and abated his hope. Of more importance was this, that whils he lay with his host in arms before the walls of Rome he understood there were certain companies with banners displayed went into Spain, to supply the armies there. Of less reckoning was this, that he was advertised by a certain captive, how the very same plot of ground whereon he was encompassed, happened at the same time to be hid; not underfoot, but at the top of, and nothing abated. This he took to be of premonitions a part, and such a temporal indignity, namely, that there should be a chapman found at Rome to make purchase of that piece of land, which he was polluted of and held in right of arms, that presently he called for the publike crier and trumpeter, and gave commandment to him, to proclaim port-sale of all the shops of Bankers and money changers at that time about the Forum in Rome. Nevertheless, hereupon he was moved to chide, and retired his camp towards the City to the river limit, six miles from Rome. From where he took his way to the grove of Fornins, where stood a Temple, in those days much renowned for wealth and riches. The inhabitants thereabout were certain Catanians, who used to buy in the first fruits of their corn and revenues year, and many other oblations besides according to the stole; by means wherefore they had adorned and garnished it with much good and silver. Of all those gifts and offerings was this Temple then robbed and spoiled, but after the departure of Annibal from thence there were found great heaps of brasse, by reason that the soldiers upon touch and remove of confidence, had cast in many brassen pieces. The king and pilage of this Temple.

All writers do agree upon, and make no doubt thereof, that an oi faith. The chief cause he went towards Rome from Etruria, turned thither and he let them down the beginning of his journey from Rome Celi and from Annimania, and that out of Capua he came into Sannio, and from thence into the country of Puglia, and forthof beside the City Sulmona, to the Maritime and then by the territory of the Albinei into the Maritanian land, and from thence he hast run to Upano, and toward the town Fornis. Neither is there any certain or doubt in it, but that the marks and tokens of the voyage of so great an army could not with in the memory and compass of so small an age be confounded and worn out. For certain it is, that he passed that way. The only difference herein wherein he came to the City of Rome, or returned from thence into Campina, by that way aforesaid.

Now was not Annibal to resolve to defend Capua, but the Romans were as fully bent, and more eager to continue the siege and affaint thereof. For he held himself to fall another way in his voyage back, fail out of the Latins country to the Etruscan, and so on till to the bright (of Sicy, and to Rhegium, that with his sudden coming thither he surprised them at unawares, even before they heard of his arrivals. As for Capua, all in the time of Eurithe his absence it was no lea silently beleaguered, yet it felt the coming again of Florence: and besides, there was much marcell there, why Annibal returned not back as well as he. Afterwards, they understood, by conference with some that were without, how they were forsaken and left of Annibal, and that the Carthaginians were put all hope to keep and hold Capua till to their own use. There was an edict moreover of the Pro-Comtal, passed by order from the Senate, and the same published and divulged among the enemies. That what Citizen leaver of Capua would turn to the Romans before such a certain day, he should have a general pardon. But there was no coming in, nor ranging to the Romans side; for fear of punishment at the Romans hands, more than for any regard of their allegiance to the Carthaginians: because their transigion and reli-pas in their former revolt was so great, that it might not be abandoned. And as one man all privately on his own head came over to the camp of the Roman, so there was no good order taken by publike council for the benefit and safety of the whole City. The Noblemen had given over managing of state matters, and could not be brought by any means to assemble in the Senat.
And in chief place of government was he, who had not won to himself any honour thereby, but his unworthiness was derogatory to the authority and power of that Magistracy which he bore. For now there was not one of the chief Citizens and Noblemen that would be so much as seen in the Market place or Common Hall or assemblies; but shutting themselves within doors in their private houses, they expected every day for the declination of their country, together with their own undoing and overthrow. The whole charge and care lay upon Beitar and Hannu. Captains of the garrison in the fort there of the Carthaginians and more careful were they of their own welfare, than fearful for the jeopardy of their friends and Allies. These two wrote letters unto Amilcar, endited not only in plain terms and frankly, but also sharply and bitterly: wherein they laid unto his charge, "That he had not only betrayed Carthage into the hands of the enemies, but also delivered and exposed them and the garrison to the cruel churls of the Romans to be murthered and executed. That he was gone his wares, and departed into the country of the Brittons, one that turned away his face of purpose because he would not see with his own eyes the loss of Carthage. But I wot the Romans contrario could not be withdrawn from the siege of Carthage, no, not by the assailing of the City of Rome: so much more were the Romans resolute enemies, than the Carthaginians constant friends. But if he would return again to Carthage, and bend the full force of his war thither, both they and the Citizens also of Carthage would be ready to fully forth and encounter the enemies. For why, they paffed over not the Alps with intent to war with the Rhegins and Tarentins: no but where the Roman Legions were, there ought the armies of the Carthaginians to be. Thus at Carthage, thus at Thapsus were the victories at Kailach, by affronting and meeting the enemy, by joyning camp to camp, and by hazarding the fortune of the battell. To this effect were the letters penned, and given to certain Numidians; who for a good reward had offered their service before, for the safe carriage and delivery of them, these fellows preferred themselves before Flaccus in the Camp, in habit and quality of fugitives into his side-hoping to spy out some convenient time when they might give him the slip and be gone. Now by occasion of the famine which had continued long in Carthage there was none but might pretend a good and reasonable cause to depart thence to the adverse part. But behold there happened a Captain wench to come into the legtur (a naughty-packet and an harlot), that one of the flapoped counterfeit fugitives aforesaid kept, she informed the General of the Romans, that those Numidians, fraudulently and by covin pretended to flee unto his part, and had letters about them unto Amilcar. This would the hand to, and be ready to answer to the very face of one of them, who betrayed & discolored the plot unto her. At first, when he was brought forth before her, he set a jolly countenance of the matter, & made it very strange & pretending flouly that he knew not the woman, but by little and little he was convicted by manifest truths, and especially when he saw that they called for the rack, and that he was upon the point to be put to torture: and to the end confessed that all was true, and therewith brought forth the letters. Over and besides another thing was now revealed, which before was kept close and secret: to wit that there were other Numidians besides, who under the colour of fugitives had gone up and down in the Roman camp: of these there were apprehended not so few as three hundred and ten, and they together with the new were whipped with rods, had their hands cut off, and sent back again to M Capua. This pithy spectacle and sight of so fearfull execution killed their courage, and brake the very heart of the Campans. Whereupon the people ran together unto the Council-Houfe, and compelled Lepidus to assemble a Senat and openly threatened the Nobles (who a long time had abstained themselves from publick conlutations) that unless they would now repair into the Senat, they would go home to their very houses, and pull them out by the ears into the street. For fear hereof the chief Magistrate had a frequent and still assembly of Senators. Whiles all the rest were of opinion to send Embassadors to the Roman Generals, Vibius Paterculus (who had been the chief cenfe and principal author of their first revolt from the Romans) being demanded his advice, flocke to the point in this manner: "They that talk of Embassadors of peace, and of yielding, little consider and remember either N what they would have done in case the Romans had been at their devotion and mercy, or what themselves must endure and suffer. For what think ye will become (quoth he) of this present surrender of ours, in comparison of that whereby in times past we freely gave unto the Romans our selves, and all that we had, for to obtain their aid and succour against the Samnites? And have we to soon forgot, at what time, and in what condition and state we were when we forook and abandoned the people of Rome? Also, after our revolt, how we most cruelly and flamefully killed their garrison, who we might have dismissed and sent away with their lives? Moreover, how oftentimes we have illused forth against them lying at siege, and how mischievously minded we were unto them yeas, and how we have falled upon them in their camp? Over and besides, call ye not to remembrance, how we called for Amilcar to surprize and defeat them? O and (that which of all other is most fresh in memory) how we sent him from hence to give the afflant to Rome? On the contrary side mark well and call to mind, how maliciously they have attempted and practisf all hostility against us: by which ye may well know what accounts to make of them: and what ye are to truft unto. For when they had a stranger and forraine enemy within Italy, nay, when they had Amilcar their enemy: when the wars were so hot, that all was on a light fire: they pased by all other affairs, yea, they let Amilcar himself alone, and sent both their Consuls with two compleat Consular armies to besiege and force Carthage. This is the 4 second

A second year that they keep us entrenchd round about, penning us up, and pinning us with extremities and hunger: during which time they themselves as well as we, have endured the utmost extremities and dangers that are, and sustained most grievous and miserable evils: ofentimes being killed and cut in pieces about their rampiers, trenches, and ditches, and finally driven alone out of their Camp and hold. But to let pass and speak more of these ordinary matters, seeing it is an old and usual case for them to abide painfull toll, and incur many perplexities, who besiege and assault any Cities or towns of their enemies? See a manifest sign of their deadly feeld, and execrable hatred against us. Annabed with a plentiful power of food and horsemen both, assaulted their Camp, ye, and in some part was Matter off. Think ye that in so great danger of theirs were one jot withdrawn from the siege? He passed over the river Volturnus, and burnt the territory of Ciles: yet for all that calamity and loss, which their allies received, they not only whit, nor gave over their entreprise. He commanded to march forward with banner displayed against the very City of Rome: they made as little account of that dangerous tempest towards, as of all the rest. After he had passed over the river Anio, he pitched his tents within three miles of the City; nay, he approached to length the walls, and made a bravado even under the gates: to before, he preferred unto their eye his resolution, and menaced to make Rome too hot for them unless they leived the siege before Capua: and yet they gave not over but beleegarde us still. The very wild and savage beasts be they never so fell, be they maddened never so much with blind rage and woodness against one, yet if another go to their dens, and offer to take away their whelps, they will turn again to succour and help their young ones: but the Romans, notwithstanding Rome was beleiged, their wives and children in danger; whose pitious cries and lamentable plaints were heard almost even in his ear; not withstanding their alarums, their sacred fires, the temples of their gods, the monuments and sepulchers of their Ancestors, were profan'd, abused, and polluted: could not be drawne away from Capua. So eager, so hungry are they to be revenged of us, so thirty are they to drink our blood, and so good reason, so happy, they have to do. For would not we also have done the rememb'able, if fortune had given us the opportunity? But seeing the will of the immortal gods is otherwise: and considering that I owe a naturall death: in my power it is (whiles I am at liberty, whiles I am mine own man, and master of myself) to avoid torments, to shun shamefull ignomines and reproaches (whereof the enemy hopeth I shall feel the smart): and that by one kind of death, which as it is honest, so it is also eatie and gentle: Never will I endure to see Ap, Claudius and Q. Fufius proudly and insolently bearing themselves upon their conquer over us: never will I be led and hauled round with chains through the City of Rome, to make a show, and to serve for a spectacle and gazing stock in their Triumph: and afterwards either in dark prizon, or tied openly to a stake, yield my back and side to be tewed, whipped, and mangled: and then lay my neck upon the block, to have my head cut off with the bloody axe of the Romans. Never will I behold my native country, taked, spoiled, and put to fire and sword, nor the chief married dames of Cauca to be forcibly ravished the fair and beautifull maidens shamefully deflor'd and the well-faoured young boies and freeborn, unnaturaly abused. They raised Alba in times past from the top to the very foundation, and left neither stick nor stone thereof, Alba left from whence they had their off-spring, and were first defended to the end that there might remain no memory at all of their stock and first originall. And shall I ever believe they will spare Capua, & receive into mercy against which they are more hatefullie and mortally bent than against Carthage? Therefore, my masters and friends, as many of you as are minded and resolved to die before ye see these so many miserable and wofull calamities. I have at home a stipered this night well furnished and provided for you all: and when ye have eat meat your fill, and drunk wine to it liberally, the same wasfell cup that first will be present'd unto me, shall go round about to you all: and that one draught deliver your bodies from torments, preserve your spirits from anguish and contumelious disgrace: keep your eyes from beholding all cruell acts, your ears from hearing all shameful indignities which follow and attend upon conquered persons. There shall beallow F in readiness certain liberators of purpole to make a mighty great fire within the bate court-yard of mine house, and to call our dead bodies thereunto. This is the only honest way to death, and beleeving us who are free born and gentlemen indeed. In which doing, our enemies will wonder at our vertue and valour: yea, and Annabed himselfe shall well know that he hath losstaken and betrayed his truft and magnamious allies.

This Oration of Virius, there were more men present that heard with applause and good liking than could find in their hearts to put that in execution which they so well allowed & approved. The greater part of the Senate, not deparing, but that the clemincy of the people of Rome, which had been tried and seen oftentimes in many wars, might be gained and extended also unto them: concluded, to send Embassadors with commission to yield Capua into the Romans hands. Some seven and twenty Senators there were that accompanied Virius home to his house, and lapped with him: and after they had done what they could to drink themselves drunk, and to intoxicate their brains with freely taking their wine (thereby to withdraw their minds from the sense and apprehension of their imminent harm and misery) drunk all of the poysoned cup above said. This done, and the banquet ended, they rode from the table, took one another by the hand embraced each other, taking their last leave, bidding a final adieu and farewel, and bewailing together with plenteous tears their own misfortune, and the miserable state of Virius and divers Senators of Capua poysoned themselves.
The day following, the gate of Jupiter which stood next over against the Roman Camp, was by the commandment of the Pro-consul opened. Thence entered one legion and two cohorts of horsemen, under the leading of C. Fulvius the Lieutenant: who after he had first above all other things given express order, that all armor of defence, and weapons of offence (which was to be found in Capua) should be brought forth and presented unto him; placed and disposed at all the gates, warders sufficient to see that no petition might possibly go forth, or be let out: then he laid hold upon the garrison of the Carthaginians, and commanded the Senators of Capua to repair into the Camp, before the Roman Captain Generals themselves. So soon as they were therewith some straightforward they had ironed slapped upon them, and were commanded to make tenders unto the treasurer of all the gold and silver they had. The gold amounting to seventy pound weights: the silver rode to the weight of three thousand and two hundred pound. Five and twenty of the Senators were sent to Cales, eight and twenty to Theaumus, to be kept safe in ward. Even those who were known for certain to have principally moved and persuaded the revolt from the Romans, concerning the punishment of the Senators of Capua, Fulvius and Claudius could not agree, Claudius was more tractable and exorable; and might have been soon entertained for a pardon, Fulvius was more rigid, and proceeded to a harder course. Whereupon Aippus put over the whole deciding and determining thereof unto the Senate of Rome. Alleging that it was meet and requisite that the L. of the Council should have the examination of the cause, and namely upon these points. "Imprimis," whether they had confessed and confessed in this action, with any of the free burthens and cities belonging to the state of the Latins, Iemen, whether they had any help and relief from them in the time of the war, or from any other towns whatsoever? But Fulvius in no case would confide end thereto nor suffer that the minds of faithful and loyal allies should be disquieted with doubtful surmises and suspicions of any crimes; and called in question upon the appearance and declarative information of those that never yet made reckoning or confession, either what they did, or what they said. And therefore he proceeded to [hispers that manner of proceeding, and truth that inquisition for patience. After this communication they departed alander: and Aippus made no doubt but that however his College lared and took on giving it oth throwed and bitter words. he would yet take patience and say the letters from Rome concerning so weighty a business as this was. But Fulvius, because of his deignment, brake up his keeping of State in his royal pavilion, and sent his officers and ordinary train out of the way, because he would not be hindered and empeached by them, in the course of his deignment: and commanded the Colonels and Captains of the Allies, to give warning into two thousand chosen men of arms, to be in readiness and present themselves at a third sound of the trumpet. With this power of horsemen he set forth by night, and maned to Theaumus: and by break of day entered the gate and kept his way on into the market-place. At the first entrance of the horsemens, the people ran together from all parts: then he called the chief Magistrate (a Sidicin) to be called, and charged him to produce his prisoners the Capuans, whom he had in custody. When they were all brought forth, they were first whipped with rods, and then beheaded. From thence he rode upon the spur to Cales: where so soon as he was set on the Tribunall seat, in place of judgement and the Capuan prisoners likewise presented in place and bound to the stake: these came a horseman in poll from Rome, and when he had delivered letters from C. Calpurnius the Consul, and the people of Rome unto Fulvius: there ran a rumour from the Tribunall through all the assembly, that the whole process against the Campans was to be put off and referred entire to the senate and doom of the Lords of the Senate, and Fulvius supposing it to be no less indeed after he took the letters, never brake them up, but bestowed them in his bosome, and gave commandment to the Crier, to charge the Lieutenant or executioner to do his office, according to law. Thus they also that were at Cales were executed and suffered death. Then he read the letters, and the order let down by the Senate: but it was too late now, to lay that which was done already and part which indeed was hasted with all speed that might be, for fear it might have been crost and prevented.

Now as Fulvius was arising from the bench, Taurca Jubellius, a Campan, passing amidst the throng, called by name aloud upon Fulvius. Whereas Flaccus wondering what the man meant, fit him down again upon his seat and demanded what he would: Marv. (quoth he) command me also to be killed that thou mightest boast and glory another day that thou hast done to death a better man by far and much more valiant than thyself. Surely (quoth Flaccus) this fellow is humane and not well in his wits: and again, were I minded to take his life from him, I am inhibited by virtue of the act of the Senate, "Then (quoth Jubellius) since my country is for ed and oil, my kinsfolk and friends made away: seeing also that I have with mine own hand mordred my wife and children, because they should suffer no villainous indignity; and may not my self so much as die this death which my countrymen have here suffered before my face. I will feck by virtue and manhood to save my self of this light, to redie and to rise, and odious unto me: and A with that, he drew forth the skin which he had hid under his garment, and flabb'd himself in the breast quite through his body, and there at the feet of the L. General fell down ready to dye in the place. Forasmuch as both the execution of the Campans, and also the most part of other matters were performed according to the will of Plaetor alone: some there be that write how App. Claudius died about the time that Capua was yielded. And that this very same Tarentus neither came to as of his own accord, nor killed him; but that as he was a binding to the stake, because the words which he uttered could not be heard for the confused noise of the people, therefore Plaetor commanded silence, and then Tarentus spake those words before rehearsed, namely, That himself a right valiant and hardy man was put to death by a meaner person than himself, and much inferior to him in valour and vertue, Whereat by the commandment of the Pro-Con.

But the crier pronounced and said: Go to Serjeant, let this brave and valiant man have the more store of rods bestowed upon him, let him have good quarter, lay on load, and let the ladies limbs truly on, and let him be the first that you proceed against, let him have the law to the full, Some there be that have written, how the act of the Senat was read before he proceeded to the beholding; but because there was this branch clause within the act, That if he thought so good he should receive the whole deciding of the matter unto the Senat he continued it thus, that it was put to his discretion how to weigh and consider what was more probable to the Common-wealth. This done, he returned from Caius to Capua. Ail'ects, and Calvia were both surrendered into his hands; so where all who were the chief heads of the states suffered the like punishment. Thus there were about four score of the Senators put to death: and to the number well-nigh of three hundred.

Capua, (born of noble blood) committed to prison. Others of them were bestowed in fate custody within divers Cities of the Latines, and came to funeral unhappy ends. The multitude besides of the Campian Citizens were held outright.

It remained now to put an end to and debate, what was to be done with the City and the Territory thereto belonging. And some were of mind, that a City to exceeding mighty, to near a neighbour, and so dangerous to Rome, should be utterly vext and destroyed. But the consideration of a pleasant commodity and gain, took place and prevailed. For in regard of the territory and land lying about it (which was well known to be the most fertile soil in all Italy, and yielded all manner of fruit) the City was saved: whereinto those husbandmen that tilled the grounds might retire themselves and dwell. And for the peopling and inhabiting thereof, there was a multitude relieved of the inhabitans which were there already, namely of Libertines and enfran bondslaves, Merchants, traders, artizans, and craftsmen who kept there till and remained. But the whole territory, and all publick edifices were zeal'd to the use of the people of Rome. Moreover, order was taken, that Capua should be inhabited only, and replenish'd with people like a City: but no form of Common-wealth; no Corporation no Senat, no assembly of Commons nor Magistrates of their own should be allowed there. For without a common Council of State, without magistracies and government, without intelligentes and reciprocall commerce, as in the body of a Commonalty, they supposed, that they would never agree together in any complot, but be far unmeet to contrive a conspiracy and complot alteration. As for a Provost or Governor to minister law, and execute justice among them, they purposed to send them one yearly from Rome.

Thus were the affairs ordered and composed at Capua, by a good policy and commendable course every way. For those that were most in fault and guilty were punished with rigour and that speedily. The number of Citizens were scattered and dispersed lawful ways, without all hope to return again. The bare houses and walls that had not offended they were spared, and neither burn'd nor pull'd down. And besides the commodity and gain that accrued unto the Romans by this manner of proceeding, they won some name of clemency and mercy among their Condecdates and Allies: in that they saved a most noble and wealthy City, at the ruins whereof all Campaii, and as many States as bordered about Campania, would have grieved much, and groan'd again. By this means also the enemy was constrained now to coniue, and could not otherwise chuse, how powerful and mighty the Romans were to chastifie and punish their faithless stoitants, yet, and how terrible Annibal was, and not able to defend and maintain they whom he had received into his protection.

The Roman Pro-Conuls after they had finished and performed their charge at Capua assigned unto Claudius Nero his thousand footmen out of those two Legions which he had before Capua, and three hundred horsemen which he had chosen himself: also of Latin Allies as many foot in number, and 800 horse besides. This army Nero embarked at Puteoli, and transported into Spain. When he was arrived at Narbon, after he had there landed his footmen, and laid up his ships in dock and armed with all his mariners (to make the greater number) he marched to the river Tauris, where he received the forces of T. Fonteius, and L. Martinus, and from thence advanced toward the enemies.

Astebul, the son of Amilcar, lay encamp'd at a place called the Black-stones, in the Antilans country: it lieth between the towns Liturgias and Mentisca, Now Nero kept the narrow firkights of the forrest there, Astebul, because he would not be pent up in so strait a room, sent an herald or messenger of peace to him, who should make promise in his name, that if Nero would remit him to pass peaceably from thence, he would withdraw all his forces out of Spain. The Roman Captain took this message joyfully: and Astebul requited, that they might part the next day, and devise together how the Romans would let down conditions and articles in writing, as touching the tenderly and delivery of the fortresses in every City, and likewise of prepaing some day, by which time the garrisons should be removed and displaced, and the Carthagians have away all their bag and baggage without fraud and covin. Aferhbol having obtained his request, presently commanded, that in the very evening, and all night long the heaviest and most cumbrous part of his whole army should escape what way soever they could out of the guller of the forest. But he gave especiall direction, that they should not over many of them that night go forth, because their small number was not only litter to deceive the enemy, and not so soon to be discovered, but also might more easily pass through those narrow and difficult passages. So the morrow they came to an interview and parli, where the time was spent of purpose in much needles talk, and drawing of books, more than cause was whereupon the day being large gone, the builnels was put off unto the next day. And the night ensuing, between miniftred Aferhbol more time to send others away. And yet could they not make an end that day neither. Thus there passt certain days, employed in open whev about dispute and reasoning of the articles and conditions of agreement, and the nights were bestowed in letting out the Carthaginians closely out of their Camp. Now, after that the greater part of his hold was gone away clear, then he began to wrangle and jarr, yea, and to go from some offers that he had voluntarily made, and ever they were further and utter more in agreement. For Alerobil the lens that he feared, the lens also was to be trusted. And by this time in manner all his Infantry were got out of the forest, and the next morning, not only the forest, but all the plains about were overcast, and covered with a thick and foggy mist. Which Alerobil perceiving, he sent a messenger to Nero, requesting to deliver their farther conference and communication to the enemies, pretending, that the present day was a festival holy-day among the Carthaginians, and therefore they made a pause upon it, to follow any other business but serve God. All this while there was no fraud so much as one inspected. Alerobil had no sooner obtained reprieve for that day, but forthwith he and all his Cavalry, together with his Elephants, dislodged, and without any noise or stir recovered without any harm a place of security. By the fourth hour of the day the sun had dispatched and scattered the mist, and cleared the sky, and then the Romans might discover the Camp of their enemies empty, and no creature sit therein. Then at length, Clundius perceiving that Alerobil had shewed him a Carthaginian trick, and that he was at length thus over-ran by his falsehood and cunning practice, began to make our after him, minding to bid him batall. But the enemy would none of that, and fell off. Howbeit there passt some L small skirmishes between the rewer of the Carthaginians, and the forlorn hope and vancouriers of the Romans. Amidst these affairs (the States of Spain) neither they who revolted after the overthrow of the Romans returned again unto them; nor any new fell away, more than before.

At Rome, the Senate and people afier the recovery of Capua, took as great care for Spain now, as for Italy it fell. And agreed they were in general, that the army there shoulc be strengthned with new forces and a Generallthiter iem; but who should be the man was not yet concluded.
Forasmuch as they were to take some extraordinary care in the chusing of one to be sen thither, where two singular and renowned warriors were flain within the compass of thirty days; and to succeed in the room of that great man. While some nominated one, and some another, at length they grew to this point, that the people should hold a solemn assemblcy (as it were, purchased for election of a Pro-Consul to go over into Spain. And the Consuls accordingly proclaimed a fea day for the said assemblcy. At first there was great expectation that those persons who took themselves worthy of so great command should put forth themselves, and prefer their own names beforehand. But when this expectation failed, and came to nothing, every man began aTRIES retire to reticre and renew the former jyiet, and moun again for the looses received, and to find the want and misf of so valorous Captains whom they had lost. Whereupon the whole City being sad and penifive, and in manner destitute of all good conncill, and not resolved what to do in this hard case, came yet down into Mass field upon the day appointed for the election. Every mans eye was upon the Magistrates, and beheld the comnenences of their great men and Ru-ers, how they looked one upon another, grieving and grumbling that the State was at so low an ebb, and the Common-weal grown to so delicate a case, that no man durst be seen to take upon him the government and Province of Spain. Then all of a sudden, P. Corinellis (his fon that was slain in Spain, a young Gentleman, not fully four and twenty years old) shewed himself, and said, That he would undertake that charge upon him; and therewith stepped up into an higher place, from whence he might bee seen and there he stood. Upon whom, when all men had cast their eyes, and viewcd him well, in a general acclaim and favourable affection unto the man, they wisht unto him straitways a happy and fortunate government. And when the assembly was willing to give their suffrages, and go to a crutiny, there was not one City from the frnt to the laft, nor one person from the highest to the lowest, but gave their voice with P. Sciri-pio for to take a voyage as L. Deputy into Spain. But after the thing was passed, and their pas-tionate heat of affection once allied, they were on a sudden driven into a still silence and deep dump, to think what alteration and new deed they had done. And that which they behought themselves most oft, was this, that favours had carried them away in this action more than the due consideration and regard of his age. Some there were that had in dread and horror the omenous fortune allo of that family; and the name of him that out of two mounfull hours was to

Ago into those Provinces where he must fight amongst the Sepulchres both of father and mother. When Scipio perceived, that presently upon the election passed in to hastily a fight, the people should be heavy and penitent; he called them to an open audience, and there before them all openly and in his young age, of the government committed unto him, and of the future war that he would manage: and that with so noble courage and hasty spirit, that he renewedareth and kindled again the former zeal and heat that was so cooled; and polemized men minds with more admired hope than usually many faithful promises, or reason grounded upon the confidence of precedents past, or any earthly thing is wont to afford and maintain. For Scipio was a rare and wonderfull man, not only in regard of those true virtues inherent in him, but also for that he had framed himself as his young and tender years, by arithmetical means, to the better setting out of those inbred parts and qualities of his own: making them and emblem before the multitude, that the most things which be did, were either represented unto him by night-siennes and apparitions, or else insugetted, as it were, by revelation from the gods above; were it that he was in perpetually given, and his mind wholly polemized therewith, or by that his policy he might effect his deligements, and have his commands performed with more expedition, as if they were directions delivered from the Oracles and the very mouth of the gods. Over and besides that, he made this overture to credit and reputation, and prepared men minds in this sort from his very first beginning. From the very time that he once put on his man's gown, there was no day went over his head, but before he began his own private business, or excepted any publick affairs, he would go into the Capitol and so soon as he was entred into the Temple, there in head down, and alone by himself belowe a good time in some secret and corner thereof. This ordinary manner of his, which he continued all his life long, (were it of purpose considerately, or by chance unduly,) made divers men believe veryly, that it was a truth indeed, which was commonly supposed and reported, That the man had a god to his father, Which deep and setted imagination of the universe, relumed and renewed again the like fame (in all the world) to that which went before and was bruited abroad of Alexander the great, and for the vanity and fabulous speech of folk, was the very fame and all one in every respect; namely, that his mother conceived him by a mighty great serpent: for that very often in her bed-chamber there was seen some such prodigious and wonderfull thing, and ever as any body did see it, it would wind away of a sudden, and vanish out of sight. These strange and miraculous conceits he would never himselfe elevate and diffuse as tales and vanities, but rather cherish, and create the opinion there of, by a certain certain call of his own, in that he would neither deny and disallow any such matter, nor yet affirm plainly and verify the same. Many other devises he had of like sort, partly true indeed, partly unleon and counterfeit, which called men beyond all measure to have this young man in wonderfull admiration. Upon the strong and grounded premption whereof, the City at that time conferred upon him (far unmeet, I wot, in regard of his untimely years) to great a government, and a world withall of weight and important affairs.

Besides the forces which remained in Spain of the old army, and those which were transported over from Puteoli with Claudius Nero, he had a supplement also of ten thousand foot, and one thousand horsemen: and to afflict in the conduct of his wars, he had as conductour appointed unto him M. Junius Sylla, the Pro-Prætor. This with a fleet of thirty ships, (and Galley there were all of five banks of oars,) he took the less, and fell from the mouth of Ypres, and coasting along the Tuscan seas under the Alps, and through the gulf of Gallia, he doubled at length the point and cape of Pyrene, and disembarkt the City of Greeks; (for defended they are also from Pheaces) and there left his people a lind. From thence, having taken order that his ships should follow after, he marched by land to Taracou, which he appointed for the rendezvous, where all his allies and confedera!s (for at the wonder and fame of his landing, there blocked Embassadors unto him from all parts of the Province) should meet together at a regular Diet. There he commanded that the ships should be bellowed in their docks; save only three Galleys of three ranks which came from Maffileg, and upon curtesie and kindness accompanied him from home, and there were sent back again. Then he gave audience to the Embassadors, who hinging in doublest suspension by reason of the variety and of hurry changes and chances that lately had hapned, and to them he began to return anweter, and give them their several dispatches: but with such spirit and boldness (upon confidence that he had in his own rare virtues) that he let not fall in all his speech one word that might move quarrell, and favoured of rigour; and yet whatsoever else him itake, it carried an exceeding majesty with it and a singular credit. Being departed from Taracou, he visited both the States of the Allies, and also the landling wintering camps of the army: where he highly commended the fouldiers, for that notwithstanding they had received two thousand blows, upon two so great defeates one in the neck of another, yet they held the Province full, and kept the field, and not suffering the enemies to rest and sithe the fruit of their fruit, and the victory, and kept them out of all the countries lying within Iberus, and defended faithfully all their confedera!s according to the truth reported in them. Martius he had in his train always about him; whom he so highly honoured: that it was very well seen, he feared nothing less than that any other man should equal or shadow his glory. Then Sylla succeeded in place of Nero, and the new foudiers were brought into the flanding winter leagurers, and Scipio having reviewed all the Cities and the States that he was to turrey, and performed all other affairs that were then to be done, retired and withdrew himselfe to Taracou.
The fame of Scipio was no less bruited among the enemies, than it was rife with his own citizens and loving allies: and a certain preface went with all the future event, which carried (as good hap was) the greater fear and dread with it, as there was less reason that could be rendred and given thereof. They had betaken themselves into their wintring harbours far distant and remote sldner. Afterward the son of Grisco even as far as to the Ocean, laid unto Cades: Magus into the midland parts, and especially above the forest and chafe of Castile, and afterward the son of Amilcar, wintred nearest unto Iberus about Saguntum.

In the very end of that summer, when Cipas was won, and Scipio came into Spain, the Carthaginian Armado which was sent for out of Sicily to Tarentum, for to intercept the视觉s, and empeace the fame for coming to the Roman garrison that held the Castle of Tarentum, had very loth all the passages from the sea to the said Castle: but by their long abode in those parts, and keeping the seas so slightly, they had caused a greater death and fastness of visuals among their own friends than their enemies: for there could not by the help of those Carthaginian ships so much corn be along the river that was postlided by friends, nor from the open ports, for to furnish the townsmen of Tarentum, as the army it fell consumed and spent in maintenance of that rabble of men, sailors, guards, and mariners, mingled of all sorts of people. So as the garrison of the Castle being but few in number there was able to be holdfast by the provision they had aforehand, without the help of any new brought in unto them: whereas the Tarentines and the Navy could not have sufficient conveyed unto them: by reason whereof, at length the Armado had leave to depart thence with more thanks in the City, than they had for their first seem-venement. And yet visuals were not much cheaper, because when the help by sea was gone there could K no corn at all be brought from other parts abroad.

At the end of the very same summer, when M. Marcellus was come to the City out of Sicily, his own Pro-ince, C. Calpurnius the Prator assembled the Senate for his fake in the Temple of Bel- Jone. Where, after he had discoursed of the acts by him achieved, and complained after a mild and modest fort, laying open his griefs, not so much in the behalf of himself, as of his souldiers: in that way he had performed and accomplished his charge and commission in his Province, he could not have been to bring home his army with: he demanded that he might be allowed to ride in triumph into the City: but he could not obtain it. This matter was much canvased and debated, pro & contra. Whether it were less meet and convenient to deny him triumph being now present, in whose name whiles he was absent for the Fortunes succes and good speed of all affairs under his conduct and government, there was a solemn proceeding decreed, and sacrifices done to the honour of the immortal gods: or to grant him triumph (as if the war were fully finnished) whom the Senate had commanded to make over his army to his successor; which surely they would never have decreed, but that the war remained still within the Province: and especially seeing the army itself was away, the beeft witness simply, whether he had deserved a triumph or no. At length, a middle and indifferent course between both was agreed upon, namely, that he should enter the City ovant in a petty triumph. And the Tribunes of the Commons, by the approbation first of the Senate, proposed unto the people, that M. Marcellus should the same day that he came ovant into the City retain still his full authority and government. The day before he entered the City, he rode in triumph upon the mount Albanus, and from thence, in ovant with which he sent a rich bootie before him into the City. There was carried in this pomp the counterfeits of the City Syracusa won, crossbows, brakes, landing flings, and all other warlike instrument; besides, the ornaments testifying long and continentall peace, and the great wealth and treasure of the Kings; as divers vesseract of silver and brass curiously wrought: other household furniture alse, rich hangings of tapistry, and garments of great price; many goddy images and right noble statues, wherewith Syracusa was adorned and beautified, even with the belt and principal Caires of Greece. In token also of a victory over the Carthaginians, there were eight Elephants brought in a flock. And that which was not the least sight and spectacle to behold, Sopha the Syracusan, and Mercian the Spaniard went before with crowns upon their heads. The one of them was the guide when Syracusa was entred in the night season: and the other betrayed Nopsas, and the garrison there. Both those were enfranchised Citizens of Rome, and had fifty acres of land a piece granted unto them for ever. So had his land left out in the territory of Sicily, which either belonged to the Kings or to the enemies of the people of Rome, and a dwelling house (chuse where he would in Syracusa) of all those that were seiz'd upon by right of conquest.) As for Mercian and the Spaniards that with him fled from the enemies, and deced unto the Romans, they had assigned unto them a City to inhabit, and land to occupie in Sicily, which sometime belonged to them that had revolted from the people of Rome. And order was given to M. Cornelius for to appoint them the said City and land whereever he thought good. And in the same territory there were allotted and set out four hundred acres of land unto Belligens, by whose means Mercian was allured and induced to leave the advetis part and turn to the Romans.

After that Marcellus was departed out of Sicily, the Navy of the Carthaginians disbark'd eight thousand footmen and three thousand Numidian horsemen. Unto them revolted the Murgantine land, and Hylas, together with Magellus and other small pilies of base account, took example by them and followed after. The Numidians with their Captain Mutines ranged over all Sicily, and rided the towns and villages belonging to the Scottolani of the people of Rome. Over and besides all this the Roman army there, being discontented and angry, parly, for that together with their General, A neail, they were not licenfed to go out of the Province: and partly, for that they were forbidden and debared, for wintritg in any good towns; demeaned themselves factly and lazily in their military service: in fuch fort, as if there had been a head to lead them as they had a heart to move them, they would have mutined and rebelled. Among these troubles and difficulties, M. Corneliu as the Prefect, both appealed and mitigated the tomacks of the fouldiers, as well by comfortable words, as by rebukes and checks: and also brought under his obedience and subjection, all those Cities which had revolted. Of which he according to the former act of the Senate, allotted Men-gentius to the Spaniards, unto whom both a City and land to it was by order aforefeid due. Both the Comitii who had the government of the Province Apulia, seeing there was leis cante of fear and terror now from the Carthaginians and Annibals, were commanded to cut lots between them for the Provinces of Apulia and Macedon, so Macedon, befit into Sulpitius, and he inc ceeded there instead of Lenius. Fulvius was sent for home to Rome, about the election of the Comitii. And when he held the solemn afemblies of the people, for the choice and creation of the ditto, The Century of the younger Citizens, which had the prerogative to give their first voice, de-declared T. Maelius as Torgatus, and T. Oelius for Comitiis. Maelius being there present in place, when the multitude came about him to congratulate with God, give you joy, &c. (for that there was no doubt, but the whole body of the people would approve this choice of the first Century.) came with a great company about him to the tribunal fear of estate where the Comitii sat: and made request unto him, that he would give him the hearing of some few words, and command C that prerogative century which had given their voices to be called back again to a new scrutiny.
And when every man was attentive and expected what he should demand, he alledged for his excuse a pair of ill eyes. "For a famleles Pilot of a ship is he and imputid a General of an army (quoth he) who having to do all by other men’s eyes, would require to have the goods and lives of other men to be put into their hands. And therefore may it please your honour to command this Century of the younger fort to give their voices anew, and in creating Comitiis, to remember the war that is in Italy, to consider of the troublesome state of the Commonweal, and to think of this, That it scarce yet men ears have had any rest, since they refounded and run again with the noises and alarms, that the enemies raised within these few months, when they lay in siege neer unto the walls of Rome. But after these words, when the said Century D with one accord, that they were of the same mind still, and would nominate the same Comitiis ag ain, and none other; then Torgatus, Neither (quoth he) shall I be able, if I were Comitius to bear with your fashions and conditions, nor you again endure my rule and commandment. To the scrutiny therefore once again, and think how the Carthaginians war within Italy, and Annibals the Generali of the enemies. Then the Century moved as well by the authority and revere-ce of the same person, as by the applaus and admiration of the people, who wondered at his venue, behoght the Comitiis to call forth and cite Century of the elder band; for that they would willingly confer with more ancient men than themselves, and by their sage advice and good direction nominate the Comitiis. When those elders were called to this Century, there was some time allowed for to commune apart secretly with them, within the place raifed in, called Osile.
E Those ancians said (towards them, that they were to consult of three persons, wheto of two already were full of honourable dignities, which they had born to wit, Q. Fabius and M. Marcellus. But they lay (tay they) in case ye would have some new Coi, to be choosen, for to be oppid against the Carthaginians, ye have M. Valerius Lenius, a notable man, one who hath performed singular good service, and achieved many noble deeds, both by sea and land against King Philip. So when they had three in proportion unto them, the elder were dimmited, and the younger entred into a second scrutiny; and declared for Comitiis. M. Claudius Marcellus (glistening then in the prime of his brilliance, for the late subduing and conquest of Sicily) and M. Valerius, who was abled, Thisfore-dom and choice of the prerogative Century, all the rest followed after, and by their signatures confirmed. "Let them mock on now and so forth hereat all they that have nothing in admiration but fancy and things done in elder time. For mine own part, if there be any iinch City and Common-wealth at all, consisting of wise men and Philosophers, a some great Clarks have rather imagined in their families, than found in effect; I dare be bold to think & lay, that in it there could not possibly be either rulers and Magistrates more grave and temperate in their desire of dignity and government, or a people better mannered, nurtured, and instructed. But that it shoule be thought an unlikely matter and scarce credible that a Century of younger person were willing to confer with the elder, and be advised by them to whom they should give their voices: for to be created the chief Magistrates; it is the corruption of this age is that the cause: wherein "we see how small reverence and authority even parents themselves have, and of how slender and base account they be amongst their own natural children.
After this account the Election of Prefectors, wherein were created P. Maelius Volfio, and L.
G. Maelius Acidinius. C. Leculum, and L Cincius Alimentus. When this Election was finished it for-tuned that news came, how T. Oelius (whom the people, as it seemed, would have chosen in his absence to match T. Maelius in the Comitiiship, but that the ordinary course of the election was disturbed and stopped) departed this life in Sicily. The Apollinaire games in the former year had been exhibited: and when Calpurnius the Praetor put up a bill, and moved the Senate, that they might be celebrated again that year also, there passed a decree, That they should be vowed to continue from time to time for ever.

The Oration
of T. Maelius
at the Comitii.
The same year certain prodigious tokens were seen and reported. In the Temple of Concordia the Image of Victory, which stood upon the lantern and top thereof was lit by lightning, and being shaken and driven from its own place, reeled fast upon those other Images of Victory that were fixed in the forefront of the said Temple, and fell not down from thence. Word also was brought, That in Cappadocia and Persia the walls and the gates were likewise blasted and bruised with fire from heaven: and that in the market place of Sidon there ran dreams of blood a whole day together: That in Eretum it rained stones: and that in Rome a female mule brought forth a foal. These strange and wonderful signs were purged and expiated with greater sacrifices: and a solemn supplication proclaimed: wherein for one day the people should wholly attend their devotions, and pray unto the gods: and likewise a Novendiall sacrifice. In that year died I certain publick Priests of State, and new were chosen in their stead, Caius Livius in the room of M. Pomponius Mius the High Priest: and M. Servilius, to supply the place of C. Carvilius Maximus, the Arch-Augur. And forasmuch as T. Ocelius Maximus, the Prelate or Bishop, died when the year was expired, there was none nominated for to succeed him, C. Claudius the Arch-flamine of Jupiter left his Flaminship, and was deprived of that Sacerdotal dignity, because he had committed an error in tactrifying, when he should minister and distribute the inwards of the beast.

About the same time M. Aemilius Levianus (after he had by secret conferences founded aforehand and solicited the minds of the Aetolian Princes and great L. L. came with a small fleet of ships lightly appointed, to their general Diet or Council, summoned before for that purpose only. In which solemn assembly, after he had made declaration, 'That Syracusae and Cappae were won, and under the protection of the people of Rome, and what good successes they had in the affairs and wars of Italy: and distingued besides, That the Romans, according to their ancient custom, received by tradition from their forefathers, used to respect and make much of their Allies: and namely, That either they received them into the City of Rome, and endowed them with the fame fran bies that they themselves enjoyed, or else dealt so liberally with them otherwise, that they liked of their condition so well, as they chose rather to be allies than Citizens: he protested and said, That the Aetolians should be much more honoured amongst them than all others, for that they were the first that of all forren nations beyond sea, entertained league and amity with them. As for King Philip and the Macedonians, their heavy friends, & dangerous L. neighbours, he had so daint their courses, abated their forces, and driven them to that place, that not only they were forced to abandon those towns, which by violence they had taken wrongly from the Aetolians, but also had much ado themselves to keep Macedonia itself quiet, and without peril of hostility: promising withall, That he would bring and reduce the Aetolians (for whom the Aetolians were so diffident and grieved, that they were disinclined from the body of their State) under their ancient form of jurisdiction and feigning again. These relations and promises made by the Roman General, were confirmed and affixed amongst them by the authority and comenence of Sopas (who for the time was the Praetor or head Magistrate of that State) land of Dorimichus a Prince of the Aetolians, who with less modedly and greater affervation and confidence enrolled and magnified the greanles, power, and majesty of the people of Rome. M.

The principal matter that induced and moved them was the hope of recovering and keeping Aetolia. Whereupon, there were conditions drawn & engrossed, under which they should joyn in league and friendship with the people of Rome. And this branch was added to the rest of the decazances. That if they were so pleased, and liked well of it, there should be comprised in the same league and privileges the Eleans and Lacestramionians, together with Attalos, Pherennus, and Scerdiltes: of which three, Attalus was King of Asia the lefts, the other were Princes and Potenates of Illyricum. The articles ran in this form, Imprimis. That the Aetolians should immediately make war by land with King Philip, Item, That the Romans at sea should help with twenty galleys at the least bearing five ranks of oars. Item, Attouching all the Cities that should be conquered (beginning from Aetolias, so far as to Ceregy) that the ground wherein the Cities were situated, the edifices, the walls, and the lands thereto belonging, should be seised to the use of the Aetolians: all other goods and chattells else, should be a prize for the people of Rome. Item, That if the Aetolians happened to make peace with Philip, it must pafs with this clause and proviso, that the peace should stand good upon this condition. That Philip abstain to make war upon the Romans and their Allies and all those that lived under their dominions. Item, In case the people of Rome fortunate to piece again, and be confedrate with the King, they should put in a caveat and proviso, that he might have no liberty to war upon the Aetolians, or their associates. Thee were the covenants agreed upon: and being fair engrossed two years after into a piece of indentures the one of them remained for the Aetolians in Olympia, the other for the Romans in their Capitol, among other facre records and monuments, for a perpetuall memorial to all posterity. The occasion of so great delay was because the Embassadors of the Aetolians were thaid and kept very long at Rome. But that was no lettor hindrance at all to the proceedings in the wars. For the Aetolians sencely made war upon Philip: and Levianus conquered Zacynthia (a little Iland near to Aetolias, having a City within it of the same name, which he forced by allians, all the Castell) likewise Oeniade and Nasus, which he won from the Acarnanians before: and all theie he gave to the Aetolians. And supposing that Philip having his hands full of the war upon his owne frontiers had no time to think upon Italy, and the Carchaginians; and to mind the
The sixth and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

A the covenant that passed between Annibal and him, he retired himself into Coreia.

Philip, lying in winter harbor within Pella, was advertised of the "Aréolians revolt. Therefore he minded at the prime of the Spring to conduct an army into Greece, to the end that Macedon and the Cities bordering thereupon, should not be molested by the Illyrians, whom he supposed would be at quiet and not far, if they were once frighted with the harms of others, he made a sudden rode and expedition into the marches of the Orient and Appoloniats: and when the Appoloniats issued forth against him, he repelled them, and with great fear and terror drove them within their walls. After he had wafted the confines next to the Illyrians, he turned his forces with like celerity and speed into Pelagonia: and then went by assaunt a City of the

B Dardanirians, situatet in the frontiers of Macedon, through which the Dardanirians meant to have their passage. And when he had performed these exploits in great haste, not forgetting how the Aréolians and Romans, both maintained war against him joyntly, he descended through Pelagonia, Nymphaeum, and Bolae, into Thessalys; supposing very that the people of those countries might be incited to wage war together with him against the Aréolians. And leaving there behind him (at the height of the Thebians) Persenum thousand strong, to debar the Aréolians entrance that way: - himiis in person, before that he should be occupied in greater affairs, led forth his army into Macedon, and from thence into Thracia, and forwarded against the Medians. That nation was wont to make incursions, and to invade Macedon, whenever they could perceive that the King was either banished in other wars, or his Realm disturbed and slenderly provided

C of good guard and strong garrisons. He began therefore to tierrage and spoil the territories about Phragana, and to affult Lamphorina, the principal City and chief strength of that Region Medea.

Scopu having intelligence that the King was gone into Thracia, and kept there occupied in the wars, put all the serviceable young men of Evodia in arms, and prepared war against Acranius. The nation of the Acranians, albeit they were both in strength unequal, and allow already, that they had lost the wall City of the Odontis, and Nuza, and knowing well that the Roman forces would come upon them besides: rather upon anger than any good counsel and advice, made preparation for war, and resolved to meet them. Their wives and children, and elder persons such as were above forty years of age, they sent away into Epirus, and joyning near unto them.

D Of all that were fifteen years old and upward unto three score, they took a solemn oath that they would never return back without victory. They bid also a heavy curse and cruel malediction upon all those of their own nation: and framed a most humble request in such effectual terms as they could devise, unto all their friends, that none of them should enter within their Cities, their doors and houses, nor admit with to their table, any one of them that were unhonored, and fled out of the field: yea, and besought with the Eprius to gather together the dead bodies of as many of them as should chance to be slain in battell, and to inter them all in one grave, and erect a tomb and monument over them, with an Epitaph and inscription to this effect: Here lie buried and entombed the Acranians, who fighting in defence of their country, against the violence and injuries of the Aréolians, lost their lives manfully in the field. By this means, when their courages were enkindled and incensed, they encamped themselves in their utmost frontiers, abiding the coming of their enemies. And having dispatched messengers to Philip, to give notice to him in what jeopardy they stood, they constrained him to give over that war which he had in hand, considering that Lamphorina was surrendered up into his hands, and that he had spied well otherwise in the reit of his affairs. The Aréolians, upon the first fame that was blown abroad of that solemn oath taken by the Acranians, were well cooled, and not so hastily to set forward but hearing once of Philip his coming, they were driven to retire again as far as possibly they could within their own confines. Neither Philip for his part marched on further than to Clote (norwithstanding that he made great speed afore, and took long journeys: for fear that the Acranians should be surprized, before he could reach unto them) for so soon as he heard that the Aréolians were retir'd, he himself also returned unto Pella.

Levius in the beginning of the spring took the sea, and loosed from Coreia, and having doubled the point of Leucate, and sailed as far as Nauplia, there he publish'd and gave knowledge, that he would shape his course from thence for Anticyra: and that Scopas and the Aréolians should there meet him, and be in readiness. This Anticyra is situate in Lucris, on the left hand, as ye enter into the gulf of Corinth. By land it is a small journey thither from Nauplia, and as short a cut by sea. So within three days after they began to affult the City on both sides. The fiercer assault was from the sea-side, both because they had in their ships engines of batterie, and other ordnance and artillery of all sorts; and also, for that the assailants from that part were Romans. So within few days the City was yelded up, and delivered again unto the Aréolians, the pillage thereof fell to the Romans share, according to covenant. There Levius received letters from Rome, specifying thus much, That he was declared Consul in his abstinence, and P. Scopas was coming to succeed him in the Province: but by occasion that he lay there sick of a long diseaie, he came to Rome later than all men expected.

M. Marcellus entering his Consulship upon the Ides of March, assembled the Senate that day, only for form and order sake: for he made open profusion there, that during the absence of his "Colleague", he would treat of no matters, either concerning the State of the City, or the Provinces. But this protestation he uttered withall, and said: That he knew well that there were "many many Sicilians in the towns and villages near unto the City, backbiters and flanders of him. H who lit his own part he was so far off from hindring, but that they might freely for all him, diuulget and publish abroad in Rome all thole crimes which were devised and spoken against him by his adversaries, that were it not that they pretended some fear for both, to charge the Conful with any matters, in the absence of his Collegues he would straightways give them audience in the Senate: but to soon verily as my brother Conful is come home, I will not quoth he, 1 I salute you suffer any one matter to be debated here, before that thole Sicilians be lent into the Senate house. And I understand that M. Cornelius hath taken general search like a matter over all Sicily, to the end there might come a number to Rome with complaints of me: he also with letters full of unruthe hath buzzed into all mens ears, and born the whole City in hand. I that the war continueth still in Sicily, and all to diminish and abridge my glory. The Conful having that day won the commendation and name of one that knew how to rule and govern his affections dissimil'd the Senat: and it seemed that there would be a general vacation not of law matters only, but of all other things & as it were holyday till, until the other Conful came unto the City. This rest and idleness (as the wonted manner is) let the Commons having nothing else to do, a talking: and now their tongues walked space, ceasing not to spread rumours. That by this long and continuall war, not only the lands and territory about the City of Rome (especially where Annius had marched with his cruel army) were wasted, but also Italy was in a manner dilipated and laid desolate, by reason of so many multitudes and levies: complaining, that whole armies were defeated and put to the sword at Cannae in defence of the Common-wealth: and K that there were two Conuls created, both martiall men, and warriors, over-foerce and eager of fight, of as time of peace and quietness were able to find occasions of war: so little was it to be looked for at their hands, that in time of war they would seek for peace, and suffer the City to have any breathing time and intermission. The like speech has rumoured among the common people were interrupted and laid by occasion of a sacred fire that began in fundry places together about the Forum, in the night of that day, which was immediately before the festival dais of Minerva, called Quinquatrus. At one and the self-same time the seven merchants shops and ware-houses, which afterwards were turned into five, and the shops of the Bankers and money-changers which now are called Notez (or the new-shops) were on fire. Divers private mens houses also the fire caught: for as then there were no flately Halls and Palaces of the City there built. Likewise the L fire took hold of the common prison, called Launia the Fith market hall likewise, and the toy-gallery or walking-place. Hardly could the Chappel of Pomf place be saved, and that by the good help and pains-taking especially of thirteen bondilaves: whole bondage was bought out at the Cities charges, and they made freemen. The fire continued one night and a day: and no man made doubt, but it came by mans hand, and was the practice of some few persons: for that the fires began in many places at once and those far distant alducer. Whereupon the Conful by the advice and direction of the Senat, made proclamation in a solemn assembly of the people, that whosoever would come forth and give notice by whole means that fire was procured, he should be well rewarded: if he were a free-man, with a piece of mony; if bond, with freedom. In hope of which recompence, a certain slave belonging to the Cal-wit the Campans, (his name was Mann) was induced to bewray the matters whom he therfor, and five other young Gentlemen of Camp was fathers had left their heads by the commandment of Q. Fulvius. Tho[e he apprehend to have made the laid fires: and he gave them a warning besides, that they intended to do more mischief about the City, if they were let alone, and not apprehended: so they were attached, and their household-servants. At the first, these persons made account both of the informer, and the information they made, and elevated the credit that was given thereto: alledgeing, that the day before the party himslef being chatified and scourged by his Masters, ran away, and so upon an anger and giddy fit devy'd (by occasion of this misfortune which was meer casual) to frame an accusation against his masters. But when the matter was averred to their teeth in open place, and the, by whole ministrity the feast was done, were in the midit of the Forum put to N the rack for to utter a truth, then they all made confession of the fact. As so well the Masters that were the letters thereof, as the servants that were privy and accelliatory thereto, had their deferts, and suffered for it. The informer who disclosed the villany, was made free, and had 20000 asses for his labour.

As the Conful Launia passe d by Capua in his journey [ homeward, ] there flocked about him a number of Campans, and belought him with tears, that they might have leave to go to Rome, and present themselves before the Senat, there to make suit (if happily there any pity and commination in them) not to destroy them utterly, nor suffer Q. Fulvius to confume the name and generation of the Campans from off the face of the earth. Now Fulvius, in part denied therein that he bare them any private grudge by malice: but only hated the Campans as the common enemies to the state, and so he would do ever so long as he knew them to full affect ed as they were to the people of Rome: for there was not a nation upon earth, nor a people under heaven more frightfully & deadly bent against the Roman name than they were. And that was the cause (faith he) that he penned them up within their walls. For who soever of them chance d any way to make an escape, they ranged about the country like brute and savage beasts, rent ing, tearing, and killing who so ever came in their way. Some of them are fled to the adytic side unto Annibald others are gone to Rome to set fire on the City, and there (quoth he) shall the Con

Campbell's blessings, cleansing; There should be clear that they minded to have done violence upon the camp of VelPhi, and to have put out those curtails in, and utterly defaced the first pledge of the Roman Empire, bestowed and laid up here in the midst of the camp pell, Neither thought he it was false for the City to permit the Campans to come within the walls thereof, Then Lucius having caused the Campans to take a corporal oath, and swear unto him, that they would make return to Cypar before the two diseases were expired, after they had their answer, and discharge from the Senate; commanded them to come after him to Rome.
Attended thus as he was with his company, he encountered the Sicilians, who came further to be met, and with this multitude he entered the City, accompanied (lately) with the Campans and Sicilians: both vanquished and subdued, was as acusers of two mistrustful persons, Marcelliuns and Fulvius, who had conquered two most noble and renowned Cities, Sycany; and Campus.

But both the Consul treated and consulted with the Senate, about the State of the Commune, and the government of the Provinces: Then Lucius related what terms stood Macedon and Greece: the Eolians also, with the Acanthians and Locrians: likewise what acts he had achieved in those parts both by sea and land; and how he had repulsed Philip back into Macedon, when he began to make war upon the Eolians, who now was retired and gone into the utmost parts of his Kingdom: so as the legions might be withdrawn from thence, for that the Armado was insufficient to keep the King forth of Italy. Thus much spoke he of himself; and of the Province whereof he had been governor. Then both Consuls in common, proposed unto the Senate, concerning the Province. And the LL, decreed that one of the Consuls should take the charge of Italy, and of the war with Annibal; and the other should have under his hand the Armado, whereof Lucilius was the Admiral: and together with L. Cincius the Praetor, govern the Province of Sicily. They were allowed the two armies which were in Tuscany and in France, consisting of four legions; whereas two of the former year, that were of Citizens should be sent into Tuscany, and the two, which the Consul Sulpius had conducted, should be led into France. Moreover that he should have the government of France, and the leading of the Legions there, whom that Cof, would appoint, whose lot it was to have Italy for his Province.

Into Tuscany was C. Calpurnius sent with Commission after the term of the Praetorship expired, to have his full jurisdiction to continue for a year. Likewise to Q. Fulvius was intrusted the keeping of Cas-pus, and his rule prorogued for another year. The armies, as well of Citizens as of Allies, were by commandment of the Senate abridged and made less: so that for two legions there should be but one, and that consisting of five thousand footmen, and three hundred horsemen: that they should be discharged of old soldiers, who had served long: that of Allies there should be left seven thousand foot, and three hundred horse: with the same respect and consideration of service in disbanding the old footmen. As for Cn. Fulvius the Consul of the former year, he ruled the same Province of Apulia still, without any alteration of his forces: only his government was continued unto him another year. And P. Sulpius his Colleague, was commanded to send away all his army, only the masters and payers excepted. Likewise order was given that to so soon as the new Consul was arrived and landed in the Province of Sicily, the army there, which was commanded by M. Cornelius, should be sent out of Sicily. Into L. Cincius the Praetor was assigned the legions that remained after the defeat at Cannae, for to keep Sicily in order, and those two to legions. And as many legions were appointed for P. Manlius Vulso the Praetor, to go into Sardinia, even those whereof L. Cornelius had the leading in the same Province the former year. As for the legions of Citizens, the Consuls were enjoined to levy and enroll them so, as they entertained no noisier of all those who had served in the army, either of M. Claudius or M. Valerius, or Fulvius: nor exceeded the number that year of one and twenty legions of the Romans. When those Acts were passed in the Senate-house, the Consuls called their several Provinces, Sicily, and the Armado fell to Marcellus: Italy and the war against Annibale, to Lucius.

This let that fell to Marcellus so struck the Sicilians dead, (who stood in the presence of the Consuls, looking for the effect of the lottery) as if Sycany had been lost again in such sort, as their pitull amotions, and their wofull plaints, for the present turned all mens eyes upon them, and none after ministered cause of much speach and talk, For they were about to all the Senators: some one to another in poor and vile array, protesting, "That if Marcellus came amongst them again as L. Denteus, they would not only for take every man his own country where he was born, but also abandon on the whole Island of Sicily: complaining that without any deed of their parts, herefore he had been cruelly bent against them, and his heart was irreconsiderable: and what should he now do in his choler, and knowing that the Sicilians came to Rome of purpose to make complaints of him? The Island were better (say they) to be on a light fire to burn with Etna, or to be all a very lea, than thus to be expos'd as a prey unto a mortal enemy, for to be devour'd. Their grievous moans and pitiful complaints of the Sicilians first carried to the houses of the Nobles and great men of the City, and there taken up and much talk'd of by many, whiles some pried the Sicilians, others envied Marcellus, spread abroad at length for far, until they came to the Council-Table. And the Consuls were dealt withal, to propose it unto the Senate, that they might exchange their Provinces one for another. Then Mar-

After the Romans, and turning to Annibal, were odiouf and bafeiful unto them, For which cann and nothing else Hieronymus was by the hands of the chieftains of their young gallants, as it were by a publike decree of the flare made away and killed, and the nobleft of their young gentlemen, to the number of feventy, confipled to murder Hippocrates and Epicides who being dif- appointed and put by the effecting of their detignment, through the delay of Marcellus, (who at the time before appointed, came not with his power to Syracus/) were appealed, their inten- ded plot revealed, and they all by those tyrants puro death, And yet to speak a truth, Marcellus himfelf was he that gave the first occafion of the tyrannizing of Hippocrates and Epicides, in that more cruelly he facked and fliled the Leonine. But from that time forward, the Nobles Ef Synaffe never ceased to come in unto Marcellus, & promised to deliver the City into his hands, whenever he pleaded. But he, forsooth, at first, ftood upon those terms, that he would raider force it by aduart but afterwards, feeing he could not effect that his purpofe, notwithftanding he had worked all the devices he could, both by fœ: land; he made choice of one STATES a copper- smith & Meritus Spaniard, to have them to work and confive the betraying of the City, rather than of the principal of the Syracufian Nobility, who had to often offired that service, and never yet would it be accepted & all. It was because he might pretend some colourable cause of justice, to proceed in all rigour against the moft ancient allies of the people of Rome, for to malifice them, and make spoil of all that they had: See cafe that Hieronymus had not reverted and gone to An- nibal, but the whole people and Senat of Syracus: appolle, that the Syracufians in general, by M a publike confent had flung the gates againft Maccellus, & not their Tyrants Hippocrates and Epicides, when they had the Syracufians fure enough under their own hands: Say they had warred againft the people Rome with as lightfull and cankerid malice as the Carthaginians do, and ever did: what greater hotlihity could Marcellus possibly have exercifed againft them more than he bath unlefs he would destroy and rafe the City to the very ground? Surely he bath left nothing in Synca, but the bare walls, the naked and empty houses of the City, the temples and chapells of the gods defaced & broke open, the gods themselves, with all the rich & gorgeous ornamens are carried away. Many a man is fpooled and robbed of his goods, in fuch fort, as having nothing left him but the bare foil: they are not able when all is gone, with his leavings to main- tain themselves, and fatisfy their wives and children. They were humble petitioners therefore, and impliant suiters unto the LL. of the Senate, to take order, that reputation might be made into the rightfull owners, if not of all (for that is impossible) yet of fo much at least, as was to be found, and might be truly owned again.

After thefe and fuch like complaints, Lettus the Conful commanded them to go forth of the Concill-Houfe to the end that the LL. might be confulted with, and deliver their opinions concerning their demands. Nay my (quoth Marcellus) let them (ay till rather, that I may answer to their very faces: feeing my LL.our cafe and condition is fo hard, who are war and fight for you, that we my have those to contend againft us, and be our accusers, whom we have conquered and bribed by martial arms: Let it even be to that two Cities, to wit, Caput and Synca, won this year, may conveit judicially both their conquerors, the one Felicius the other Mar¬cellus. The six and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

A proceeding against enemies: but what these men have deferred to suffer. If they were not enemies, nor to be reputed, then it mattered not, and it had been all one, either now or in the life time of King Hiero, to have forced Syracuse. But if it appear, that they have revolted, that they have evill treated our Embassadors, threatened to lay violent hands, and to run upon them with word and force of arms, that they have manured their walls, and shut their gates upon us; that they have maintained the army of the Carthaginians against us: who can be grieved and offended, if they have suffered as enemies, who fluck not heart to offer all holliety whatsoever? Rejected the Nobles of Syracuse when they would have delivered the City into my hands? And made I more account of Sopher, and Mercurius the Spaniard, and thought them worthy to be trusted in, in such a matter? Ye are not, I am sure, the meanest of the Sicilians, that thus to reproach others with baseflift of fortune: Who was it of all you here, that permitted to open me the gates of, that undertook to receive my armed soldiers into the City? Nay, nay, ye have and made it in your heart, who have to do, and even in this place cannot forbear to give them hard terms, and revile them: to unlike it is, that you your selves ever meant to have done any such thing. Even this project condition and base calling of theirs, my L.L. which these men twist them with, is a manifest, and a most evident argument, that I refused none, that was willing to do good service into our state and Common-wealth. At the very first, before I laid siege unto Syracuse, I declared by all means to have peace; one while lending Embassadors unto them, other whiles going in person to parle with them. Afterwards, seeing that without all reverence of Embassadors, they shamed not to offer them abuse; without regard of my self, they designed me no answer when I came to the gates, and conferred with their chief Nobility: after much travel, and inpatient times, outstayed both by Land and Sea, at length by mere force and hot allure, I became Master and Lord of Syracuse. Now as touching that which hath befallen unto them, since they were overcome, and lost their City, I would suppose they had more reason, and further cauter to make their mean, and complain unto Embasal and the Carthaginians, those that are likewise conquered than before the Senator of the people of Rome their Conqueror; for mine own sake, my L.L. if I had ever meant to deny and disavow the spoiling and taking of Syracuse, and not to lant it for when I had done, I would never have been till advised, as to beauty and adorn the City of Rome with the polibraries, And what I have given or forgiven unto any particular person, I am assured that I may well Jullify and show the blame, both by the law of war, and also by the detest of every one. Now, my L.L. whether ye will approve and ratify my doings or no, it concerneth and toucheth the Commonwealth rather than to my self: my part I have done, and discharged my duty faithfully. It much importeth now the state, that by revealing (as it were) and disavowing mine actions, ye make not your other Generals from henceforth, to be more slack and backward in the like employment. To conclude my L.L. since ye have heard both my self and the Sicilians speak our minds face to face; we will all together go out of this Temple, that in my absence the Senate may more frankly speak to the point, and deliver their opinions. Thus the Sicilians were dismissed, and he himself went forth also to the Capitol, for to take a levy of soldiery.

The other Consul in the mean time, put to question the demands of the Sicilians before the L.L., Much canvassing a long while, and discourse there was of the matter, and divers opinions passed. Many of the Senators following T. Manlius Torquatus the head and principal man, that maintained a side, were of this mind, that they should have made war against the tyrants the common enemies as well to the Sicilians, as to the State of Rome. And as for the City, it was (say they) rather recovered and received, than won by force: and being to received, it was to be re-established in her own ancient laws and freedom, and not after it was so wearied with miserable servitude, to be cleared and affiected with war upon it. But between the warring of the City, and the Roman General of the other, a most beautiful and noble City, standing in the midst (as a prize and reward for the winner) is undone by the means; even that City which sometime had been the garner (as it were) and the Treasure house of the people of Rome by the munificent liberality and bounty whereof, by whose rich presents and good marriages, our City many a time and oft, and yet at late dates in this Punick war, hath been relieved and admonished. If King Hiero should arise again from the dead and come among us, Hiero (they) the most faithful maintainer of the Roman state, with what face could we shew unto him without Syracusae or Rome? When he should come to one of his own country, half rated and wholly despised; and on the other side, coming to Rome, in the very centre of the state, and at the gate, should behind the spoils of his own City? Notwithstanding these and such the speeches call out among them, to procure ill will and hatred to the Consul, and to move pity and compassion to the Sicilians, yet the L.L. of the Senate in favour of Marcellus, agreed upon a milder decree:

C and eras. That whatever he had done, either during the war, or after the conquest, should be rated and allowed for good: Item, for the time to come, the Senate would take order and provide for the good of the Sicilians, and give the Consul Legum special charges, to have regard of the welfare of that City, so far forth, as might not be prejudicial to the state of Rome. There were two Senators sent into the Capitol to the Consul, to request him to repair again unto the assembly of the Senate; and after the Sicilians also were admitted into the place, their act and decree stood as was openly read. The Embassadors had good words given them, and were dismissed: whereupon they tell down prostrate at the feet of Marcellus the Consul, becometh him to pardon that which they had spoken, either to bewail, or to censure their calamity; and Core Hecate both them in particular, and the City of Syracuse in general, unto his merciful protection. After this, the Comitium with gracious words licenced them to depart.

When the Sicilians had their dispatch, the Campans had audience given them in the Senate; and as their speech was more lamentable, so the caustic was heavier, and harder to be digested; for neither could they themselves deny, but that they deserved condict punishement: nor Tyrants had they any, upon whom they might lay the blame. But they thought they had suffered enough for their foes already, in that so many of their Senators died by poison, and so many left their heads.

Some few of their nobility and but a few remaining yet alive, who as they were not touched in confidence, nor so fatal, as to lay violent hands upon themselves, to the Conqueror in his furious wrath, as judged them not worthy of death; they therefore made humble suit for themselves, their wives and children, to obtain freedom, and to enjoy some part of their own goods, being as they were, mere citizens of Rome, and most of them by affinity and near kindred, upon mutual and eternal marriages, linked in alliance and blood to the Romans. After that they also were willing to void out of the Senat house; for a while, there grew some question and doubt, whether Q. Fulvius should be sent for from Capua (for presently upon the taking of the City, Claudius the Comital died) that this matter might be argued and discussed in the presence of the General himself, like as the other had been reasoned of and debated between Marcellus and the Sicilians. But afterwards when they saw in the Senate house M. Attilius, and C. Fulvius, the brother of Fulvius; both his Lieutenants: likewise Q. Minucius, and L. Verres Philus, Lieutenants unto Claudius, who had been prefect in all actions, and were eye-witnesses of every thing; and besides, were unwilling that either Fulvius should be called away from Capua, or the Campans longer delayed: M. Attilius Regulus, who of all them that had been at the service of capua, was of greatest authority and reputation, being demanded his opinion, spake in this wise.

"I take it (quoth he) when Capua was newly won, I was one of Council with the Comituls there, when question was asked, and enquiry made. Whether any one Comitius had derogated well of us and our Common-well. And found it was, that two women only, viz. Popa Oppia, born in Atella, but dwelling then at Capua, and Flaccus Clavius, sometime a common trumpeter and curator, were well willers unto us. The former of these twain daily sacrificed for the welfare, life, and victory of the Romans; the other, secretly sustained the poor and needy Roman captives with food and victuals. As for all other Campans, from the highest to the lowest, they were no better affected unto us, than the Carthaginians. And even thence, who were beheld by Quintus Fulvius, suffered death, not because they were more faulty than others, but for that they were of greater mark and calling than the rest. Now, that the Senate should decide the caustic of any Campans, who are enfranchised denizens of Rome, without a grant from the people, I see not how it can be. For in our fore-fathers time the like case was of the Satrians that rebelled: and then M. Attilius, a Tribun of the Commons, first put up a bill, and the Commons afterwards passed it, namely, That the Senate might have power and authority, to give their opinion, and determine of the Satrians. Therefore I am of mind, that we deal with the Tribunes of the Commons, that one or more of them, prefer a bill unto the Commons, by virtue whereof we may be authorized to let down some order for the Campans. Then L. Attilius, a Tribun of the Commons, by leave and advice of the Senate, proposed unto the Commons a bill in this form and manner. Whereas the Campans, Atellans, Calatins, and Sabellans, who have yielded themselves unto Fulvius the Pro-confual, to be at the pleasure and devotion of the people of Rome: all that also which they have surrendered, together with themselves, as well their territory as their City, as all menots both faced and prophaned, their necessary implements, and all other things whatsoever, I demand your will and pleasure, O Quiairs, what shall be done with the premises? The Commons after deliberation, gave their voices to the said bill in this form. Our will and pleasure is, that whatsoever the Senators, who now are set in Council, or the most part of you think, good and determinate, shall stand for just and lawful. Upon this grant or Act of the Commons, the Senate by a decree awarded unto Oppia N. and Clavia, half their own goods and liberty: and moreover if they were defirous to crave further reward at the Senate hand, they were bid to repair unto Rome. For every family and several house of the Campans, there were special acts and decrees made, all which to repeat and rehearse, would not quit the labour. Some had their goods confiscate: themselves, their Children and Wives were to be sold, excepting those their Children which were wedded, before that they came under the subjection of the people of Rome. Others were to be clapt up in Prison, until farther order were taken for them hereafter. Moreover, of some Campans they made distillation by valuation of their wealth, whether their goods were to be confiscate or no. All their beasts and cattle which were taken, save Horses; all their bond-slaves, but males fourteen years of age and upward, all moveable goods also which were not annexed or failed to the foil, they awarded for to be retorted to the true owners. All Campans, Atellans, Calatins, Sabellans, excepting those, who either themselves, or whole parents took part and sided with the enemies, they judged to be free: provided always, that none of them were either Free-denizens of Rome, or of Latium. Item, it was enacted, that none of all them who had been at Capua whiles the gates were shut, should remain either in the City or territory of Capua, within a certain day prefixed: but should have a place set out unto them for to dwell in, on the further side of Tiberius, so it were not upon the very bank close unto Tyber.
Tybr. As for those that during the time of war had been neither at Caput nor in any other City of Campan, which revolted from the people of Rome, they should be removed to inhabit on this side the River Lyric between it and Rome: but such as were burned and palled to the Romans side, before that Annual came unto Caput, they should be transplanted on the hither side of Vetus the River: provided, that none of them should possess either house or Land within fifteen miles of the Sea. As concerning them who were displaced and confined to inhabit beyond the Tybr, neither they nor their heirs and successors for ever, should purchase and hold house or Land in any place, but in the territory either of Vetis, Sutrium, or Nepetium: but so, as they exceeded not the limit of five hundred Acres of ground. As touching the goods and chattels of all the Senators, of such as had been Magistrates in Caputa, Asella, or Calatia, they were awarded that sale should be made thereof in Caputa. As for those that were free born, and whole bodies were to be told, they should be sent to Rome, and there set a-sale. Finally, the Images and Statues of bulls, which were said to have been won and taken from the enemies, whether they were sacred or profane, they referred to the Colledge of the Prellis and Prelates, to determine thereof at their discretion. Thus the gave the Campanes their dispatch, and fent them away much worse spared for these theacres, than they were when they came first to Rome. And now they complained no more of the cruel proceedings of Q. Fulvius against them, but blamed the iniquity and unjust dealing of the very Gods, and their own cursed fortune together.

After the Sicilians and Campanes were dismiffed, there was a mutter taken: and when an army was levied and enrolled, there began some question and reasoning about the mariners and Gaffles to furnish the Gallies. For the accomplishment whereof, when the Consilis could neither raise men now, nor yet find mony at that time in the Chamber of the City, for to prefile and hire them, and pay their wages withal: they published an edif, that private men according to the rate and proportion in the Subsidy book, out of all orders, degrees, and companies, should at a certain time find Rowers at their own charges, and maintain them with meat and money for thirty days. Upon which edif and Proclamation, all men to grumble and muttered, and were so highly discontented and angered, that they wanted an head and Captain, rather than matter and occasion of a mutiny and insurrection: giving out, That the Consilis had taken a course, and were in the very train to plague, undo, and destroy the Commons of Rome, like as they had already the Sicilians and the Campanes. For thus many years they have been pilled, polled, clean spent and confum'd with exaction of tribute; and had nothing left them but the bare ground, and the same lying waste and untill'd. As for their Houses upon their Lands, the enemie had burn'd: their servants and bounds, such as should husband and till their grounds, the Common-wealth had bereaved them of: one whiles buying them up to the war, for some small piece of mony: other whiles levying and profling them to the Seas to be Gally-slaves, for a thing of nothing. A man could not to soon get one bras farthing, or single silver denier before-hand, but it went by and by either for Gally-pay, or for yearly Tribute. And to give that now which they had not, they might never be brought by any force or for any mans commandament whatsoever. Let them fell and make an hand of their goods, impiion and punish their bodies too, when all is gone besides; seeing there is nothing left them to ransom and redeem the same.

Again. Those and such like words were not only mutter'd in huggermugger, but uttered also and given out in broad terms even in the market place and before the Consilis, by the multitude that flock'd and gathered together in exceeding great numbers: in such sort, as the Consilis were not able with all that ever they could do, to appease the mutiny, neither by sharp rebukes, nor fair words and comfortable speeches. Then they said, that they would give and allow them three days reft for to think and consider of these matters: which they themselves bestowed wholly and employed in taking a view and survey of their goods, and making dispatch and rendezvous thereof out of the way. The next day the Consilis called the Senate together to confult about the supply of Rowers and Gally-slaves: where, after much debating and arguing, that the Commons had good reason to make demand; at length the drift of all their speech was this, That whether it were right or wrong, the burden must lie on privit mens shoulders, there was no remedy but for seeing there was no mony in the common chest, how should Mariners and Rowers else be gotten and levied? And without Armmdoses, how possibly should either Sicily be held still in possession, or Philip be kept out of Italy? or the seas coasts of Italy remain in safety and security? In these diversities and difficulties the Council being perplexed, and to seek for remedies, and whiles every mans wits was in the way collated, as if they were bemused and flown cold: Then Lætus the Consil, As the Magistrate (as he) goeth before the Senate in place of honor, and the Senate likewise before the common weight of burdens and dignity, so they sought in all difficulties and hard occurrences to undergo the weightiest burdens first, and be the Foremen and Leaders in all dangerous adventures whatsoever. For if a man would enjoy his

The Speech of Lætus the Consil.

1. The fix, that be Senators, bring abroad in common all the gold, all the silver, all the dracan coin that we have, so as every man referreings only for himself, his wife and children: and a little tablet or jewel for his son, as a pendant to hang about his neck. Also let all them that have wives or daughters, retain still one ounce weight of gold, and one pound of silver: and as many as have been born of State, and eaten in the Ivory Chair, keep still the trappings and capitation of their Horse; and two pound weight a piece, the one of gold, the other of silver; for to have a Salt-sellar, and a little boll or cup, to sacrifice and offer unto the Gods withall. As for the rest of the Senators, let us leave them but one pound weight of silver, and no gold at all, and five thousand * fine in coin, to every householder a piece. * All other gold, silver, and dracan money being, let us forthwith bring abroad and present unto the Triumvirs or publick bankers, before that we make or enact any decree of Seisat: to the end, that our good example in this voluntary benevolence and contribution, and our earnest endeavour to help the Common-well, may stir up and provoke the hearts and affections, first of those that are by calling Gentlemen and Knights of Rome, and then forward the rest of the commons, to imitate and follow us with some emulation. This is the only means which we that are Conuls have thought upon and devised, after much talk and conference together. Set to therefore, my masters, in the name of God, and lead the way: God will bless your good beginnings. So long as the City standeth on foot, and holdeth up the head, no man need to fear his private face; but it shall do well enough. Go the publick to wreak once, and decay, let no man ever think to save his own. All the whole house liked so well of their motions, that not only they gave their accord and consent thereto, but over and beside, yielded hearty thanks unto the Conuls for their good advice and counsel. When the Senat was dismissed, every man for himself brought forth his gold, his silver, and dracan money, and laid all together in common: and that with such speed, that several who could go before another, and have his name entered first in the publick Rolles and Registers: as neither the foresaid Triumvirs were able to receive it fast enough, as it was tendered unto them: nor the ordinary Clerks and Notaries to let it down in writing, and take note thereof accordingly. This consent and agreement of the Senators, the Knights and Gentlemen of Rome in their place and calling seconced; and the commons for their parts were not behind. So without any constraint of law, without edict, without any exhorstion made by the Magistrate, the common-weal wanted neither Rowers for to furnish the armades, nor money to pay the Rowers. And thus when all things were provided necessary for the wars, the Conuls went forth to their several Provinces.

Never was there any time of this war, wherein Carthaginians and Romans together, had more tryal of the alternative and variable change of fortune: never hang they more in equal balance, between fair hope and terrible danger. The Romans, in their Provinces salted both of sweet and sour. In Spain on the one side, they sped ill and loft: in Sicily on the other side, they sped well and won: so as their sorrow was interlaced still and mingled with joy. Also in Italy, the battle of Tarentum turned to their woe and damage: but the keeping of the Calle there with the garrison, beyond all their hope and expectation, brought them joy and comfort for their sorrow. Also, their fudain fright and fear, for the siege and downfall of the City of Rome, was talved and eured again within a few days after, by the forcing and winning of Capua: and all that had been, was mingled and mingled into mirth and gladness. The affairs also beyond Sea, were check'd with interchangeable turns and courtesies. Philip became their enemy in an ill time, and when they had little need thereof. Contrary-wise, the Attolians and Attolus the King of Africa the less, proved to be their new friends and loving allies: whereby even fortune, seemed to smile on the Romans, and by that overture, promised as it were, unto them the Empire of the East. Sembly the Carthaginians, as they lost Capua, so they won Tarentum, and made a saving game of it. In like manner, as they took no small pride and glory, in coming to the walls of Rome without resistance; so they were danted and disinmnd again, that this their enterprize took no better effect in the end: and held themselves much disgraced and dishonoured, that whilsts they fated themselves before one gate of Rome, there was an army of Romans led forth at another, and sent into Spain. And even in Spain also, the greater hope men had there, that upon the death of two so noble and valiant Generals, and the defeat of two so puissant armies, the war was come to a final end, and the Romans driven from thence for ever: the more fright it was, and the greater grief and vexation they conceived again, when by the valour of L. Martius a tumultuary Captain, chosen in hal the knew not how, their former victors turned to vanities, and came to nought nothing. Thus fortune was indifferent, and all things doubtful and wavering in suspenso, both on the one side and the other. Their hope all one as it was at first: their fear, the same still, neither more nor less: So as between hope and fear, they fasted, as if the war at this time were new to begin. Annual above all other things, was vexed to the heart, that Capua being more hotly and eagerly assaulted by the Romans, than manfully and faithfully defended by him, had diverted and turned away the hearts of many States of Italy from him. For neither was he able to hold them all with sufficient garrisons, unless he would dismember into many small portions, and mingle by piece-meal his army; which to do then, was no good policy: nor be it thought it late and good, to withdraw his garrisons from thence, & leave the indelity of his allies at liberty, either to depend upon fickle hope, or to sway with fudain fear. And as he was by nature covetous and cruel, Aly minded) he resolved at length upon this course, to make spoil of those Cities which he was not able to keep, and to leave them wast and empty for the enemy. This disposition was not so dishonorable and shameful in the first enterprise, but it proved as bad and mortally to himself in the effect and conclusion. For he left the hearts clean, not only of those that were the parties grieved, and suffered these indignities, but also of all others besides. The present calamity and loss touched but some few: but the precedent and example reached to many more. Neither was the Roman Coun his behind hand for his part, to follicuce and found those Cities, from whence he left none light appear, and any hope to gain them upon him.

There were in Salapia two noble men above the rest, Dafins and Blabis. Dafins was friend to Amabilis Blabis (as far as he might with safety) effectually and favoured the Romans. And by enter-

of the people a good way, Blabis went in hand again with Dafins, and solicited him to deliver the City to the Romans. With that, Dafins (as if the matter had been too apparent) tried out and laid, that he ballots not to break upon him and move him, even in the presence and light of Amabilis, for to pacify and betray the City. Amabilis and all they that were there present, gave little credit unto Dafins: and the more audacious the thing it self was, the less likely it was, the less likely it was, the less likely hood it carried with it of a trust. Every man supposed verily, it was nothing but emulation, envy, and enfeated malice, that caused Dafins to charge upon him that crime, which because there was no witness to the contrary, he might untruly devise and more freely enforce against him. And so for that time, they were both discharged the court. But Blabis never gave over to follow still this bold enterprize, but best still upon this one point, the seeing how good and commodious the thing would be, both to themselves in private, and to their country in common, until he had wrought him to, and won him to grant, that the Carthaginian garrison, (and those were Numidians) together with the City Salapia, should be rendred unto Marcellus. But without much bloodshed they could not possibly be thus betrayed and delivered: for they were the most hardy and valiant bottlemen by far, of all the Carthaginian army. Wherefore, albeit they were taken on a sudden unprovided, and had no use of Horaces within the City, yet with such weapons, as in such a sudden tumult and uprore they could catch and come by, first they delayed and gave the venture to break through and escape away: and when they knew that they could by no means save themselves and get forth, they bought it out to the last manfully, even unto death: so as there were not of them above fifty left alive, and came into the hands of the enemies. And surely, the loss of this corner of Horlaen, was a greater dammage unto Amabilis, than the forgoing of Salapia: for never from that day forward, had Amabilis the upper hand in cavalry, which was the only service whereby ever before he was prevailed for.

Much about the same time the Castle of Tarentum was fiercely distress'd for want of victuals, and hardly could endure and hold out any longer. The only hope that the Roman garrison had, which lay there, and the Captain thereof M. Livius the Contiale of the Castle, was in the provision lent out of Sicily. For the safe convey whereof, along the coast of Italy, there ride at anchor a fleet wellmen of twenty sail before Rhetium. The Admiral of this fleet appointed to wait there vio's from time to time, was one Decius Quinatus, a man of obscure birth and base parentage, bowdew, for many worthy acts and feats of arms, much renowned in martial glory.

At the first he had the charge but of five ships, whereof two of the greatest, which were three banked Gallies, were allowed him by Marcellus: afterward, upon his good service, when he had born him till bravely in many conflicts, he had three more comminuted unto him, and those were of five banks of oars, until at last himself, by calling upon the confederate Cities, as Rhégium, VeLED, and Pallaen, for the ships due by covenant unto the people of Rome, he had made a prty Armado, as is above laid, of twenty sail. As this fleet had disanchored and was gone from Régium, Democrats with the like Armado for number of Tarentum ships, encountered almost five leagues from the City of Tarentum, at a port called Sacrario. It formed at that time, that the Roman Admiral, little looking for any battle, came forth under sail only, but about Cerone and Sibari, he had furnished his ships with Rowers also, and to his fleet for the bigness and calmer of the Veils, was well appointed, and sufficiently armed and manned. And even then it happened at one time, that with the bottommost wind lay, and the enemies also were within heaving, so as they had scarce time enough to fit each sacking, to make reay their Rowers, and to get in order their fighting men against a skirmish that was to meet toward. There was not lightly seen a greater to fight, fought more hotly and fiercely between two so valiant Armados that afforded one another, than between those small fleets. For why, the battle was for a greater matter, than all their ships came to. The Tarentins maintained the fight more eagerly, because they were desirous to recover their Cattle out of the Romans hands, as they had done their City, after one 100 years almost, during which time, they had been out of the possession thereof: hoping thereby, if they could be masters of the Sea once by some fortunate and victorious battle, to cut off and intercept all hope of virtuals from the enemies. The Romans on the other side beheld themselves as sufficiently and by keeping the possession of the Cattle, all the world might see, that Tarentum was not lost by force, clean strength and valour, but betrayed by flesh and treachery. So they joined the battle from both parts, and ran affront one another, with the beaks and flams of their prowes, and neither side bowing amin forward, nor suffered their enemy to part or go side from them, until they cloed and grapled their ships together, by the means of iron hooks like bands, and to neer they buckled, in hot and furious fight, that not only they discharged short alcoone against another, but also they coped together (as it were) hoot to hoot, at band strokes with fword fight. Their prowes and fore-ships fluck grapled together, while the poops and hind-decks were driven about with contrary oars of the adverse part. So neer and so thick withal did the ships and within to narrow a room, that scarce one dart light into the water in vain, and did no harm. With their beak-heads they staid one another, as it had been on land fight, and so close they were, that the soldiers might pace out of one ship into another, as they fought. Howbeit, two ships there were above all the rest, that maintained a notable fight, and in the vanguard and forestem of the battle, invloled one another most furiously. In that of the Romans was Quintus himself in person, and in that of the Tarentins, was one: Nicus, remarried Perso, a man not only out ofius into the Romans, for the publick quarrel between both states, but also maliciously bent, upon a private theft K and rancour, as drinking with that faction, which had betrayed Tarentum to Amathus. This Nicus elboing Quintus both neeting and also encouraging his men withal, charged them unsawares, and ran him quite through with a partian, who was not so soon fall forward headlong upon the fore-deck, armour and all bat the Tarentin following the train of his victory, and seeing the ship divided and troubled for the loss of their leader, hamently came forward, and boorded her, laid about him manfully, and put by the enemies out of his way, until the Tarentins were masters of the prow and fore-cattle. While the Romans had much ado (so they troubled they were and thrust together disorderly) to defend and keep the poop and hind deck; with that, another gally of the enemies appeared on a sudden, and charged the hind part, so the Roman ship in the midst between both, was boorded on every side, and taken. Whereupon all the rest were greatly terrified, seeing the Admiral-ship was won by the enemy: and they fled on all hands. Some were sunk in the deep Sea, some made hails with their oars, and deserted to the land, but none were a prize and prey to the Thurins and Muramonins. But of the Hulls and Caricks, which were fraught with victual, and followed after, very few there were that fell into the hands of the enemies the rett shifting and turning their tails cros, this ways and that ways, according to the inconstancy of the wind, recovered the main Sea.

But about Tarentum at the same time, their fortune was nothing so good. For whereas there went out of the Town upon a four thousand men a foraging, for to purvey corn, Livius, Contable of the Cattle and Captain of the garrison, lyng his time (as he waited ever for all opportunities) made out of the said Cattle 2000 armed loudiers, under the leading of C. Perius a valourous and indomitable man, who let upon the Tarentins stragling out of order, and disperset in wandering wife over the fields; and after he had followed a long time the execution, killing them here and there as he encountered them; the rest, which were but few left of so many, he chased to the Town: for they made hails in great fear thisibe, and were let in at the gates standing half flout, for fear left at the same random the Town should have been lost. So the Tarentins and Romans, whom they had made the reckoning, put up all on even hand. For the Romans were winners by land, the Tarentins at sea: and both of them disappointed alike of their hope of corn, which was pretended to their eyes but they never tasted thereon.

At the same time Laevinus the Conful, after a good part of the year was gone about, arrived in Sicily, greatly expected and looked for, as well by the old allies as the new; and the half thing of all other and most important, he suppoed, was together with this new peace, to fellte and compose the State of Symna, to much dorgered and out of frame. After that, he led his legions to Agrigentum, where only there remained the relics of war; which City was kept by a strong garrison of Carthaginians. There fortune favoured his other designis, Hanno changed to be the General over the Carthaginians, but he wholly relied and reposed all his hope in Mutilius and the Numidians. This Mutilius had raged all over Sicily at pleasure, and raft bootees out of the territories and Lands of the Florulians, and by no force or policy could he be intercepted of his passage back to Agrigentum, nor yet be pinned within the City, but that he would illt forth whenever he liked. This glory of his, because now it checked (as it were) the fame an honour of the General, turned the man strength to dilapidus and danger. So as what good service ever was achieved, it was never well taken by Hanno, nor joyously accepted, in regard of the person, who was a prick always in his eye. Whereupon in the end he gave away the Captainship of Mutilius from himself, and beftowed it upon his son: thinking, that together with his government and command, he should lose all his authority and repuration also among the Numidians. But it fell out otherwise. For the more that he was in disgrace and disfavour with Hanno, the greater grew the old favour and love of the Numidians toward him. Neither
A. Neither could he himselil endure any longer the unworthy wrong and indignity offered unto him: and therefore in revenge he presently dispatched certain secret messenger unto Leptis, with credeiit, that he would betray and deliver Agrigentum into his bands. By the mediation of these couriers, there past sufficient security and assurance between them: and the matter being concluded, the manner also of contriving the plot, was agreed upon. Whereas therefore the Numidians were professed, and had the guard of that garrilion toward the sea: after they had driven out the old warders from thence, or killed them, they let in the Romans at the same gate into the City, who were sent of purpose, according to the former agreement. And when they marched up into the midst of the City, even to the market place, with banner displayed, and with great sound and noise: Hamma supposing it was nothing else, but a sedition applying of the Numidians (like as they had done sometimes before,) came forth so as to appease and stay a rumour and commotion. But discovering a greater multitude afar off than the Numidians were and hearing withal that the Romans to thout, with the manner whereof his ears had been well acquainted before time, he took him to his heels ere he came within the dart-shot. And being let out at a back postern gate, asking with him Epictetus, he recovered with some few other the Seaside, where, a good way past, they light upon a small rack or pincers: and leaving Sicily to the enemies, for which there had been much strife to many years together, they passed over into Africk. The multitude besides both of Carthaginians and Sicilians, without any skirmish either begun or intended, fled like blind men they will not whither: and finding no ways made up, and no passage forth, they were miserably slain and beaten pieces about the gates. Leptos being professed of the Town, called all the chief men and rulers of the City, to be beaten with rods, and to lose their heads: all the rest together with the pilage he held in port-side, and the money that was maltreated in it, he sent to Rome. Where the news of this misfortune of the Agrigentins was blown over Sicily: all at once returned Roman and Asinbal fort all. For in short space there were 20 Towns betrayed and yielded, six forced by captious, and to the number of 40 voluntarily surrendered to the devotion and protection of the Romans. The principal noble men of which States, after that the Consuls had either rewarded or punished according to their several merits, and compelled the Sicilians generally to lay by arms and weapons, and to take them eloses to the plough, for to ear, till, and low their grounds; to the end that the land might bring forth fruit, not only to subsist and maintain the natural inhabitants thereof, but also to tale the price of corn and victuals in the City of Rome, and throughout all Italy, like as it had done many times before: he transmitted over with him into Italy a rabble and damned crew of unruly people from Agrigentum. Some four thousand there were of them, a confounded multitude of all sorts, a very much math and mark, doting of vile and wretched persons, most of them Outlaws, Bankrupts, and notorious malefactors, in danger of death by the laws of their Cities where they lived. And being fled their countries, some for one cause, some for another, they chance all upon like fortune to resort themselves (as commonly birds of a feather will flock together,) and at Agrigentum, they made choise like outlaws, to live by robbing and poaching: and this was then only proselation and trade. Leptos thought it no good policy to leave behind him these fellows in an island, which began but now upon new peace to kind and unite again; for fear lest they would mutiny, matter of innovation and change; and besides, there was some good use of them among the Kephys, for to forage and rove about the triestian country: for such they found in need of, and had laid for a company which were acquainted with the reviving and healing. And to this year made an end of the war in Sicily.

P. Scipio I. Deputy and General in Spain, having in the prime and beginning of Spring put his ships to Sea and set them adriu, and by an edict illuminated all the sides of the allies to repair to the Reklesestam at Terracina, gave order and commandment, that as well the ships of war as of charge and burden, should from thence set forward, and shew themselves at the mouth of the River Tiber. And after he had given direction and charge, that the legions from out of their winter barracks, should there meet together, himself accompanied with five thousand of his allies put himself on his journey to his main army. Being thinner come, he thought it good to make some speech to the old soldiers especially, as many as remained alive after to great defeats and overthrowers, and when he had assembled them all together to an audience, in this wife he take up unto them. "Never was there new General before me, that could by good right, and in regard of desert, render thanks unto his soldiers before he had employed them, and made them fresh of their good service. But as for me, before I ever came within sight of this Province, before I entered my government and saw the camp, fortune had obliged me, and made me beholden unto you. First, for your kindness and zealous affection to my father and to mine uncle, both while they lived, and when they were dead. Secondly in that when the possession of this Province was lost; after to great foils and overthrowers, ye have of your valiance and valor recovered the same again, and kept it close to the midst of the people of Rome, and my self, the next successor in place of sovereign rule and command. But I must now set up a purpose and present resolution, by the leave, favour, and power of the Gods, not to much to hold the possession our allies and armed in Spain: but to follow the last business, that they may have no bearing nor trade at all there: and since the thing that we go about, is not to land keeping the bank of Herul, for to stop the passage of the enemy; but to give the utmost attempt to pillage our selves by force yea, and there unto to transport the war over with us into his own country, and to come home unto him. I fear me greatly, left this will seem unto some of you a greater detraction, and more andsacrous enterprise of mine, than may eithc late and not with the fresh remembrance of those late defeats, or, fland well with my young and uncircum cision. The foils and unfortunate lost branch in Spain, can be of no man in the World forgotten later than of my self, worse father, worse uncle, were within the space of so days there flain, to the end that sorrow upon sorrow, funeral upon funeral, one mouful death after another, should unfortunately be heaped upon our house and family. But as this de-sole fate and defeat almost of all my house and name (wherein I only, in manner, am left alive of my race) woundeth my heart and makes it bleed, as often as I think of it: to the publick fort-tune and virtue of the Common-wealth, reviveth my spirit again, and will not suffer me to de-pair totally of this State: considering the destiny and Providence of the Gods, I whereby it is a thing giveth unto us, and our luck hath ever been, that howsoever we have received overthrows in all great wars and dangerous battaies, yet in the end, we have gone away with the victorie. I omit to speak of old examples, of Forcina the Gauls, and Surnites: and I will begin at the Punic wars. How many armadde, and fleets, how many brave Captains, how many valiant and puflibant armies were there lost, and misfortuned, during the former? And what should I say of this in our days? In all the defeats and overthrowes, I was either present my left in person; or if I were not in any of them, yet I am, I was. I he that felt the smart of them, more than any man else whatsoever. The River Trebia, the mere Thrasiumen, the Town Caucar, what are they else, but the very sepulchres and tombs of the Roman armies there shewn in pieces, and of their Conuls flain. And there too, the general revolt of Italy, the rebellion of Sicily, the falling away of the greater part of Saradina. Moreover and besides, this last straight and terror; namely, the Carthaginians camp pitched between Asia and the walls of Rome, and Annibal been well neer, as conqueror at the very gates of our City. In these to great ruines and adventures of our state, yet the Venice alone and undeprifion of the people of Rome, whose providence, upright, sound, and immovable: yes, and hath raised up again and set on foot, all that lay along on the ground. You only, my valorous fouldiers, were the first that: after the discomfiture of Caucar, under the leading and good fortune of my father, without Abluutal in his journey and expedition toward the Alps, purposing to go down into Italy; who in he had joyed with his brother Annibal, certainly by this day, there had remained no memory of the Roman name.
And in very truth, these affairs falling out to prosperously, made amends and recom pense for all the former losses. But now through the goodnes of the Gods, all things prosper and go well forward: and the affairs of Italy and Sicily both, mendidly, and are every day better than before. In Sicily, Syracus and Agrigentum are won and wholly ours: the enemies be driven eut of all the land, and the state is reduced into the form of a Province, subject to the people of Rome, and under their obedience. In Italy, the Town of Apul is recovered by surrender, the City of Capua is forced by siuitat. Annibal himself, having measured all the way, (but in fearful late and in manner of a fight) as long as it is from Rome to the Bruttian country (in high Calabria,) is there driven up into the fasthelt angle and corner thereof, nothing much es wishing and praying for at Gods hands now, than to be able to retire and get away late out of his enemies land. What thing then were relief beneficing, my hardy fouldiers, than this. It you who have subdued and upheld the decaying and down-falling estate of the Roman Empire in this Province, you (I thm) together with my two parents (who man for the reveronce that I owe to them, give me leave to make equal, and to honour with that name:) at what time as calamities and losses, hapned suddenly one in the neck of another, and the Gods themselves seemd to make part and start with Annibal; should now let fll your currencies, and be fain-hearted, because in these Provinces storenid, all things go well to our hearts desire and great contentment. As for the late misfortunes and adversities, which have hapned here, would to God they had passed over without sorrow, as well of my part, as yours. But for the present, the immortal Gods, Prote-CTors and Governors of the Roman Empire, who inspired into the minds and hearts of all the Centuries, to wish and chuse me to this place of sovereign honor, even the fame Gods by augu-nties and auspices, by all tokens of the birds either by flight or flight, yes, and by visions also in the night vision, do portend, signify and promise unto me, all good speed and happy success: yes and mine own mind gives me, (when ever hitherto, hath been to me the true prophec, and never deceived me,) that all Spain is ours and within short time the whole Punic campaign nation, being expelled and driven out from hence, shall fall all Seas and Lands with their shame-full and dishonorable flight. That which my spirit and soul of it self pretight, the same doth re-tion also conclude by most certain and intollerable demonstration. The allies and subjects here of the Carthaginians, oppreseed and wronged by them, have humbly by their Embassadors crave out and succour. The Captains General of their forces, being at difference and odds all three among themselves, intomuch as they had like to have departed and revolted one from the other.
O
have distracted and dismembered their forces into three parts, and belowed them in three sever-all countries, molt removed and distant atuand. And no doubt, the like for worse is ready to fall upon their heads, which lately was our undoing and overthrow, upon the same occasion. For ven as we were before were taken of the Celtiberians, for are they now abandoned of their allies.
Besides, they parted and divided their armies atuand: which was the only cause that brought the utter ruin and destruction upon my father and uncle. And be ye sure, that their intestine A "discord and disunion, will never suffer them to join friendly and unite again in one. And thus "angled as they are, they cannot possibly withstand our valour. Now my soldiers, for your "part, do but favour the name of the Scipios: do but affect and love me, the faire and off-spring of "your noble Generals, budding forth again (as it were) out of the old stock, cut down to the root.
"Go to, old soldiers, and redoubled severors, with bon-courage let over the River Iberna a new "army and a new Captains pass over with them those Lands, which ye have often conquered, "and wherein ye have achieved many valiant and memorable acts. And for my part, I will do "endeavour and effect, that as ye now agnize me, the reten-blance of my fathers and uncles "vitage and countenance, the fame feature, proportion, and lineaments of the body: so I will shew "and represent unto you, the true pattern and portraiture of their spirit, wit, falsehoods, and ver-

B atue, even as the express and lively image taken and drawn from their own selves: in inch fort, as "every man may lay, That Captain Scipio is either riven from the dead, or new born again. Hav"ing by this Order, incensed and inflamed the courage of his soldiers, and left Sullus with a "guard of three thousand horse, and three hundred Horse, for the defence of that coast: he transpor"ted over the River Iberna, all the rest of his forces, amounting to the number of five and twenty "thousand foot, and 23 hundred Horsemen. There he was advised by some about him, seeing the "Punic armes were departed into three countries to free remote and dissile auster, to let upon "and assail that which was next: but he doubting and fearing left by that means he should fall
"together, and knowing that he was not able alone to match and make his part good to do "many boats as once, determin'd in the mean while, to be doing with new Carthage, and to believe "and assail it. This City, as it was rich and wealthy in it self, to it was full of all the enemies furni"ture and provision for war. There was their ammure kept, there was their money laid up, there re-"main'd the holigays of all Spain. Besides, as it was feared commonly, not to cross over from thence "into Sifricie to it stood upon a convenient and large haven, able to receive and harbour the greatest "navy at Sea, and the only haven (if I do not deceived) of all that coast and tract of Spain, which "boundeth next upon our Sea. But no man was made privy to his determination, or knew whither "they should take their journey, save only Lelius. He being tent about with the armado, had di"rection to temporize and guide his course by fail and oar, as at one and the self same instant, both "Scipio might present his land forces in the view of Carthage, and the fleet enter the haven. So "they departed from Iberna, and within seven days came before the City of Carthage, both by Sea "and Land. His camp he pitched on the north-side of the City: which he entrenched and fortifed "on that outward back part, that stood fast from the City: as for the forefront, it was by natural "situation of the ground, defended surely enough. For the site of Carthage is in this fort. There is "a gulf or creek of the Sea, in the middle coast and river well near of Spain, opposite coast to the "South-west wind, running & retiring in length within the Land half a mile, but lying out in breadth "somewhat more. In the very mouth of this creek, there is a little Iland from the open Sea; which "favelh, isleterth, and defendeth the haven from all other winds, but only the Southwet. From the "inmost nook of this bay, thither breaeth out a promontory like a demy iand, which is the very Hill or "Cape whereupon the City is built. The same on the East side and the South is compassed with the "Sea: from the West, it is enclosed with a lake or standing meer, which also precedeth to new what
"E toward the North, of an uncertain depth; which altereth according to the tide, and as the Sea ei"ther ebbeth or floweth. Now, there is an elbe or bank of firm ground, somewhat less than a quar"ter of a mile over, that joyneth the City with the main or continent. To that side (notwithstanding "it had been no great piece of work there to fortifie) the Roman Generel calt no trench, nor "raised any rampier: either upon a brave and bauy mind, to slew the enemy how confidently he "trusted in his owne strength; or because, whenever he advanced to the walls of the City (as "oftentimes he took occasion to do) he might have open recoure and regrets against into the camp.
"But when the utter side, which required fortifications, was finished, he let the ships in order within-
"in the haven, making a shew, as if he would beleive them also on the water side. And when he had "gone through all his armado, and given the Captains of the ships in charge, to look well to their
"F caraffo and watches in the night (for that commonly enemies at their first beleiging, make what "attempts and adventures they can in every place) he returned into his camp. And because he "would not only yield his soldiers good reacon of this his disignement, in that he began war first "and principally with the beleiging of that City: but also encourage them, and put them in good "hope of the winning and conquest thereof, he assembled them together, and discoursed before "them in this manner,

"My valiant soldiers and truely friends, If any man here thinketh, that ye are brought hither "to affail a City only, and there an end: be therfore maketh reckonng of your present pain and "travel, than call eth the profitt and commodity thereof ensuing. For ye shall in very truth give "the assault to the walls but of one City: but in that one City ye shall be masters and conquerors of all Spain. Here lie the holigays of all their Nobles, their Princes, and States. And no

"fooner shall ye be Lords of them, and have them in your rule and custody, but presently, all that "now is under the handes of the Carthaginians in Spain, will be surrendered unto you, and at "your devotion. Here is all the money that the enemies have: without which like as they are not "able to maintain war, (as who wage and entertain all their armies for paie) so it will mightly "lead us (if we light upon it) in gaining the hearts of the barbarous people. There are their engines other munition and furniture for war: wherewith we shall both furnish our selves, and disfurnish the enemy. Gain we shall over and besides, not only right fair and beautiful, but also a most rich and wealthy City: yes, and more than that, of right great importance and consequence, in regard of a goodly and surpassing commodious haven: by means whereof, we may be provided both from Sea and Land, of all things needful and requisite for the wars. Which, as they will be of great moment to us, shall have them, so they will be the greater lost to the enemy that shall forget them. This is their Capital for strength, their garner for corn, their treasury for money, their armory, their arsenal and in one word, their very flower-house of all things whatsoever. Neither is the direct passage and freight cut out of Affrick, here is the only port and harbor for shipping, between the Islands of Gadet, or Gebraldr, and the mountains Pyrenais: from whence all Spars overlooketh (as it were) and commandeth Affrick. But knowing that you are well appointed already, and prepared to the service, I will say no more but this: Now for the honour of the Romans, let us go courageously to it, and with all our might and main assault new Carthage. And when they all with one accord cried unto him, to do and indeed, that no other thing was first to be done: then he advanced before Carthage, then he gave commandment to assail it at once, by Land and Sea. Mago the Captain of the Carthaginians on the other side, when he saw preparation made by Water and Land to give the assault; for his part ordered his forces and disposed them in this manner. To make head against the Romans on that side where they lay encamped, he opposed two thousand Townsmen: with a guard of five hundred foanders he kept the citadel: other five hundred he placed upon a little hill belonging to the City which looketh to the East: all the other multitude whatsoever, he appointed to make resistance in other places, where any enteries, thouts, or sudden alarms should be given. Then having set open a gate, he sent forth those forth, whom he had arranged in that street which ledeth directly to the camp of the enemies. The Romans (according as they were commanded by their Leader himself) in the beginning gave ground a little and retired, to the end, that during the time of skirmish and conflict, they might be nearer to the supply of succours, which were to be lent to fecound them from behind. And verily at the first they stood to it stoutly on both parts, and there was no odds perceived. But after wards, the Romans being still freshely reinforced from out of the camp, not only discomfited the enemies, and put them to flight, but prefixed on them hard, as they fled disordered and out of array, that if Scipio had not founded the retreat, it seemed, that they would have intermingled themselves peltem with those that ran away, and rushed into the City with them. Without the City throughout there was no less fear than in the battle. Many courts of guard and other places were abandoned, the curtian of the walls was left naked, and every man made what shift he could to leap down and escape. Which when Scipio perceived (who now was turned to a mount which they call Marcus Turrata) and namely, that the walls were void of all the defenders, he commanded all his foanders to run forth of the camp, to let forward to the assault, and to bring ladders to scale. Himself in person, defended with the shields of tall lusty young men going before him (for by this time they let their arms from the walls a mighty volley of shot or all sorts) approached the City. There he exhorted, encouraged, and commanded them to do what was requisite in this service. And that which made most to enkindle the courages of the soanders, he was there personally as an eye-wit tness and beholder of each mans valour or cowardice. Wherupon they fluck not to run upon the very shot, but to receive many a wound: and now nothing could keep them back; neither the strength of the walls, nor the armed men that flower thereupon. But they scaled striving who could mount upon the walls first. At the same time, that part of the City which the Sea beat upon, began to be assailed by the ships. But from thence, it should seem, they made more ado with houting and hurrying, than effected ought by any forcible assault. For whilsts they came close to the walls with their ships, whilsts they put forth their ladders and their foanders whilsts every man laboured to gain the Land, the nearest way be could, what with their striving and hark-making, they hindered one another. And by that time Mago had filled the walls full of armed men, who let fly arrows, Javelins, darts, and all kind of shot, whereof they had gathered together exceeding great store, but neither men, nor arrows and darts, nor any thing else did defend the wall so much as the very wall itself be given. For few ladders they had that could reach up to the longer: and any of them be, the more weak and feeble they were. Whereupon, by reason that they who were climed up to the highest rounds, could not gain the parapet and discharge the ladder, and yet some or other still clambered up after, the ladders being overcharged with the weight, brake in pieces. Some again there were, that notwithstanding the ladders under them held still and food unbroken, yet when they looked down from on high, their eyes did dazzled, and were overcast with a mist, that they lost their sight, and fell from the top to the ground. Thus when ladders here, and men there, came tumbling down, and the enemies upon their good speed grew to be more harty and hardy, the retreat was founded which gave to the besieged within the Town not hope only of present relief and intermission of great labour and toll, but also shored them in manner, for the time to come, that the City was tenable against all CCaldes, although it were invested therewith round about. And as for fabrics and mounds to be raised and planted against it, they were not only difficult and hard to be performed, but also would ask some long time: and Minster in the mean while, space sufficient for the other Generals of their own to come to the rescue. But secure was the first assault fully sealed, when Scipio commanded other fresh and unfoened soanders, to take the ladders of them that were weared already and wounded, and A with greater violence to give a new Carthag. Himself, so soon as he understood that it was ebbe and low water, having been advertised by certain fishermen of Taracum (who sometimes with light boats used to row, and others when their velums touched the ground, to wage all over the lake upon firm ground) that men might easily pass to the walls on foot: thither to that place he brought all his soldiers to the assault. It was now almost moon-tide of the day; and besides that the water of the ebb naturally fell with the ebb into the Sea, there was a good round northern wind arose, which drove the water out of the lake (which now was well fair) after the tide, and discovered such shallows, that whereas in some places thereof they went up to the navel, in some again they waded (racee knee deep. Which after Scipio knew to be an ordinary thing in natural reason, and therefore with good foresight had made provision accordingly to take that advantage, yet he turned it into a miraculous and prodigious accident, attributing all to the immediate handy-work of the Gods: as who to give passage and footing to the Romans, had turned back the course and current of the Sea, discharged lakes of their water, and opened ways unto them, that never before were troden with the sole of man's foot; and there with he willed his soldiers to follow Neptune, the guide and Leader of the way, and to passe boldly through the mids of the lake close to the very walls. On the land side the assailants had exceeding trouble in standing under the walls: for not only they were hindered by reason that the ebb was too high; but also as they went, they lay open and under their shot, and were wounded both ways, lo as their flanks and sides were more annoyed as they approached under, than their faces and forefront of their bodies. But on the other part, as they went quietly and easily through the meat to the wall, so therefore they climbed forward so securely to the very top thereof. For neither was it strongly fortified with bul-warks, nor ruled to any height by industry and art of man, as being dispute by natural situation of the place, and the standing lake besides, strong enough and sufficiently defend'd: nor any guard of a med men were there in watch and ward, opposed against the assailants: while every man was wary, and wholly intended to help there, from whence some danger was seen, the Romans being thus sent the City over the walls without any skirmish, marched from thence with what speed they could, unto that gate, about which all the light and hot skirmish was already begun: for there not only all their minds were bent and aimed, but also their eyes and ears were occupied and poissled; whiles some fought, others looked on and encouraged the light: in such sort, that there was none of them all once perceived or know, that the City was taken and surprised behind them, before the darts flew about their ears and light upon their back parts, and until they had the enemies both before and behind. Then not only the walls were taken (when the defence upon a twofold fear, were driven to abandon them) but also the gate iron within forth and without, began to be broken down: and soon, after continual running and beating against it, the leaves thereof perfurce fight speecies, because there might be nothing to impeach or let them in their granite: then the armed soldiers brake in most furiously. Many already had scale the walls, and got over, but they turned and betook themselves everywhere where to masacre and make havoc of the Townsmen. But the main battel, which ented in at the gate with their Captains, orderly by companies and ranks in their array, marched forward through the midst of the City to the market place, from whence Scipio might see the enemies flee two ways, some to the forrest upon the hill aforeaid, which slanted to the East, and was kept with a guard of five hundred soldiers: others into the citadel, into which Magus himself, with all the armed men in a manner, who were driven from the walls, had retired and fled for to save himself. Whereupon he rent a part of his forces to win the said hill, and himself in person led the rest to the Calle. And as the fort upon the Hill was taken at the first assault and oner given, to Magus, after he had a white made some means to defend the Calle, taking all places full of enemies, swarming everywhere, and no other hope, yielded himself, the citadel, and the garrison. Untill the Calle was surrendred and given up, there was nothing but murdering and killing all over the City, and not one spared that seemed to be fourteen years old and upward, if they came in their way. But then, F upon the found of Trumpet the execution ceased, and the Conquerors fell to caseage and pillage, when of all sorts rote to a mighty thing. Of free born, such as were of male sex, there were taken prisoners 10000. Then, so many of them as he found to be natural citizens of Cartage, he dismissed and let go free, and resoluted unto them not only the City, but also their own goods, which the first fury and rage of warroirs had left untouched. There were of Artians and handicraftsmen, some two thousand: thofe by an edict he pronounced to be bond, and adjudged them conscription, to serve the Common weal of the people of Rome: yet with some hope, that shortly they might obtain their freedom again, in case they performed good service, and shewed themselves diligent in all ministeries and offices of war. The rest of the multitude of inhabitans, such as were able and young lumpy men, as also the flout and flundy bondmen, he awarded them to the ships, for to furnish up the number of forty fleets, and latter, and with the eight ships of war, which he took captive in the haven, he increased his own Armado. Besides all this multitude, there were also the hollages of the Spaniards above written, of whom he took as great care, and as good regard, as if they had been the children of Allies and associats. A mighty deal of warlike artilery and ordinance was there found and seiz'd on. Of Catapults of the greatest (i.e. 120, of a letter foot 281. Balis some greater, some smaller, of them 33, of these 52. Of Scorpions and Crossbows to shoot quarrels as well great as small, and likewise of defensive armours, and offensive weapons, a huge deal, and a marusselous quantity. Military enligins 74. Of gold and silver there was a mighty main brought unto the General. Golden cups or balls there were 276, every one H weighing almost one pound. Of silver tried, wrought, and coined, 18300 pounds weights: and much plate and vessels of silver. All this C. Flamininins the Treasurer, received either by weight or tale. Of wheat there was 30000 Modii, or barely 270000. Of barns and ships of burden, there were in the haven won by force, and taken, 113. Some were fraught with corn, armour, brails besides, and iron, fail-cloth, and hemp, or part for cables and ropes, also with timber for shipwrights. Carthage the Town it felt, in so great store of wealth and warlike provision, was the Lesset of all other.

That day Seipio, having committed the charge of guarding and keeping the City unto Lelius and the mariners, brought back the legions into the camp, and commanded the fouldiers to refresh their bodies with food and rest, weared as they were, and over-laboured in one day with all manner of toil and work that belogneth to war-service: as who had, both fought a battle in the field, and also taken to great pains, and undergone so much hazard and danger, in assailing and forcing the City; yea, and after it was won, had fought with disadvantage of ground, with those that were fled into the Calle.

The next day, after he had called both fouldiers and mariners together, first he rendred laud and praise, yes, and thanks unto the immortal Gods, who in one day had not only made him Lord of the most mighty and wealthy City in all Spaim, but also had laid up for him there against his coming, all the riches well-need of Affrick and Spains whereby as the enemies now had nothing left them, to he and his had all things plentiful. Then he commended the virtu and valour of his fouldiers, whom neither the fallowing out of the enemies could fright, nor the mighty height K of the walls fears, nor the blind and noticeless hoards of the lake could once dismay, nor the situation of the Calle feared upon a high cliff terrific, nor yet the Calle it felt most strongly built and fortified, was able to daunt and make afraid, but that they would pass over all and break through all. And therefore albeit every one of them deserveth at his hands all rewards, yet, the principal honour of a mural crown and garland, belonged properly unto him that first seized and mounted over the wall. Come he forth therefore (quoth he) and shew himself, who taketh himself self worthy of that gift, and let him claim his due. Whereupon there were two that put in for it, and demanded the same. Q. Trebellius, a Centurion of the fourth Legion, and Sextus Digitius, a Servitor at the sea. Neither refused these parties themselves to look after the matter, as the love and favour of them let all the whole army divided into legiinion fouldiers, and servitors at Sea, in an L heat of contention to laboule for him that belonged to their side, and was a member as it were of their body. C. Lelius Admiral of the fleet, went with the Sailers and Seamen. M. Sempronius Tudurans was altogether for the legiinion Land-fouldiers. This debate was like to exceed a cab, and to raise a very menacing host. Whereupon Seipio pronounced that he would appoint as Delegates three Commissioners, to sit upon the cause who should take the deposition of witnesses, and give their verdict accordingly, whether of these two persons entered over the wall into the Town. Now because C. Lelius and M. Sempronius were Advocates to the one party and the other, he therefore adjoineth unto them a third person, one P. Cornelius Caeginos, to go as an indifferent Mediator between them two: and gave order and commandment, that those other three commissioners above said should fit together, and hear and determine the converse. When as M. the matter grew to a greater heat of contention by reason that men of such mark and worth were acquainted with the action, and had their hand in it, who were not so much Advocosse to plead, but moderators and judges to hear down a side; C. Lelius, sitting out from the court, came to the Tribunal seat unto Seipio: and informed him that the manner of proceeding in this matter in quission, was without all good order, modesty and reverence; and so handled, that they were like to go together by the ears, and try it out by knockes. But, be it quoth he, that no blows be dealt, yet it is a most fainleal example and detestable precedent, that the honor and guardon due to virtue, should be carried by fraudulent coven and godless perjury. For quoth he, the legiinion fouldiers (land of the one hand, the Sea servitors on the other, and ready they be to invest on both sides all the crops of God, and to that rather which their will and heart enthrall them N to, than which in their conscience they know to be true. By which guilt of forswearing and perjury, they will not only bring a curse and vengeance upon themselves and their owne lives, but also upon the ensigns, standards, and very Eagles, yea, and their religious military Oath and S sacrament. Thus much I thought good to give you advertisement of aforesaid hand and that by the ad view of P. Cornelius, and M. Sempronius, Seipio after he had highly praised Lelius, called the fouldiers to an assembly, and there with a loud voice pronounced, and said thus: I am sufficiently informed upon certain relation, that Q. Trebellius, and Sext. Digitius we scaled the wall both together, and therefore I award as well to the one as to the other a mural garland, in token of commendation of their singular virtu. Then he rewarded the self also, according to every mans deser and valorous service. But above all other, he honoured C. Lelius Admiral of the fleet, not only in matching him equally with himself in all commendable parts and qualities, but also in proportioning him with a coronet of beaten gold, and thirty Oxen. Then he gave commandment that the hostages of the Cities and States of Spaim should be called forth. What a number were of them, I am such that the Patrician garrison were ten thousand: another 7000, and
and a third comes with his two thousand and no more. I meet with one record which reporteth, that there were 10,000 taken prisoners: and another that there were above 25,000. Of Scorpion s or Crocobies, great and small, I should say there were gained some 60; if I would take for mine author Silenus, a greek writer: but if I follow Valerius Antonius and go by him I should tell you a tale of six thousand of the greater, and thirteen thousand of the smaller. See how little rule they had of their tongues to overreach, or lay of their pens to set down so loud lies upon record. Nay, they are not well agreed as upon this point, who were the great Captains and Commanders. Moll of them say that Lucius was L. Admiral: there be again that would have M. Junius Sullanus to be the man, and Armes was Captain of the Pamph grain, and yielded to the Romans, if ye like to believe Valerius Antonius: but by the testimony and credit of others, it was

Mogg, Moreover, over the records accord not about the number of ships that were taken nor of the weight of gold and silver not yet of the sum of money that was raised of the pillage. To conclude, if we must needs believe some one or other the mean between is the belt, and carrisht most likelihood of the truth.

But to return again to Secipio: "When he had called forth the hostages into his presence full he had them all in general to be of good cheer: for why? they were now in the hands of the people of Rome, who ever desired to bind men unto them by favors: and good turns more than to awe them with fear and dread; and to have sovereign nations knit and joined in faithful amity, rather than held in subjection by heavy servitude. Then after he had taken the names in writing of their leverall Cities, he also reviewed the number of the prisoners, and counted just how many belonged to every State. Which done, he dispatched messengers home into their countries, willing their parents and friends to come and receive every man their own, if haply any Embasadors of their Cities were present, he restored unto them their own hostages without delay: for all the rest, he gave express charge to C. Flaminius the Treasurier to see unto them in all kind, courteous, and liberal usage. While he was busie in taking this order, there hapned to come from among the hostages even out of the midst of the company, an aged gentlewoman, the wife of M. Modiniius, brother to Indibilis, a Prince and great Lord of the Lepetites, she flied tears, and fell down prostrate at the feet of the L. General: and with all began to beseech him most importunately, to give a more special charge, concerning the custody of the women, lest and to recommend them to their keepers, so to be guarded with a careful eye, and to be kept and attended on more tenderly. Why? quoth Secipio, I warrant thee good woman, they shall want for nothing that is meet for them. Then replied this Dame again, We stand not so much (quoth she) upon these terms: for a little thing, God wot, may serve and content them in this poor estate and low condition: my care is for another matter, when I consider and behold the young and tender age of these maidens here. As for my self, I am now past date, and without danger of that injury, which our sex is subject and exposed unto. Now therefeoulb about her the daughters of Indibilis, virgins in the fresh prime and flower of their age, and passing fair and beautiful: withall besides some other Ladies as nobly born as they: who all honoured her as their natural mother that bare them. Then Secipio, I would (quoth he) in the ordinary course as well of mine own discipline as of that which is established by the people of Rome, have a respective consideration, that no one thing among us should suffer abuse, which elsewhere in any place of the world is held inviolable: this would I do, I say, for mine own credit, and for the honour of Rome: but to have a more special eye that way, your own virtue alio and worthinesse bindeth me: who in the midst of these your calamities and miseries have not forgot your womanly carriage and the honour of your sex. And thereupon he delivered them over to the custody of a man of approved honesty and integrity, commanding him to guard them with no lefs reverence, modesty, and continency, than if they were the wives or mothers of your nearest friends that gave them entertainent. Rather this, there was presented unto him by his soldiers a damoelle and virgin of ripe years, taken alio prisoner: but so well favoured and surpassing in beauty, that whereofover the went every manus eye was uppon her, in admiration of so rare and perfect a creature. Secipio having enquired of her country where she was born, and likewise of what parents she was defended: among other things learned, that she was espoused and affiociated to a young Prince of the Celtiberians, whose name was Alucina. Forthwith he sent home to her parents and forefather, for to repair unto him: and in the mean time he understood that her husband that should he was wonderfully enamoured of her and ready to die for her love. So soon as the young Gentleman was come, Secipio entered into a more familiar speech with him, than he did either with the father or mother of the maiden, and in these terms he entertained him: "I am a young man (quoth he) as well as your yeft. Come on therefore, let us young men both devise and comminge together more freely and not be too nice, coy, and bashful one to the other. If your espoused wife, taken captive by your soldiers, was brought unto me, and that I heard of the exceeding faine and affection that you call upon her. I believed it full well; for her singular beauty defereth no less. Now forasmuch as my feft, it might be allowed to use the palestimes of youth, (I mean no otherwise than in honest and lawful love) and were not called away by the Common-wealth, & employed wholly in other affaires of state. I would think to be pardoned and held excused, if I had an extraordinary liking to a singular of mine own, and loved her extremelie. I must therefore needs favour and render your love, which is the thing I can considering that I may not the other in any wise. Your sweet-heart and beltehoved I have entertained as well, and as respectively, as she should have been

been with your father and mother in law, who are her own kind and natural parents, Referr'd H if the hath been, and kept for you alone, that you might receive her at my hands, unpolluted and un- touched, and aprent becalling me and you both. In lien and recompence therefore of this I boon and gift which I now bestow upon you, I require at your hands again this only pro-i mis, and faithful covenant, that you will be a friend and well-willer to the State of Rome. And if 5 you take me indeed to be a good and honest man, such as these nations and people here have K known my father and uncle to have been before me, know you thus much, that in the City of Rome there are many more like unto us: and that there cannot at this day a nation in the world, L be named, which you would be to be an enemy to you and yours, or define more to en- tertain as your friend. The young Gentleman being abashed for very modestly, and yet right glad and joyful withal, held Scipio by the hands, called upon all the gods, and befought them in his behalf to thank and recompence him therefore, since it lay not in his own proper power, in any proportion or measure to be thankful and make requital, either as himself could with, or as Scipio had deserved. Then were the parents and kinsfolk of the maid called for who seeing the damo- fell freely tenderd and given them again, for whose ransom and redemption they had brought with them a sufficient sum of gold; fell to intercating and requiting Scipio to vouchebar for to ac- cept the same at their hands, as a gift and token of their good will: affuring him, that in no doing, they should take themselves no less bound and beholden unto him, than for the restorine and delivering of the virgin untouched and undefiled; Scipio seeing them so earnest and importunate, promised for to receive it, and with all, commanded that it should be laid down at his feet: and calling Althius unto him, Here (quoth he) over and besides all your other dowry which your father in law may pay you, have from me thus much more money to mend your marriage with, M take this gold therefore to your self, and keep it for your own use. And so after this rich reward given and great honour done unto him, he was dismissed, and departed home with much joy and hearts content: where he made report unto his countrymen and people of the praiseworthy virtues of Scipio, and the favours from him received; saying moreover, there was come into Spain a young man resembling the immortal gods in all respects; who as well by bounty, liberality, and belowing benefits, as by martiall provests and force of arms is in the very way to win and conquer all. So when he had assembled and mulled all his vassals and tenants, he returned within few days accompanied with a train of fourteen hundred of the best and most choice horsemen of his country.

Scipio keeping Lelius still with him, until by his advice and counsel he had disposed of the captives, hostages, and other prizes and pillege: after he had settled all in good order, appointed a Galiace of five banks of oars, wherein he embarked the prisoners, with Mace and some fifteen Senators beside, who together with him were taken, and sent them to Rome with a messenger to carry tidings of this victory. Himself determined to joyn a few dates in Carthage, which time he spent in training and exercising his soldiery, as well of land service as at sea. The first day he called the Legions to run and tro in their armour four miles out in length. The second day he commanded them to four and furnish their harness and weapons before their tents. Upon the third day they joyed and encountered in battle-wife, and practised to fight with blunt waffers and battions; yes, and lanced one at another darts and javelins, rounded at the point end with bals in manner of foils. The fourth day they refited and repossed themselves. On the fifth day again they ran at turnament as before armed. This order they kept, exercising, labouring, and retaine by turns, so long as they abode at Carthage. And thus much for the Legionary soldiers. The fea-servitors and mariners used in calm water and still weather to row up into the sea, and there to make trial of the nimbleness and agility of their ships, representing shews of sea-fight and skirmish. Thus without the City, they trained their bodies, and quickened their spirits and courage both on land and water. Within the town there was nothing heard but preparation of war-furniture. All the publicke shops and work-houses full of smiths, engineers, and all other artificers for the purpose of supplying their work, and never going from it. The General himself, as superiour, with equal and indifferent care over all. One while he would be with the Amado in the harbours: another while, he conversed among the Legions, and turneyed with them. A time he would set by to visit the works about the walls, and see how they went forward. Other wise he would be in the shops abroad, among the multitude of the Carpenters, and Smiths and other Artificers, viewing what they did there; and in the seven and ship-docks, offering and marking how much they went forward day by day striving by way of emulation as they did, who could do most and quit him self best. Having thus set them a work, repaired the walls which he had bastarded and shaken, and placed certain guards there, for the defence of the City: he took his journey to Tarracon: and all the way he was visiried and plied with sundry embassages. Some of them he answered and dispatched as he was in his journey: others he put off to give their attendance at Tar- racon: for thither he had summoned all the allies and comedates, both new and old, to meet him. And in manner, all the Cities and States on this side Iberia, and many also of the father Province of Spaunt there assembled.

The Carthaginian Captains and Commanders at the first of set purpose, suppressed and STOP- ped the rumour of the winning of Carthage. But when the thing was too too apparent, could not be hidden even mother, they used all the words they could to elevate it and make the matter less than it was. To win, that by a sudden invasion and expedition of the Romans in one day

Thus fled the affairs in Spain, in Italy the Consul Marcellus having recovered Salapia by composition, won by force two towns from the Samnites, Morena, and Metes. Where there were slain three thousand of Annibal his fouldiers, who had been left there in garrison. Some good portion of the village was shared among the fouldiers. Of what besides there was found there 24,000 men called Modii, and of barley 11,000. But the joy from hence was not so great as the losses and damage received within few days after, not far from the City Herdona, Cn. Fulvius the Pro-Consul by there encompassed upon hope to regain that City, which after the defeat at Canae, had revolted from the Romans: a town neither feared in a place of fury, nor yet well furnished and manned for defence. The Captain thereof (Cn. Fulvius Storefid) was by nature ever negligent, but grown much more reckless now, precluding upon a vain hope that he had of them within, in that he perceived how the townsmen already began to fall in their devotion and faithfulness allegiance to the Carthaginians, especially, after they heard, that upon the losing of Salapia, Annibal was departed out of those parts into the Britten country. Annibal had intelligence of all this brought unto him from Herdona by secret messengers, which, as it cauht him to have a careful eye to the saving and keeping of a friend City, so it minuted good hope unto him for to surprize his enemy at inuaires and undisposed. Whereupon with his army lightly appointed, he took long journeys and made haste to Herdona, so as he prevented almost the same and brisk of his coming. And to strike the more terror into his enemy, he thither marched in battell array. The Roman General, as adventurous and bold as he every way but nothing at all for politick, so to strong brought his forces forth in more haste than good speed, and gave him battell. His fifth legion, and the left wing or corner of Cavalry began the skirmish, and charged hotly. But Annibal had given his horsemen direction that when the Infantry was in the midst of skirmish, with mind and eye wholly occupied that way, they should whirl about and rush a compass, and whiles some of them affiled... the Camp, the rest should play upon the back of their enemies: himself iterating eulogies unto his men the name of Cn. Falcius, for like neat's sake, because two years before in the very same quarters, he had vanquished another Cn. Falcius who was Pretor also, affurred them of the like success now in this conflict. And verily this content hope of his proved not vain and fruitless. For when as in close fight and skirmish of the footmen many of the Romans were slain down and slain, but to, as yet the ranks stood unbroken, and the enemis upright, beheld a sudden fresh charge of the hzramen on their back, and a great host of the enemies with all delict and heard from the camp, first discomfitted the 1st legion, which being marshalled in the second bataillon, had been put in disarray before by the Numidians, & then the fig, & to consequently even those that fought in the forefront of the vanguard before the enemis, Some fled amain, others were killed in the midst, between where Cn. Falcius himself with twelve Tribunes of Knight marshals were left dead in the place. Of Romans and Allies how many died in that conflict, who is able to set down for certain: seeing in Homer's records I find the number fifteen thousand, and in others not above seven thousand?

The conqueror Anunah was Maiter likewise of the Camp and all the pillage there. As for the town Herdane, because he understood for truth, that it minded to have revolted unto the Romans, and would not continue taft in their fidelity, if his back were once turned: after he had conveyed away the multitude of the inhabitants to Metapolum and the Thians, he set it on fire and burnt it quite. The Nobles and principal Citizens, who were known to have had secret talk and conference with Falcius he put to death. The Romans, who out of so great an overthrow eschaped, made shift by divers and dusty waies to fly, half naked as they were, to Marcullus the K. Col. into Samnium. But Marcullus nothing dismayed and affrighted at this so great defeat, addressed his letters to the Senat at Rome, with advertisement of the los of the Captain General, and the army at Herdane: giving them yet to understand how himself, even he who after the Camilyan field had named and dared Anunah, as lusty and proud as he was upon that victory, was minded presently to encounter him, and make him take no long joy and pleasure, wherein he now so vanted and exalted himself.

And at Rome verily, as they mourned much for the los of paft, so they feared as greatly the future dangers. The Consul having passed out of Samnium into the Lucan country, late down before Numistro, in the very sight of Anunah, and there in a plain encompassed himself, notwithstanding the enemy was posted before of the hill, and had the vantage of the ground, and for to make mere of his own confidence, and how little he feared, he first brought forth his men, and marshalled them in order ready to bid battell, Anunah so soon as he saw the enemys advanced forth of the gates, ftaid not behind. And they arranged their battels in such manner, as that the Carthaginians with the right wing took up part of the hill, and the Romans displaced their left wing in length, to the very walls of the town. After they had continued fight from the third hour of the day unto night, and that the vanguards on both sides were weary with maintaining of skirmish so long: then the first legion of the Romans, with the right wing of their horsemanship, the Spanish fouldiers also of Anunah his part, the Eelearian faders likewise, together with the Elephants, began the fight, whiles the rest were already in hot conflict and close together. For a long time the light shrunk not of any hand. The first legion of the Romans was seconded with the coming in of the third: and among the enemies likewise there came in new fouldiers that were luftye in place of the foiled and wearied. Whereby, of a lingering and long skirmish, there began all on a sudden a new, hot, and cruel battell, by reason that their courages were fresh, and their bodies in heart. But the night parted the fray and left the victory doubtful in the midst. The morrow after, the Romans from sun-rising stood arranged in the field until it was far day: and seeing none of the enemies appear and shew themselves, they fell to gather up the spoils by leisure, and hesped up in one place all the bodies of their own men that were slain, and made one great fire, and burnt them to ashes. The night ensuing Anunah did dilodge secretly without any noise, and departed into Apulia. And Marcullus, so soon as day-light discovered the flight of his enemies (leaving his hurt and wounded people at Numistro with a small guard, and L. Furius Purpurg a Col. leman to be their Captain) followed him by his steps, and at Venusio overtook him. There for certain dyes passed some sallies from the guards of both armies, whilsts both horse and foot one with another rather made flight skirmishers, than any few battels; and lightly the Romans had awaies the better hand. From thence the armies were conducted through Apulia, without any memorable fight at all, by reason that Anunah in the night feared ever far forward, seeking some opportunity of forelaying and entrapping his enemy; and Marcullus never followed but in broad day light, and sent out his epials before to clear the coasts.

In this mean while Paccur spending the time at Capea, in making port-fale of the noblemens goods, and in setting and letting out to farm the land which was confiscate and forfeit to the common-wealth of Rome (and all for a rent of corn) there haped a new complot and practice, which lay hidden for the time, to be detected and come to light, to the end that he might never want one matter or other to take occasion for to plague and torment the Campanians. He had taken order that his souldiers should remove out of the houses within the town, partly for that as well the tenements of the said town within as the lands without should be rented forthand partly for fear left the exceeding pleasantries and delectable feat of that City should effeminate his army, as it had done the holl of Anunah before time: and commanded them to build themselves about the gates and along the walls, courtyards and fields in warlike fashion, and only to servé for foundries. There were most of them made of bards and boards, some walled and walled with weeds, and all of them thatched with straw and fluffe, as it were of purpose to miniture tell for fire. Now there were some hundred and seventy Camphans had on pierced at one certain hour the night to set al a fire; and the principal heads and Captains were certain brethren of the Moors: and it turn'd that by tome of the same house and family, the comet y was disclosed.
Whereupon on e of the gates were made fast by the commandement of the Pro-Consul: and the alarm being tir'd up npardom all the foundries ran together. All thòse that were partie of privity to the intended treason were apprehended, and after rigorous examination had by torture, they were condemned and executed: the intoners were made free, and had each one a reward.

When the Ne. ermes and Acretes made many, who wanted place of habitation, forasmuch Acraea was in part burning, and Neera utterly raz'd and destroy'd: Mæcelius refered them over to the Senat of Rome; and sent them thither. The men of Acraea had leave granted to re-edifie again their own edifices which were burned: But they of Neera, according to their own desire, were integral to Acræa: and the Acræans commanded to remove unto Curatia there to dwell.

At the miniding of many and weighty affairs, which falling out variably, one while well, another while ill-omen and ammied the minds of men yet the Romans forgot not the Cliche of Tarentinum: for M. Octavius and P. Agrippus, went as Embassadours into Acræa, for to buy up corn to be carried and brought to Tarentinum: and a thousand soldiers out of the City army, whereof the number of Romans and Allies was all one, were sent with the laden corn thither to be in garrison.

Now was the summer at an end and the time drew near of the Consuls election, but the letters of Mæcelius unto the Senat (wherein he signified that it was not for the good of the Commonwealth to depart one from Amala, whom he himself pursu'd still at Highs, and so much to the more locally because he was off at Pres in Generality, and to either to call away the Consul from the wars, especially now in the midst of his belt and to be without Consul the next year. But it was thought in the end the belt course, that he was for the Consul, although he were not in High, but beyond sea, should rather be sent for, called forth of Syria. So by order from the Senat, there were letters dispatch'd unto him, from L. Maecenas, the Praetor of the City, together with those other letters of M. Mæcelius the Consul: to cause him to understand what the nation was, why the LL. called him rather out of his Province then his Colleage and Companion in government.

At the same time therefornt Embassadours to come unto Rome from King Syphan, "Recounting what prosperous was his King had fought with the Carthaginians, aluring the Senate, that their Lord and Master, as he was not a greater enemy to any nation than to the Carthaginians, so he was not more ready to friend any State than the Romans: laying moreover, that he had sent aforetime his Embassadours into Siam unto the Roman Generals Ca. and P. Scelpus, and now was most willing to seek the intimacy and friendship of the Romans even at the very fountain and well head. The Senat not only returned answer to those Embassadours in most gracious and courteous terms, but also addressed Embassadours of their own with rich gifts unto the King, and by name; L. Gemellus, P. Petellius, and P. Popilius. The presents which they carried were a hide robe, and a kittle of purple, an Ivory chair, a boll or cup of beaten gold, weighing five pound. Those Embassadours had in commendation and charge, presently after they had dispatched with the King, to visit other Princes and great Lords of Africa: and to bettow on them also, they carried robes purified and embroidered with purple, and golden bowls of three pound weight. Likewise there were sent as far as Alexandria (in Egypti unto King Ptolemaus and Cleopatra the Queen, M. Attillius and M. Aelia as Embassadours; for to call to remembrance, and renew the old friendship: and to them also they presented gifts, namely unto the King a long robe and a kittle of purple, with an Ivory chair: unto the Queen a rich mantle of Bæthnic, wranght with hundy colours, with a vall of purple.

In this summer time, whilst these foresaid matters palled, there were from out of the Cities and country towns adjoyning many prodigious lights, and earthfull tokens reported, At Taphonium, there fell a Lamb, having an under yielding milk: the lower and lantern of the Temple of Jupiter was strucken with lightning and in manner all the roof uncovered. And much about those days at Amara, the very lowl and ground before the gate thereof caught fire with lightning and for one day and night burn'd: with any matter of mill: and the stones and birdes of the air forsook their nests which they had built in the trees of the grove consecrated to Dard near unto the carrefour or cross way of Amara. Near unto Tarentin there were seen in the sea, not far off from the haven, serpents of an huge and wonderfull bignesse to leap up above the water: and doport and play like fishes. At Tarqurm a swine farrowed a pig with a mans face. Also in the territory of Capena, about the grove and temple of Mercur there were four Stanes: wherein much blood a day and a night. These earthfull tokens were by a decree of the Princes past and expire by greater facillities. And a solemn Supplication proclaimed one day at Rome in every Chariot and Chappel before all the shrines of the gods: and another day in the territory of Capena, at the said grove and chappell of Ferona.
The seven and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

M. Valerius the Consul, called by the forefaid letters of the Senate, after he had recommended the charge of the Province and the Army, unto Cicero, the Praetor; and sent M. Valerius Messala, the Admiral of the Navy, with a certain number of ships into Africk, as well to fetch in prizes, as to enquire and learn what the people of Carthage did and went about: himself with ten sail took the seas, and having a prosperous fore-wind arrived at Rome. And being come, presently he assembled the Senate, where he declared what acts and deeds he had performed in his Province, namely, "Whereas for the space almost of threecore years there had been war in Sicily both by land and sea, and the same oftentimes fought with great losses and many offenses; that he now had brought those troubles to an happy end, and let the Province in quiet. That there was not in all Sicily one Carthaginian left, nor one Sicilian, of all them that for fear had been chafed and driven from thence, but was returned and there replanted: that they were all brought home again to their own cities to inhabit to their own lands, to plough and sow; that now at last the fore-let and waste ground was husbanded again, and made fruitful, not only for the profit and convenience of the occupiers and tenants thereof, but also for the most affured relief and subsistence of the people of Rome, both in war and peace. After this, Mutius, and the rest who had deserved any thing well to the City of Rome, were brought into the Senate: unto whom, both all and some (for the credit of the Consul, and to diffuse his promise unto them) there were rendered all forts of honorable recompence. Mutius also was enfranchised Citizen of Rome, and a Bill was prefented in that behalf to the people, by the Tribune of the Commons, and with the grant and authority of the Senate."

During these affairs at Rome, M. Valerius Messala arrived in Africk with a fleet of 50 sail, and being landed one morning before day, suddenly and unawares to the people of the country, made a roade into the territory about Utica: and having forced it far and near, taken many men and women prisoners, and raised a great booty of all forts of things besides, returned to the Armado, and crossed the seas back for Sicily, and arrived again at Lilybaeum upon the thirteenth day after he loosed from thence, and took the seas first. Of the Captives (after strict examination) he learned thus much (which also he set down orderly in writing, and sent unto the Consul Lepidus, that he might be acquainted likewise with the state of the affairs in Africk), namely, that these were in Carthage five thousand Numidians, under the conduct of M. Antonius the son of Galaba, most forward young man, and a right valiant warrior; that there were other officers also throughout all Africk wages and levied for money, ready to be transported and sent over into Spain, into Africabac, to the end that he with a most puissant power might with all speed pass over into Italy, and join his forces with Amilus: that in the effecting of this designum, the Carthaginians were affuredly perswaded of the victory. Moreover, that there was a mighty na\"vy a rigging and deckin for to recover Sicily again, and as they verily thought, it should pass the seas very shortly. These news being read by the Consul, troubled and disquieted the Senate, that they thought there was no resting for the ordinary election of Magsistrates, summoned and called by the Consul, but that they should nominate a Dictator of purpose to assemble that solemn Seffion, and the Consul immediately to return again into his Province. But hereupon grew some debate and question for a time, while the Consul faid, that he would nominate and create Dictator M. Valerius Messala, who was then in Sicily, and Admiral of the fleet: but the LL. replied again and laid, that a Dictator might not be elected or declared without the Territories of Rome, and those were all within the limits and marches of Italy. But after that M. Laerciatus (A Tribune of the Commons) had put this controversy to question before the Senat for to be cist and decided by their opinions; then the Senate granted out a decree, That the Consul before he departed from the City, should put up a bill of supplication unto the body of the people, that it would please them to elect a Dictator and whomsoever they by their suffraages chose, him should he pronounce and declare for the Dictator and in case the Consul refused to do so, then the Praetor of the City should propose the same unto the people: and if not he neither, then the Tribunes should propound it unto the Commons. But when the Consul denied flatly to put it unto the people, being a thing merely belonging to his authority and place, and likewise expressly forbid the Praetor to do it; N then the Tribunes of the Commons took the matter upon them, whereupon the Commons granted that Q. Fulvius, who then was in Capua, should be nominated Dictator. But the night before that very day that this assemblie of the Commons was to be holden, the Consul departed privily, and took his journey toward Sicily. The Nobles thus being disappoinited and disquiet, thought good to send letters unto Marcellus, for to lend his helping hand now unto the Common-wealth, thus foraken and abandoned by his College, and to declare him for Dictator, whom the people had by their voices elected. So Q. Fulvius was pronounced Dictator by Marcellus and the Consul: and by virtue of the said act of the Commons, P. Licinius Crassus the Arch-Prelate, was by Q. Fulvius nominated General of the Cavalry. The Dictator after he was come to Rome, sent Cn. Sempronius Blafus his Lieutenant, whom he had at Capua, to the Army into the Province of Heruria, in stead of C. Galphnnius the Praetor: whom by his letters he moved to take the government of Capua, and his army there. And himself sent out precepts for the solemn elections of Consuls, against the first Comital day that he might by Law, But by reason of a contention that grew between the Tribunes of the Commons and the Dictator, it could not pass and be performed, For the Century Galeria of the younger fort,
A fort, which by lot had the prerogative of giving their first voices, elected for Consuls Q. Fulvius and Q. Fabius: unto whose election no doubt, the rest of the Tribes called forth in right course and lawful order would have escorted, but that C. and L. Arrius, the Tribunes of the Commons came between with their negative voice: who said, it stood not well with civility, that one man should continue ever still in Magistracy, and besides, that it was a more shamefull example and foul precedent, that himself should be created Consul, who assembled the election: and therefore, if the Dictator would admit of his own name, and allow himself eligible, they would not suffer the assembly to continue any longer: but if there might be some other propounded besides him, they would not hinder the proceedings thereof until all was finished. The Dictator alledged

B in the behalf of the election, and maintained the cause by the authority of the Senate, by the grant and act of the Commons, and by sundry examples of former times. But when Cn. Servilius was Consul, at what time as Flamininus the other Consul was in Italy, C. and L. may by order of the Senate granted, out of the Commons, there was a bill preferred to the Commons, and the same passed by their voices. That so long as the war continued in Italy, it might be lawful for the people to chuse and create Consuls again, as often as they pleased, whatsoever they would, out of the number of them that had been Consuls. And as for examples (quoth he) in this case, I can alledge both old and new: to wit, long ago L. Postumius Megellus being Interrex, was even in that very election which he called and held, created Consil himself, with Cn. Jun. Brutrus: and of latter daries Q. Fabius likewise, who verily would never have accepted of the Consilship, and

C inferred it to be hung upon him so continually, if he had deemed it to be against the good of the common-weal. After much debate and long alteration, entertained with sundry like speeches, at length the Dictator and the Tribunes agreed to this point, and agreed of this issue, That they would stand to the award and judgment of the Senate. The LL. of the Senate were all of this mind, that the present condition of the common-weal required no less, but that the State and the affairs thereof should be managed by old and experienced Captains and Generals, and such as were skillfull in feats of arms, And therefore they utterly mistilked that the election should be hindered and disturbed. Thus the Tribunes relented, and the election went forward and was finished. So there were declared Consuls, Q. Fulvius Mas, the fifth time, Q. Fulvius Flaccus the third time. Then were created Praetors, L. Veturius Philus, T. Quintius Cripus, C. Hafius Tolumnius, and C. Auruns Cn. Arrius, When the Magistrates were once elected for the year, Q. Fulvius resigned up his Dictatorial

4. In the very end of this summer, a Carthaginian fleet of forty sail, under the conduct of Amilcar the Admiral, passed over into Sardinia, and at first invaded and wasted the territory of Ohisia: then, after that P. M'anius Veio the Praetor there, shewed himself with an army, they sent a compass about, and failed to the other side of the Island, and foraged the lands about Caralis: and so returned again into Africa, enriched with prizes andbooties of all sorts.

5. In that year divers Priets died at Rome, and new substituted in their rooms, C. Servilius the Praetor Pontifices was invested and installed instead of T. Ocladius Carus. In like manner T. Sempronius Longus, the son of Caius, was chosen Decemvir, deputed for holy ceremonies, in place of T. Sempronius Lomius, the son of Titius, M. Martinus the King of Sacrificers departed this life: and M. Anquius Pappus likewise the grand-Curio or Priet of the Curia: but to succeed them, were no Priets deputies that year. In this year also were Censoris created, to wit: L. Veturius Philus and P. Licinius Carus the High-Priet, As for Carus Licinius, he had neither been Censor nor Prefet before he was made Censor, but stepped straight from his Ediles room into the place of Censor. But these Censoris neither made choice of new Senators, nor yet did any publick act: the reason was, because L. Veturius died, whereupon Licinius also gave over the Censorship. The Ediles of the Chair L. Veturius, and P. Licinius Varus, exhibited the Roman games, and renewed them again one day more than ordinary, The Ediles of the Commons, Q. Cn. Cn. and L. Portius Licinius, set up in the Temple of Ceres, the molten images of brash, which were made of the money taken for fines and amencements; and represented the plates and patties to their office belonging, right stately and with great furniture and preparation, as the wealth and plenty of those times would afford.

6. In the end of this year C. Lolius the Lieutenant of Scipio arrived at Rome, the four and thirtieth day after that he looght and took seat at Taracass: And as he entered the City with a mighty train of Captives, he let the people on running out all of parts to see that sight. The morrow after he was admitted into the Senat-House; where he related, that new Carthage, the head City of Spain, was forced and won in one day: that divers Cities which had revolted were received upon surrender; and other new entered into society and friendship with the people of Rome. And by enquiry of the Captives they found their intelligences to agree in manner with the advertisements and tidings contained in the letters of M. Veralius Maffida. But the thing that troubled the Lords most was the voyage of Adenanl Into Italy, which hardly was able to withstand the forces of him and Ammaus together. Lolius being brought into the general assembly of the people, disconfounded the same points which he had related in the Senat-House. And the Senat, in regard of the happy issue of P. Scipio, granted by a decree, a solemn procession for one day: and gave order that C. Lolius with all convenient speed should make haste again, and repair into Spain with the very forces that he brought from thence.

The winning of Carthage I have set down in this year, having the warrant of many writers: and yet I am not ignorant, that some there be, who have affirmed that it hapned the next year following. But me thinkes, it was an unlikely matter, that Servius should spend one whole year in Spain, in doing just nothing.

Now when Q. Fabius Maximus was Consul the first time, and Q. Fabius Plautus the third time, on that very day upon which they entered their offices (which was in the Ides of March) both of them by decree of the Senate, had the government of the Province in the city, but to their jurisdiction was set out by the countries: as to Fabius should war about Tarrentum, and Fabius in the Lucan and Brittan countries, M. Claudius continued still ingovernment one year longer. The Pr etors had their Provinces parted between them by lot, unto Caio Hestius Tulpus to tell the jurisdiction over the Citizens, but to L. Veturius Philo, over foreigners, together with Caius Titus Quinctius Cincinnatus, and C. Aurelianus governed Sardinia. The armies were divided among the I Provinces in this wise: Unto Fabius were assigned the two legions which M. Valerius Leventius had in Sicily: Unto Q. Fabius, there in the same, which were commanded by C. Calpurnius. The City army was appointed to succed those legions in Hetruria: and C. Calpurnius was ordained to be in the government of that Province, and have the charge of that army which Q. Fabius had. It was agreed moreover, that T. Quintius should be Lord President of Capea, and have the charge of the army there. And that C. Hestius should receive the jurisdiction of C. Leoitus the Pro-Pr etor, over the province at Ariminum, and likewise his army, Unto M. Marcellus the same legions were allowed, whereas he had warred so fortunately when he was Consul, Unto M. Valerius and L. Cincius (for they also continued one year more governors in Sicily) was the army remaining after the battetl at Cannae granted: and they were commanded to supply and make up all the companies thereof, out of those forces that were left of the legions of Cn. Fabius. For the Consuls caused them to be fought out and gathered together, and sent them into Sicily: and disfranchised them with the same kind of ignominious disfranchisement, in which the Cannians served as also those who remaining of the army of Cn. Fabius the Pr etor had been thither sent by order from the Senate, for anger and displeasure that they fled like as the other, Unto C. Aurelianus, the same legions were given by decree in Sardinia, wherewith P. Mamilius Volso had sued and engaged that Province, and P. Sulpicius having his government prorogued for one year longer, was commanded to rule Macedonia with the same legion and Armado Hill, Thirty Gallices of five banks of oars were appointed to be sent out of Sicily unto Tarentum, to Q. Fabius the Consul, With the rest of the native it was agreed and order set down that M. Valerius Leventius should either himself or self pass over into Affrissa, to forrage and spoil the country, or send L. Cincius or M. Valerius Melfus, whether of them he would, for the government of Spain, where there was no alteration, have only this that Servius and Sylla had their commission continued not for a year as the rest, but until such time as they should be called from thence by order from the Senate, Thus were the Provinces divided and thus were the forces believed for this year.

Among other affairs of greater importance, the Election of the high Curia, or chief parish-Priest who was to be elected in the room of M. Aemilius late deceased, renewed and set upon again an old contention between Commons and Nobles. For the Parthians denied, that C. Mamilius Atilius was (who was the only man of the Commons that stood for it) was eligible, and therefore not to be pricked for affinities, nor never any before him obtained that sacred and stately dignity, but M. one of Senators calling the Tribunes being called unto for their advice referred the matter to the Senate, and the Senate put it unto the people, to be decided by them, So C. Mamilius Atilius was the first Commoner that ever was created Maximum Curio, i.e. the grand-supervisor over all the Curia in matters of Religion. And P. Licinius the Arch-bishop constrained C. Valerius FlACCUS to be initiated and inaugurate the Flamen of Jupiter against his will. And C. Licinius was created Decemvir for holy rites and ceremonies, and for sacrifices instead of Q. Marcius Secundus late deceased, The cause and occasion of inaugurating that Flamen by constraint and compulsion I would willingly have concealed and smothered in silence, but that the ill name, wherein he was turned afterwards to good fame and reputation. This Flaccus for his carded, lofty and riotous demeanour in his youth, in regard of which vicious course of life he was odious to his own natural brother L. Flaccus, and other his kinsfolk, was for the same cause chosen Flamen by P. Licinius the said Arch-bishop. This man to soon as his mind was employed about Church matters and religious ceremonies, so suddenly all at once altered his life, and cast off his old behaviour, that there was not one of all the young men in Rome in more account and credit, nor better liked of the chief of the Nobility and I. of the Senate, as well those of his own house and lineage, as others that were strangers unto him. And when he saw himself generally into this good opinion and reputation among men, he began to have a very good conceit of his own parts and worthiness, inflaming, as he brought up in old custom again, and was so bold as to take his place in the Senate-House (a thing, that for many years space had been intermitted and discontinued in regard of the base unworthiness and insufficiency of the former Flamine.) When he was Q. entered into the Senate-chamber, C. Licinius the Pr etor willed him to go forth, as being no place for him, and therewith drew him out, whenupon the Flamine called for help of the Tribunes of the Commons pleading the ancient right and preheminence of that Priestly dignity, and alleging, that C. Flaccus in times past enjoyed that place, together with the pall, embroidered rich robe, and the Ivory cible. The Pr etor on the other side came upon him again, and said, That right was not grounded upon old examples; past all date, set out of Chronicles time out of mind: but but he would needs have it to be carried by the most fresh practice of the newest and latest curfome, a Fleming. That by prehension of the time, either of our fathers or grandfathers diies, there was no Flemine of Jupiter troubled that privilege. The Tribunes, who were to moderate this question, gave their judgment thus, That if any thing were foreseen, and discontinued through the ignip negligence of some Flemines, it was not for themselves and they deemed it no reason, that it should hurt or prejudice the whole priesthood, Whereupon, the Pretor or himself forced not greatly upon the point, nor stood much with him, and so they admitted the Flemine into the house with great content of the Nobles, as well as of the Commons. And all men thus conceived of it, That the Flemine had obtained the thing, rather in regard of his sanctimony and holiness of life than in the right of his facerdotal dignity.

The Consuls before that, they went into their Provinces enrolled two legions of Citizens, for to supply and make up sufficiently the defect of all the other forces. The Old City army Fulvius the Consul committed unto C. Fulvius Flaccus his Lieutenant; and brother he was besides to the Consul, for to be led into Apulia with direction, that the Legions already in Apulia should be brought to Rome. And Fulvius the Consul called the residue of the army of Fulvius to be fought up and raised, which served to the number of 3500: and commanded his son Q. Maximi to lead them into Sicily, unto M. Valerius the Pro-Conful, and of him to receive the charge of two Legions, and the thirty galliasses storefaid, bearing five ranks of oars. The withdrawing of these Legions out of the island, nothing diminished nor abridged the garrisons of that Province, either in strength or show. For besides the two old legions, well and sufficiently filled and furnished, he had a great power, as well horse as foot, of Numidians, such as were fled from the adverse part into the Romans: and took up and levied besides for new foundiers, even those Sicilians also, who had been of the army of Epicides and the Carthaginians, men of approved valour, and skilful warriors. These for their aids, when he had put to each of the Roman legions, he kept still the form of two compleat armies. With the one he gave order to L. Cincius to defend that part of the Island which had been the Realm of King Hiero; with the other he maintained the rest of the Island, divided sometimes by the confines of the Roman and Greek dominions. There was a fleet also rigged and trimmed, consisting of seventy ships, for to guard and defend all the maritime coasts, along the tract of the sea side. Himself in person, with the horsemen of Muziums, rode about all the Province, for to visit the lands and grounds, and to take note which were tilled and well husbanded, which lay forefet and untillled, and to commend or chastifie, and rebuke the landlords and owners thereof accordingly. The care and regard of coin, thus far forth did good, that the Province was able both to send good store to Rome, and also to convey unto Catana sufficient to maintain the army that was to lie in standing Camp that summer about Tarcentum.

But the foundiers who were transported over into Sicily (and for the better part they were Latines and other Associats) were like to cause a great rising and commotion: whereby we may see, that of small occasions and beginnings oftentimes arise great matters of important consequence. For the Latines and Allies in all their Diets and Councils at home, began to mutter and grumble, "That now for ten years space they were with continual mutterings and payments of foundiers wages consumed and spent, that there was not a year in manner went over their heads but it cost them some great losses and overthrow in battell. Many were slain in the wars, other died of diseases. So that a Citizen oftentimes, if he were taken and preft once by the Romans, for to be a foundier was more sure to perish, than if he were taken prisoner by the Carthaginians: for the enemy lent their captives back again gratis, and without ransom, home into their country: the Romans posted and packed them away out of Italy, as confined to a place of banishment (to speak truly) rather than appointed to live in warfare. For see how the foundiers, remaining after the field of Cannae, have continued there, and waxen old these eight years already, and no doubt there were they like to lay their bones before that the enemy (who never fo flourished, nor was so strong as now) would depart from thence. In case then that old foundiers return not into their country, and now still be chosen, within a while there would be none left behind, and therefore bel it were for them before they were come to extream poverty and destitution, presently to deny the people of Rome that, which whilst somewhat is left, which thready they must be driven to do of very necessity when all is gone. And if the Romans see their Allies once agree together, and take this course, they will then verily be think themselves and grow to some terms of making peace with the Carthaginians. For otherwise be sure as long as Annibal hath a day to live Italy will never be clear of war. Thee and such like specchess passed in their Diets above said. There were at that time thirty Colonies of the people of Rome: and whilst the Embassages from them all were at Rome, twelve of them denied the Consuls flatly, and laid they were not able any longer to find either men or money. And those were these, Arces, Nepet, Sinuabri, Circens, Albis, Casculs, Sestis, Soras, Setis, Cales, Narvius, Interamnas. The Consuls amazed at this strange and unexpected accident, being desirous to drive them out of that mind, and to scarce them from so detestable a resolution, stopped they should prevail more by chaffing and rebuking, than by fair and gentle dealing: and therefore told them again, that they had presumed to speak that unto the Consuls, which they again were abashed and could not find in their hearts to deliver and relate in the Senate-house. For surely (say they) this is not a refusal of foundiery and war service, but a very meerevolting from the people of
of Rome, and no better than an open rebellion. Therefore they were bent to return again speedily into their several Colonies, and to contend with their neighbors &countriemen, while the matter remained yet all whole as men who had rather let fall some words rashly at adventures, than resolved indeed to attempt and commit to hainous an act yet and to tell them, and put them in mind, that they themselves were neither Campani nor Tarentini, but mere Romans, from them descended, and of their race; from thence let as Colonies into the lands that were won by conquest, for to breed, increase, and multiply; and to admonish them. That whatsoever duties children owe to their parents, the same they owed unto the Romans, if there remained in them any kind and natural affection, any remembrance of their ancient native country: and to exhort them to consider better of the matter, and to lay their heads together anew, forasmuch as whole devotions of theirs tended to betray the State and Empire of Rome, and to deliver the victory of all unto Annib as. When the Consuls, one after another had dealt and been in hand with them a long time in this manner; and the Embassadors nothing moved with their words, made answer again. That neither they knew what other meassage to bring home; nor their Senate what new counsel to take; since that they had not any more men to be mulled for fooundiers, nor money to be paid for wages: the Consuls seeing them so stifly and obstinately bent, made relation thereof before the Senat, whereupon every man was strucken into such fear and trouble of mind, that many of them gave out, that the Empire of Rome was come to an end. The like, say they, will the rest of the Colonies do, and surely all our confederates and allies are combined and agreed to betray the City of Rome unto Annibal. But the Consuls comforted the Senat, and had them be of good cheer laying, That all the Colonies besides would continue loyal and fast in their duty and allegiance: and even those also which had failed in their obedience, if there might be Embassadors sent amongst them, to rebuke and challice them, and not to speak them fair and entertain them by way of prayer, would no doubt have a respective reverence of the majesty of the Roman Empire. Now when the LL. of the Senat had committed the ordering of this matter wholly unto them for to manage and hard e, according as they should think good for the well-publike: after they had thoroughly sounded the hearts and minds of all the rest of the Colonies, they called and cited all the Embassadors, and demanded of them whether their fooundiers were in readiness, according to the capitulations of the covenant. Then M. Sexilius of Fregelae made answer in the behalf of eighteen of them, That not only their fooundiers were ready according to the form of the covenant, but also if more were need, more they would allow, and whatever else the people of Rome imposed upon them, and wished them to perform, the same would they strain themselves to do to the utmost, as yet they had people, and a purse good enough; and as for their hearts, it was much better than their ability. The Consuls after they had made a short speech unto them by way of preamble, laying, that they thought it not sufficient for their desier to be commended from their mouth only, unles all the LL. generally in the Senate-house gave them condign thanks with one voice and common accord, wished them to follow after them thereafter. The Senat having thanked them in as honourable terms as they could possibly devise, and entertained them with most gracious words, gave order to the Consuls, bringing them forth also in the face of the whole people of the City: and before them, among other singular favors and kindnesses, which they had showed both unto them and also unto their ancestors, to make rehearsal of this late good desier of others, which they afforded unto the Commonwealth to the end that now also after many ages and lives of men past they should not be forgotten and buried silence, nor destroued of their just praise and due commendation. And there were they that remained true hearted and fast unto the City of Rome: The Signiers, Nolans, and Norbans; the Sarculians, Brundins, and Fregelians; the Lucerins, Venuins, and Adrians; the Firmans and inhabitants of Ariminum, And from the other side the Pontians, Pelrians, and Cuffians; and of mid-landess, the Beneventins, Efevens, Spolets, Placentins, and the inhabitants of Cernona. Upon the aid and succour of these Colonies, the Roman State at this time refted and stood maintained: and these all were highly thanked both in the Senat, and in the assembly of the people. For as the other twelve Colonies, which had refused to do their obedience, the LL. of the Senat gave express commandment that they should not be so much as once minded or named: and that the Consuls should neither give them their dispatch, nor retain them full nor to much as speak unto them. This silent kind of rebuke without word giving, seemed to stand molt with the majesty and grandeur of the people of Rome.

While the Consuls were diligent in providing and making ready all other things requisite and meet for the wars, it was thought good to bring abroad the venefary gold to win, the twentieth part of all their tributes and revenues which had been laid up and reserved apart in a more secret closet of the City-chamber against an hard winter (as they say) to serve for what need forever the Common-wealth should stand in. So there was taken forth four thousand pound weight of gold, whereof three hundred pound was given to the two Consuls apiece, and likewise to M. Marcellus, and M. Sulpicius the Pro-Consuls; and to L. Veturius the Praetor, unto whole lot the Province of France beliell, And Fabius the Consul had an addition besides himself above the rest of one hundred pound weight of gold for to be carried into the Castle of Tarantum. The rest of the gold they disbursed for to make ready payment down upon the nail unto them that undertook to provide apparel for the army in Spain, which to their own fame, and the honour of their General, served therein in the wars.
Moreover, it was thought good, that before the Confuls departed into their Provinces the prodigious tokens should be purged and expiate. On the Albaen mount there were smitten with fire from heaven: the Image of Jupiter, and a tree standing near into the Temple: likewise the lake at Hybla, the wall at Cupra, and the Church of Fortune: and at Simessa the wall and gate of the town. These, I say were, blazed with lightning, and smitten with thunderbolts. There were some also brought word, that the water at Albac in Blood, and at Rome within the sanctuary of the chappel of Fortunatus, a little image that stood upon her crown, fell of its own accord from the head of the goddess into her hands. And at Portunus it was for certain reported and known of a truth, that an Oxe spake, and that a Vulture or Gripe flew into a shop in the market place.

When it was full of people. And at Simessa there was an infant born of doubtful sex, between male and female, (which the common fort tell Androgynus, as for the most part Greek names, admit more ease composition of two words than the Latin) and there it raised milk, and a man child was born with an Elephants head. These strange and fearfull sights were expiate, and satisfaction made for them with greater lattices: and a solemn procession in all the Churches and Chapels, with prayers and supplications was proclaimed for one day. Besides, a decree was granted, that C. Hestius the Praetor should vow and let out the games and festivals of Apollo, in such manner as of late years they had been vowed and let forth.

About the same time Q. Publius the Conful held an assembly for the creation of Censoras, and elected Censoras were M. Cornel, Cnelicus, and P. Scipiones T. Crudus, who neither of them had ever had been Conful. And by a grant or commissio from the Senat, there was a bill preferred unto the Censors, and the same passed, that these Censoras should let, and to farm let the territory of Cupra. The review of the Senat and choice of new Senators was hindered and lated, by reason of a contention between the two Censors, who should be the president of the Senat. Now the choosing of him lay in Scipion in his hand. Howbeit Cornelius alleged, that the cullomne and tradition of fore-fathers should be followed, namely, to elect him for President, who of all them that were now living had born first the office of Conful. And that was T. Modius Foro, Scipion replied again and said, that as the gods had given him by lot the first place, so they had granted him free liberty to choose whom he would, and therefore he would elect Q. Fabius Max. whom at that time he was able to prove to be the principal of all the City, without exception and take Annibals himself for the Judge. After much variance and contolling of words, at length Scipion by relenting and permission of his Colleagues elected Q. Fabius Max, the chief Senator. Then the Senat was changed, and new Senatours chosen, and eight were overpafted and left out, among whom was L. Cæcilius Metellus, that he gave the infamous and flamellul counsell to abandon Italy, after the defeat at Canna. In voting likewise and discharging the Knights and Gentlemen, the same canon was considered of, and took effect, but very few there were of them that were touched with that infamy: but all those hoffemen belonged to the Campanian legions who were in Sicily and no small number there of them had their horses taken from them. And to aggravate this sharp punishment and note of disgrace, they were plagued also with time of long warfare: so for many of them as had lived with horse allowed by the City, it should not reckoned upon the years passed already, but were to follow warfare ten years forward, and find themselves hores. Moreover, these Censoras after diligent search and survey found out and met with a great number of those that ought to have lived on horseback: and look how many of them were sixteen years old and upward at the beginning of the war, and had not been employed in the wars thofe all they discharged, and made Fasti or contributaries. After this, they bargained by the great for the repairing and re-edifying again of the edifices which had been consumed by fire about the Forum, or market place, namely the seven shops of the fish shambles, and the Kings Hall, or royal gallery.

Thus when all things were finilished which were to be done at Rome, the Confuls set forward to the war, and first Publius went before to Cupra and some few days after Fabius followed who behoght both his own Collegue by word of mouth most earnestly, and also Marco by effectual letters, to make sharp war upon Annibal, and to keep him occupied, while he assailed Tarraconum which City, if it were once taken from the enemy he were then driven out of all and having no place to put his head in, so that he might make account to stand near and truly upon him, he should have no reason at all once to stay in Italy. He despaired also a messenger to Rhogium unto the Captaine of the fort and garrision, which by Leman the Conful was there placed against the Brittish; and those were eight thousand men. The greatest part of them were thee good fellows, and that damned crew, whereof we spake before, who used to live by robbing and filching, and were brought thither from Aquitania out of Sicily, Unio whom there were adjouneyed many of the Brittish also fugitives from them, and as good as themselves every way, both for audacities, and also for neediness to let upon any bold adventure whatsoever. This power of men he commanded should be lead to waste and spoil the Brittish country first, and then to lie against the City Carthage, and to assault it. They having performed this service, not only willingly and cheerfully, but also with greediness, having also chased away and rifed the husbandsmen and peasants of the country, assailed the City with a forcible means, Marcellus stirred up and provoked by those letters of the Conful: and having a good opinion of his own that of all the Roman Captains there was not one able to match Annibal as himself, left his wintering standig Camp, the sooner as ever there was lorrage and grain in the country, took the field, and encountered Annibal at Cannæ. Now was Anniбал in hand with the Cannibals, and intollid them to revolt. But hearing one that Marcellus approached, he dislodged from thence. The country thereabout was plain and open, without any covert places to betake an ambush, and to lay trains in therefore he began to retire himself from thence into the woodland parts, Marcellus tracked him still, and followed him hard at heels, and encamped close upon him: and ever as he had fortified and entrenched himself, he brought forth his men into the field, ready for battle. Anniabal entertaining small skirmishes with certain Cornets and troops of horsemen, and with light appointed footmen, that lanced darts and javelins, thought it not necessary yet to come unto a pight bet bat the ventu are all upon one throw. Howbeit he was drawn to a fight, maugre his head which he had laboured to avoid it. For being gone afore one night, Marcellus overtook him upon a plain and open ground: and so he was pitching his tents he kept him from fortiifying, by charging his pion-ners and labourers on every side. Whereupon they came to a very battal and fought with all the forces they had on both sides: and when it grew toward night, they departed alander on even hand: but before it was dark they had encamped not far on one another, and in great hale made flut to fortiﬁsh themselves. The next morning by day light Marcellus came forth into the field with all his power: neither refused Anniabal the challenge, having with many words comforted 4 him and encouraged his soldiers to remember Thraemomus and Cannæ, to cut the comb and bear down and come this fell stomack and lusty courage of the enemy: who preferveth still (quoth he) and seeketh upon, nor suffering unto march on quietly in our journey, nor to pitch our tents: giving us no leave to breath ourselves, nor to time to look about us. There is not a morning but to soon as the sun is up in the horizon to give light to the world, the Roman army is out in the K 5 ﬁeld to give us battle. If we could draw blood of him once: and set him out of the ﬁeld with bleed about his ears, he would for ever after fight more quietly, and take better leisure with him. With their and such like comfortable words and effectual remonstrances they were very animated: as a very provoking seeing themselves thus molested by the enemy, who day by day nev-er ceased to challenge and brave them still: whereupon they began a fierce and cruel battel. They had now continued ﬁght two or two hours and then began the Roman Cavalry from the right wing, and the extraordinary soldiers that ﬂanked the main battel, to give ground and dismount, Which Marcell, perceiving he brought forward the eighteenth legion in the vanguard, and whiles one retreated back fearfully, others came forward but slowly, the whole battel was put out of order, and disarrayed: and at length it was discomfited: and for that fear surmounted shame, L 6 they turned their backs and fled away again. S lain there were in the conﬁdence. and in the rout together some 2700 Citizens and Allies one with another: amongst them, there were four Ro- 7 man Centurions, and two Colonels, Marcus Licinius, and Marcus Fufius. Of military geniuses, there were four loth of that right wing which ﬁrst shrank and lost ground: and two other's of that legion which came to succour their fellows that gave back and retreated. Marcellus after that he was returned into the Camp, welcomed his soldiers with such a bitter and sharp Oration, that the very words of the Generall in his anger and wrath were more heavy and grievous unto them, than the conﬁdence it felt, which they had unfortunately endured all the day long before, "I yield praise yet, and render thanks to the immortal gods, (quoth he) as I may in such a case, that our 8 enemies having vanquished & conquered you in the ﬁeld, and driven you so great fear to run M headlong within your trenches & gates, came not with all at once to affall the camp. For surely in the same manner, which you found for battle, ye would likewise have abandoned your tents & pavilions, What is the provocation of your enemies? How cometh it to pass, that ye should so forget all on a sudden, both your own selves and them with whom ye have to ﬁght? Why surely, they are the same enemies & no other. Whom the summer past, ye did nothing but either vanquish & overcome, or else pursuit & follow in chase: whom for these certain days past, ye have been ready to tread on their heels as they fled and ran away before you both by day & night; whom in light skirmishes ye have discomfited: whom no longer ago than yesterday, ye suffered neither to march forward, nor to pitch your camp. I fear not to speak, and I praise in silence those things which in good right ye may stand upon & make N your boast. I say nothing of that which ye ought to be ashamed & displeased with your selves, namely, how but yesterday ye brake off the ﬁght on even hand, and retired out of the ﬁeld, when the enemy had got no advantage? What hast this one night, or what hast one day cut you off? Are either your forces in this mean time abridged & diminished, or your enemies aug- mented & encrated? Now ﬁrly, I think, I speak not to mine own army, nor to Roman fou- diers, Only ye carry about you the fame bodies & armour that ye were wont. For if ye had born the same minds and hearts with you, should the enemies ever have seen your backs? Should they have taken either banner from any company, or ensign from cohort & squadron? Are you 0 yet the enemy never wanted and made boast of the defeat of our Roman legions. You are the very ﬁrst that this day have given him the honour of discomfiting and putting to ﬂight our army. Then they all cried out and besought him to pardon that day's defect, and to make trial once again of his soldiers courage when and wherefoever he would, Mary, and that I will (quoth he) my soldiers: I will put you to it; even to morrow I will bring you abroad into the field, and after we have got the victory ye shall obtain that pardon which ye now crave. So he gave order, that those cohorts which had lost their ensigns should have the allowance of barley in head of wheat: and for those Centurions of the bands or companies, whose banners were A were loft, them they degraded in this manner: he caused them to be disarmed, and their skins to be drawn naked and taken from them, and let them go and thike their ears. And withal, he made proclamation that the next day they should all present themselves in readiness, as well footmen as horsemen. Which done, he dismissed the audience, and they all confessed and acknowledged, that they were justly and worthily thus checked and rebuked: and that there was not that day one man in the Roman army, sitting aside the General himself only, but he was bound to make amends and satisfaction, either with a sending heart-burn, or acquiring a noble victory. The morrow after they all threw themselves unto him in their armor, and well appointed, according to his commandment. The General commanded them for their forwardness: and gave them to understand, that he wou'd set those in the forefront of the vanguard, which the day before being to run away as also those cohorts like wise that lost their ensigns. And now he gave them warning, and charged them all to fight it out bravely, to win the field: and to endeavour and strain themselves, both all and some, that the news of yeilding eyes flight came not to Rome before, and presented the same of this dayes victory. Then he willed them to go to their meat: and to strengthen their bodies: that in case the fight should hold long, they might be able to endure to the end. Now when all was said and done, that might encourage and stir up the hearts of footmen: they went out & advanced their ensigns into the field, Annibal being advertis'd thereof. Now believe me (od, he) we have to deal with an enemy indeed, who is of that nature, that he can neither brook his good fortune, nor away with bad. If he hath won at any time, he pursueth those whom he hath vanquish'd cruelly. Contrary-wise if he have lost, he beginneth to fight with the consternation. Querus again right freely. Then he commanded the trumpeters to sound, and brought forth his power in battle array. A field was sought there on both hands more sharly a good deal than the day before. The Carthaginians strived to keep the honor and reputation of yeilding eyes flight the Romans strained to wipe away the ignominy and shame of that dayes lost. On the Romans side, the Cavalry of the left wing, and those cohorts which had lost their ensigns, fought in the vanguard, and the twentieth legion was marshalled and ranged in the right point of the battle.

L. Corn. du Lentulus and C. Claudius Nord had the leading of both these wings, M. Marcellus himself commanded the main battalion, and within his personal presence encouraged them, as witness of their valour and courage. Now, when as the fight had continued long, and the victory inclined no way, Annibal commanded the Elephants to be put forth upon the very forefront of the battle, to see if that object might possibly work some terror and confusion among the Romans. And at the first they disordered the ensigns, and troubled the ranks; so as partly by treading under foot, and partly by battering them for fear that were all about them had laid naked and open the battle in one part, and in more places than had the Romans fled but that C. Decimus Flaminus, a Colonel, having from the first band of the Hattari, caught up the banner in his hand, commanded the company thereto belonging to follow him: and thither he led them where the foresaid Elephants were gathered round and made foulest work, and charged them to fling their darts and javelins at them. All this shot light fire, and milled them not, yea, and some stuck in them: and no marvel, for the beasts were near at hand: the bodies great and standing thick in a plump together. But as they were not all wounded, so they that had the darts fell in their backs and sides, were as ready (such is their nature, dangerous to meddle withal) for to hurt their own masters, as the enemies: and all turned upon their fellows that were unhurt, and drove them back. So as now, not that entire band only, but every foeldier els for his own part, who was able to reach the herd (as it were) of the Elephants as they fled, did his best to lance javelins and short darts at them, and so much the more furiously ran the beasts upon their own, and made a far greater havoc there than they had done among the enemies: by how much more fiercely fear and fright let them agate, and sent them forward, than the will of their masters that fell upon them, was able to move and restrain them. The Roman footmen, enjoyng this advantage, came forward with their ensigns and banners upon that battaillon, which was put in distanter by the running to and into these mutually dumb creatures: and without much ado and further skirmish, put them to flight, after they were once broken out of their ranks, and fell in a fright. Then Marcellus lent his Cavalry after them as they fled, and to follow the chace, and never gave they over hunting and courting them, until they had lodged them in great fear within their camp. For besides all other things, which made them thus scared and affrighted, there charged two Elephants to fall down in the very gate & entrance thereof; so that the foeldiers were forced to rush into it over the trench and rampier. In that place was the greatest slaughter made of the enemies. For there were slain eight thousand men, and five Elephants. Neither had the Romans a blinding victory of it: for of the two legions, there died fai'd upon 1700, and of the Allies more than 1400. Besides many a citizen and confederate force wounded. And Annibal the next night dislodged and departed, Marcellus although he was devious to follow upon him, yet he could not for the multitude of his hurt men. The spoils that were sent out to pursue him in his march, brought word back the next day, that Annibal took his way into the Bruttian country.

Near about the same time, the Hirpines, Lucanis, and Volcensis, after they had deliv'd up the garrison of Annibal: which they had in their Cities, yeilded themselves also to Q. Fulvius the Consul: and were received to mercy with great clemency by the said Consul, after some rebuke given them in words only for their trepangs and errorfull part. The Bruttian also had the like hope of pardon, when as Vibius & Fulvius, two brethren, of the noblest house of that nation, came from them.
them to sue for the same condition of yielding and surrendering themselves, which was granted unto the Lucanes.

Q. Fabius the Consul, won by assault a Town in the Salentins country called Manduria. Prisoners were taken there 4000, and some good store of other pilage. From thence he went to Tarentum, and in the very mouth of the haven, lay against the City. Those ships which Livius had for to wait the convey of victuals, he partly charged with engins, and other ordnance to assault Towns withal, and partly furnished with artillery, with stoves, and shot of all sorts: the ships of burden likewise, and not the Gallies only which were guided by oars: to the end, that some might bring Engins and Ladders unto the walls, and others aloof from out of the ships, wound and hurt those that defended the City. Those ships were ordained and appointed from the open Sea to assault the City. And clear was the Sea of all danger from the Punick navy, which I was sent unto Corcyra, at what time as Philip minded to affail the Ecelians. In this mean while, the assailants of Cambyses, a little before the coming of Amal vid, for fear left they should be surprized betokk themselves to a little hill: which as it was (for the present danger) a place of safety, so it wanted all things else. Fabius, as he lay at siege about Tarentum, was much helped to the achieving of a matter of great importance, by a trifling thing to speak of, and of small moment in it self. The Tarentins had a garrison of the Britians, sent from Amal vid to defend the City. The Captain of this garrison was greatly enamoured and ready to die for the love of a woman, who had a brother that served in the army of Fabius the Consul. He being certified by letters from his sister, of this new acquaintance that she had with that forraimer and stranger, so wealthy and so honorable a person among his country-men; conceived some hope by means of his sister, that her lover might be brought to any thing, and wrought as they would: and so acquainted the Consul with his conceived hope. And this seemed no vain imagination. Whereupon the young man was sent to Tarentum in habit and quality of a fugitive, and by the mediation of his sister, grew into some favour with the Captain aforefaid: and at first practised secretly to underciele and found his mind, and afterwards seeing the weakness and inconstancy of the man, he prevailed with him so much. through the flattering speeches and allurements of the woman, as to betray the keeping and guard of that place whereof he had the charge. After that the manner how, and the time when this plot should be put in execution, was agreed upon, the said fouldier was let out of the City close by night in a place between the corpor de guard and informed the Consul what was done already, and in what sort every thing was to be done. Fabius at the first watch, after he had given a token and watchword to them in the Caflle, and to those likewise that had the keeping of the haven, himself set a compass about the said haven, and lay as close as he could to that part of the City which lieth to the Eaf. Then all at once the trumpets sounded from the Caflle, from the haven and ships, which in the open Sea rid neer at hand. Great houting there was, and much ado on lest purpose from all these quarters, whereas indeed there was left danger or none at all there. In the mean mean the Consul kept his men in. Whereupon Democrates, who had before time been Admiral of the Armado, and whose chance it was to have the guarding of that place, against which the Consul lay close, seeing all thereabout quiet enough, and no stirring at all, and hearing all other parts toiring again and refted with such alarms as otherwheres it seemed the City was taken and won, and fearing lest if he war till and befirver not himfelf, the Consul would make some Camidado, and give the allay to enter the City with banner displayed; withdrew his guard toward the Caflle, from whence was heard the greatest and most terrible noife. Fabius, when he perceived once by gueffing at the time, as also by the silence it fell in that place (for where but a while before they kept much ado, raising up one another, and calling to arm, there now all was hufht and not a wordl) that the guards were had away from thence, he commanded that the ladders should be brought to that side of the wall, where the brocher & broker both of the trea- ron, had brought word that the cohorts of the Britians were quatered and kept their guard. Thus on that part was the wall won by the means of the Britis, who were ready to help and take them up, and so they got over into the City. Then was the next gate broken open, that the army might come by companies under their several colours. Whereupon they let up a shout, and a little before break of day, they marched as far as into the market head, and met with none to make head against them, and cauld all them that fought at the Caflle and the haven, to turn upon them. There, in the very entrance of the market place, began a great skirmish, rather fought hotly than mainained thorowly. For the Tarentin fouldiers were nothing comparable to the Romans, either in courage of heart, or goodness of armours; in skill and knowledge of war, or in lutfines and strength of body. And therefore when they had only fhot their darts, even before they came to handtohand, they turned back and flunk away through the lanes of the City, where with they were well acquainted, came to their own home and fome to their friends houses. Two of their Captains, Nice and Democrates, fought manfully, and were slain. Philomenus, who was the principal head that wrought the revolt unto Amal vid, fled out of the skirmish as fast as ever his horse would carry him: but a while after his empty horse was seen & known wandering alay in the City, but his body could never be found. It was commonly believed, that he flung himself headlong from his horseback into a certain open pit, As for Carp holo, Captain of the Punick garrison, he cast away his amour and weapon, and as he was coming to the Conful with a godly tale, recounting and remembering his fathers friendship and entertainment to the Romans, there hapned a fouldier to meet him and strike off his head. Then by some or other in every place, the Carchaginians and Tarentins Tarentum, both went to wrack, and were killed without mercy and regard, as well unnarmed as armed. Yes, there were many of the Bruttians also fell upon the edge of the word, were it that they were mislikken, or for an old grudge and in-bred hatred: or to suppreffe and extinquish the bruit and rumor that went of betraying the Town: so that Tarentum might seem from the other won by assault and force of arms. Then from murder and slaughter they fell to lack and spoil the City. There were taken prisoners by report thirty thousand head of slaves: a mighty mass of silver tried and coined: of gold 87000 pound weight. Images and painted tables or pictures, to as many near amounted to the number of Syracusas, But Fabius of a braver mind, abstained from that kind of prize and pillage, which Marcellus for bare not. For when his Scribe or Secretary asked him, what his pleasure was, should be done with the images (and the Statues they were of the Gods, of a mighty bigness and proportion, portrayed every one in their own habit like warriors): Mary (ed he) let the Tarentins have their angry Gods kill among them, for me. After this, the wall which divided the City from the Cattle, was dismantled, raited down, and laid even with the ground.

Whilest these things happened at Tarentum, Archid (after they had yeelded themselves unto him that beheld Coranias) hearing of the siege and affaynt of Tarentum, went night and day and made all the hall he could, with a running mat. to rescue & scour the City: but hearing by the way that it was forced and gone, * Ali, I fee welléd he, the Romans also are not without their Armful, In good faith, fo was Tarentum won, and to lost again, by treachery and treason. But be-cause he would not be thought to turn back & file, in the very same place where he made the fall down, and encamped almost five miles from the City: and after he had abode there some time, he retirèd himself to Metapontum. From thence he sborne two Metapontins, and lent them to Fabius at Tarentum, with letters desised from certain principal men of that City, wherein they promised to betray Mepontum, and the Pennik garrison into the Cornifi his hand, upon assurance made unto them, that all former trepacket & elinces should be forgiven and forget ten. Fabius supposing all was truit and plain-dealing, appointed a certain day where he would come to Metapontum, and lent his letters also to those principal citizens, which letters were brought unto Metapontines, where he was right glad and took great contentment that his fraud passed so well, and that Fabius also might be entraped caught, and overftaken by his wily felches as well as others.

In the beginning of that summer wherein these occurrences happened, after that Scipio had be- stowed the whole winter, in winning and reconciling the hearts of the barbarious people, party, withagists and rewards, and partly with enlarging and rendering back their boughes, and the prisoners there came unto him one Edesio, a noble and famous Captain of the Spaniards. His wife and children were in custody with the Romans: but besides that occasion which brought him to Scipio, there was another cause, even a general inclination of all their minds, that they saw that changed I wit not, which withdrew and estranged whole Spain from the Carthaginian Empire, unto the Romans. The same season moved indultus also and Mardonius, the greatest I., and Princes no doubt of all Spain, to leave Africa, and with all the power they could make or his followers and kaffals, to depart into the mountains standing just over his camp, from whence they might from hill to hill continually retire themselves in fcury to the Romans. Archid supposing the pittance of his enemies to grow and increase still more and more by little and little, and his own to diminish; and fore-seeing, that unless he made some hardy adventure and prevailed that way, all would be nauful and all to the ground, as it was beginning already to reed, determined to put it to a battaille with all speed possible. Scipio also was sharpset, and the more detrons of fights well for the good hope, which the succèw of his former affairs confirmed and creasted; as also because, before the armes of his enemies should joyn together, he was more willing to fight with one General and one army than with all them joyntly at once, and yet he had well amended and encaled his forces politickly & purposely, against the worst, in case he should be driven to fight with them all together. From seeing ther was no vale of ships, because all the River and seas along Spain, were cleared of the Carthaginian navy, he withdrew his fleet upe into the harbor at Tarraco, and joined his Sea-serviters to his Land-soldiers. For liberty did more enough, which was either taken in the pillage of Carthage, or newly made after the winning of the Town, by to many Artificers and Craftsmen that he kept there hard and close at work. With this pow-er, Scipio in the beginning of spring departed from Tarraco (for now by this time was Lutre ex- turned from Rome, without whose company he was not willing to enterprise any service of great moment and importance) and led forward against the enemies. As he journeyed peaceably all over the country, and passed through the territo ries and confines of every City and State his Allies were ready to entertain and accompany him, Indubius also and Mardonius among the rest, with a great power met him. Then Indubius in the name of them both, spake, not like a forthright barbarian inoffibly & incensurately, but rather with a modest kind of gravity; more like one that excised his revolt and running from the adversie part upon contenst and necessity, than made it a boil of catching and embracing the vantage thereof upon the first opportunity presented. I know well (quoth he) that the very name of a fugitive revolt, it is odious and detestable to old Allies, so it is puerulent to new. And I cannot greatly blame the manner of men in so doing, in case it be not the bate name, but the double dealing that causeth the hatred. Then he recked up his own good turns and desires done unto the Carthaginians on the one side: and recounted their covetousness and pride on the other side; together with their injurious dealings with himself and his people. And therefore, quoth he, this body of mine only hath converted among them until this day, but my heart and affection hath long since been with them, where I believe verily, that right, justice and religion is regarded and maintained: for even to do we file as suppliants in humble manner to the Gods also, when we can no longer endure the viocence and wanton outrages of men. Beleewing Scipio this one thing withal, that this his starting from the enemy, and ranging with him, he would neither blame and condemn presently as a trangression, nor honor and commend as a good defect of his: but as he should find both him and the ret, by good proof from that day forward, even so to make reckoning of them accordingly, and not otherwise, Scipio made answer again: That in truth he would so do: neither would he take them for fugitives and runaways, who judged that they were not bound in conscience to maintain the society and alliance with them as good and lawful, who made no count at all to observe inviolable, any promise or duty to God or man. Then were their two wives and children brought forth into their sight, and delivered unto them, whom they received, and shed tears abundantly for joy, and so for that day they were had to their lodgings. The morrow after, faith was light and contracted between them, and the same confirmed by covenant: and they were diffusified to bring their forces, and to shew them before him: and so they quartered and lodged in the same camp with the Romans, until by their guidance and direction they came unto the enemy. The army of the Carthaginians next unto them was under the conduct of Ahenobar, near unto the City Batula. Before his camp, he kept certain standing guards of horsemen. Upon them the light armed forlorn hope of archers and darters of the Roman host which went before the battaill to skirmish, likewise they of the forefront and vanguard, charged forcibly with their short-sword to contemptuously, and in forcible wise, even presently upon their travail in journey, and before they had chosen a piece of ground to encamp in, that it was soon seen what heart there was in both parts. For, the Cavalry of the enemies fearfully fled, and were drien into the camp: but the Romans advanced with banners displayed, hard to the very gates: and so for that day their flamacks were only up and provoked to a fight, and then the Romans pitched their tents. Ahenobar in the night retired his army to a mount, which in the top had a broad plain. Behind this hill there ran a river the fore-front thereof, and the sides all about the skirts were compassed as it were with a steep bank (standing plumb upright), there lay under this hill top another plain, lower than the other which also was enclosed round about with the like bank, as difficult for ascent as for descent. The next day Ahenobar, after he saw the enemies standing arranged before their camp, fell down his Numidian-horsemen, the light armed lancers also of the Balears, and likewise the Africans. Then Scipio rode about all the regiments, envoys, and ranks of his army, marshalled as they stood in battail wise, and shewed unto them their enemies, how they despaired afore-hand to fight on equal and even ground, how they taking the vantage of the hills, bravely and fearfully, and trusted upon the place, and not upon their own valor and strength of arms. Howbeit (quoth he) Carthage had higher walls, and yet the Roman souldiers were able to scale and get over: neither Hills nor Castle, no, nor the very Sea, stood in their way then, nor stopped them of their entry. And as for these high places which the enemies were poised of, they hapy may serve their turns well, when they shall take their flight, and leap from off the steep banks, and run down-hill space, and so get away. But I trow, I shall debar them there, and lay a block in their way on every side. Whereupon he comdaded two squadrions, the one to keep the strifes of the valley, through which the river runneth: the other to bect the passage that leadeth from the City into the fields, and crostheth overwaft in the hill side aforesaid. Himself led the light appointed vancurriers, who the day before had dis-comfitted the guards and wards of the enemies, to affront the light armed souldiers, that were quartered in the nether brow of the hill, And first they passed through the roughs, and were not impeached nor hindered other wise than by the difficult passages. But afterward, when they were come within shot, at the very first they were welcomed with a mighty volley of allsorts, pouring (as it were) like hail upon them. Himself answered them again, and recharged upon them, letting drive and discharging the stones which lay strewed all over the ground, and were such in manner all, as might be welded and flung from them with ease. And not only the souldiers, but lackies and horse-boyes, &c such as followed the camp, were intermingled amongst the armed companies. And albeit the ascent up the hill was hard, and they were pelted and almost overwhelmed with darts and stones, yet being so inured as they were to clime walls, and resolute withal, they mounted up swiftly to the top: and so soon as they had got some even ground, where they might have sure footing, they found the enemy, (who was light and nimble, and able to run to and fro, and to save himself, and shift well when he was far off, all the time that they skirmished aloof, and paid upon one another with light shot) now that they came to close fight, and to hand-strokes, not able to stand his ground: and so they drove him from his place, and with great slaughter chased him and A let him back to the very battel, that ftood upon the higher hill, Then Scipio having given com-mmandment to thefe, to go to follow on the train of their victory, and to enter up till upon the main battel of the enemies, parted the reft of his forces, together with Lelius, willing him to coft Along and wheel about on the right hand of the mount, until he found some way of eaf: after himself on the left hand fetched no long circuit and compass, until he came crofs over thare part of the flank of the enemies, Hereupon fiil began their battel to be disordered, while they were defirous to turn their wings, and to oppofe their ranks and fquadrons againft the noife and throts which rang every where about them. In this tumultuous battel, Lelius allo was got up; and while the enemies drew backward and gave ground, becaufe they would not be charged behind on their back, the vanguard of their part was defplayed and lay open: and the Romains even of the mid-Bdle battel allo, had a lane and spacious room to get up and enter upon them: who never had been able to have gained the ground, and won the plain above, (considering the disadvantage of the deep bank) fo long as the ranks had ftood unbroken, and the Elephants were oppofed agait them before the Ensign, in the forefront. Down went the enemies now on every side, and were piecelfly killed: and Scipio, who with his left wing contrtuted the right, charged and plaid especially upon the naked fides of the enemies. And fo by this means; they had no way left them to fly and efcape clear. For the Roman guards on both hands, as well on the left as the right, had beat all the passages. And as for the gate of the camp, the General hisfelf, and the other Captains and officers of the Camp, had taken it up as they fled that way: besides the comber-forme trouble of the Elephants, whom being now affrighted, they feared no lefs then their ene-Cemies. So there died of them 8000, Asdrubal, who before the confifiic had made fure work with all the money, and taken it with him, fent the Elephants before, and having called as many as he could, of them that fled and efcape out of the camp, he made hafte along the river Tagt, toward the mountain Pyraenius, Scipio being now master of the enemies camp, after he had given to the fouldiers all the pillage and f spoil, but only the prisoners, fuch as were freamen: when he came to take the number of the captives, found they were ten thoufand footmen, and two thoufand horfe, Of which number, as many as were Spaniards he fent at liberty and fent them home without ranom. But as for all the Africans, he commanded the Treasurer to make money of them, Then the whole multitude of the Spaniards, as well thole that before had yeeded themfelves, as they that were taken prisoners the day before, valued him with great content and general voice, by the name and title of King, Whereupon Scipio, after silence made by the cryer, faid, "That he took the name of I. General or Commander, to be the greateft of all other names, by which his own fouldiers uscd to call him. For the title of King, howevcr in other places it was great and honorable, at Rome surely, it was odious and intollerable. For his own part, the mind indeed he caried of a King, and if they deemed it to be the highest honour that can fall to the nature of man, let them judge fo in their own hearts secretly, and pleafe themfelves with that rule: only he wished them to forbear the word and term thereof. These very Spaniards, as barbarous as they were perceived by this speech how haughty and magnanimous he was, who in the height of spirit conftained that as a bale thing, whereat in admiration only of the very title, all mortal men beftides are amazed and adorning. After all this, he beftowed upon the Princes and Great Potentates of the Spaniards, fundry gifts. And of the hories, whereof he had taken in the field and camp great store, he gave Indulgence the choice of three hundred where he would. When the treater was felling the Africians, according to the General his commandement, he happen'd upon a young fpringful and ftripling, of rare and singular beauty: and hearing that he was of royal blood, he lent him to Scipio. And when Scipio demanded of him who he was, and what country-man, and whereof at thole years he was in camp among rude fouldiers: he was (faith he) a Numidian born, (and with that his eyes fill of water) and in my country they call me Massinissa. Being left and orphan and fatherles, I was brought up with my grand-father by the mother fide, Gala-king of the Numidians, And with my uncle by the mother. Massinissa who was lately come with a power of horfemen to aid the Carthaginians, it was my hap to fall over into Spain. And F never to this day, have I been in any battel, by reafon that Massinissa would not in regard of my tender age, interfer me in any hand to go to the wars. Howbeit that very day when the battat was fought with the Romans, unwares to my fad uncle, I fecretly got an horfe under me, and amour upon my back, and went forth into the field; where my horfe chance to fall, and call me down headlong on the ground: and it was my fortune to be taken by the Romans, Scipio gave order that this Numidian youth should be kept safe, and to proceed to finifh matters that were brought before him, as he faw upon the Tribunal in martial court. And after he was came back from thence into his royal pavilion, he called the party againefl him and asked him, whether he were willing to return again to Massinissa. Whereat the tears gushing out of his eyes for joy, yes, full fain (yd. he) and with all my heart. Then after he had given the young gentleman a ring G of gold, a coat embroidered with purple floud-wife, with a Spanish fouldiers cape; a golden claf button & a brave courefier, with all the furniture & caparifon thereto belonging he lent him away, and commanded certain fpartmen to fafe conduct and accompany him, fo far as he would himfelf, Then Scipio fell to confult about the war. Some there were that advised him, presently to purifie Asdrubal, but he supposing that to be a dangerous contrife, for fear left Mago and the other Asdrub-kal should join their forces to his, he lent only a good guard to keep the paflage of the hill Pyre-neus, and imploied the rest of the summer, in receiving homage and feality of other States of Spain, Within

Within few days after the battle at Baucida, when as Scipio in his return to Tarascon, was gone past the chafe or forret of Celido: Afdroul the son of Gisgo and Mago, the two Generals, arrived out of the farther province of Spain unto Afdroul the son of Amilcar, But they came a day after the fair, and too late to help an overthrow past already: yet in very good time, to give counsel for the managing and executing of the war behind, There as they conferred together, concerning the disposition of the Spaniards, and how they should affect in the countries of each province, only Afdroul the son of Gisgo was of opinion, and perfwaid, That the utmost tract and coast of Span, which lieth upon the Ocean and Gades, was hitherto unaccompanied with the Romans, and therefore fall enough and sure to the Cartaghiams. But the other Afdroul and Mago, were of another mind, and agreed in this, That Scipio with his favours and benefits had possessed the affections and hearts of all men already, both in general, and also in particular, and that there would never be an end of sliding from them, and siding to the Romans, before that all the Spanish foudlids were either removed into the farthest parts of Spain, or conveyed over into France. And therefore albeit the Senat of the Cartaghiams had not granted out any such a and commission, yet there was no remedy, but that Afdroul must go over into Italy, where Annibal was the head of the war, and in whom lay the main chance of all: by which means also he might withdraw out of Spain all the Spaniards, far enough from the naming and hearing of Scipio. For Afdroul’s army, as well by daily falling away and revolting to Scipio, as also by the late defeat much empaired, was to be replenished again with new foudlids. Moreover, that Magna should deliver his army to Afdroul the son of Gisgo, and himsell in person cros over into the Balar K Islands, with a great fum of money, to wage new aids and cources from thence. And that Afdroul the son of Gisgo, with his army should retire farther up into Portugal, and not encounter the Romans at all in any hand. And that out of all the Cavality there should be chossn out the very flower and strength, to the full number of 5000, for Mafajaffa, and that he should range and overrun all the farther Province of Span, partly to help the diffettled Allies, and partly to spoil the enemies towns, and forage their lands. After these orders and directions let go down, the Generals departed adluer to the execution of their determined deigmen, Thus yeice what were the affairs and occurrences of Spain for that year.

At Rome the name of Scipio grew greater every day then other. Fabius for the winning of Tarentum, though he get it rather by craft and policy, then by force and vertue, was glorious therefore. The name of Fabius began to age and decay, Marcellus grew also into an ill name and some obloquy, both for that at first he had a foil, and also because he suffered Annibal to range over Italy at his pleasure, and himself at mid-winter had retired his foudlids to Venufa to take up there (as it were) their winter quarters. He had a fore adversary in the City, one C. Publius Buthin, a Tribune of the Commons; who from the very time of that dissimulation, with continual speeches and Orations brought Claudius into hatred and innamy with the common people, and now was in hand with them to deprive him of his government. Howbeit, the friends and kinsfolk of Claudius obtained thus much. That Marcellus leaving his Lieutenant at Venufa, should repair to Rome for to make his purgation, and acquit himself of such crimes as his adversaries objected and laid against him: and that during his absence, they should not treat nor debate about his depravation.

It hapned much about one time, that both Marcellus came to Rome (to meet with the shamefull orders that ran on him, and to save his honour) and also Q. Fabius the Consul, about the new election for the year following. The question touching the government of Marcellus, was debated and handled in the lills of Cirrus, called Flamininus, and a great assembly there was, and much concourse of the Commons, and of people of all degrees and calling. The Tribune accocnted not Marcellus only, but all the nobility by whole grandulat praty, and by whole cold and delayful proceedings, it was come to pass, that Annibal now these ten years had remained in Italy (as it were) in his province continually, where he had had a greater part of his life, then at Carthage in his native country. And now (unto he) the people of Rome safte the fruit, proceeding of proroguing and continuing of government still in one person. For see what is come of it: Marcellus his army had been twice defeated and fallen upon the enemies sword: and now, fortooth, is houfed in Venufa for fun burning. But Marcellus to continue this acculatory speech of the Tribune, by reconning his own worthy noble acts: that not only the Bill preferted for the depoing him out of his room, was damaufled, and the neck of it broken, but also the next day after, all the Centuries with one general voice created him Consul. There was joined with him companion in government T. Quintus Cripilus, who then was Pretor. The morrow after were the Pretors chosen, to wit P. Licinius Crassus Dives, who was at that time the Arch-bishop, P. Licinius Varrus, Sex. Flavius Calar, and Q. Claudius Flamen.

During the time of this solemn Parliament or Session for the election of Magistrates, the City was much dignified for the revok of Herennius, C. Calpurnius, who ruled that province as Pro- pretor, had by his letters given notice, that the beginning thereof arose from the Aretons: and therefore immediately M. Marcellus the Consul elect, was therfor sent with commification to look into the matter, and (as he thought it requisite) to lend for his forces, and to translate the war out of Apulia into Toscan. For fear whereof, the Tuscans pul’d in their heads, and were quiet. The Tarentine Embassadors made suit for peace, and that together with their freedom they might enjoy their own laws. And this answer was returned by the Senat, That they should come again when Fabius the Consul was returned to Rome. The Roman Games, and also the players called A called Plebeii, were exhibited that year, and rented one day apace more then ordinary. The Ediles of the chair were L. Cornelius Cubianus, and Servilius Sulphius Galba: but those of the Commons were C. Servilius, and Q. Cestius Metellus. As for Servilius, it was denied, that he had been Tri-bun of the Commons before, or now Edile by right and order of law, because it was now for certain known, that his father (of whom the opinion went current for ten years that he was slain by the Bolans about Mutina at what time as he was Triumvir for the division of lands) was now living, and in the hands of the enemies in flavery and bondage.

In the eleventh year of the Punick war, M. Marcellus entered his comitialship the fifth time (to you reckon upon that Comitialship which he never bare through, because there was an error comnitted in his creation) and with him T. Quintinius Crispinus. To both Comiti the Province of Italy was alligned, and both armies of the Comiti the former year. There was a third army then at Venetia, whereas M. Marcellus had the conduct. Of the three, they were to choose two, which they would; and the third remaining, was to be committed unto him, who was by lot to have the government of Tarrentum, and the Salentin. The rest of the Provinces were thus divided among the Pretors. P. Licinius Varus had the jurisdiction civil, and P. Licinius Crassus, then Pontifex Max, that of the foreigners, and to go whither ever the Senate should think good to send him. Unto Sex. Julia Cesar bettel Sicily, and to Q. Claudius Flamen the City of Tarrentum. Q. Ful-vinius Floccus had his comination renewed, to continue in government for one year longer; and he was appointed to govern Capua, which had been the charge of T. Quintinius the Pretor, and to have under his hand the command of one legion. Likewise C. Hofilius Tubulus remained still in office, and as Pro-pretor he should succeed C. Calpurnius, and have the conduct of two legions. Moreover, L. Veturius Philo had his authority & government confirmed to him anew; that as Propretor he should fit Lord Deputy in the same province of France, and have the same two legions as before, when he was Pretor there. The like decree that was granted for L. Veturius, fell also in the Senat for C. Aurunculies, and a bill was propounded unto the people for the proproning and conmiinance of his office, who as Pretor ruled the Province of Sardinia, with the Strength of two Legions. And for the safety and defence of the said Province he had an addition of ships of war, which, P. Scepo had went out of Spain, P. Scepo likewise and M. Sullanis, held still, by virtue of a decree, their provinces of Spain, and commanded the same armies for one year longer.

As for Scepo, he had direction to send over into Sardinia fifty ships, out of those eighteen which he had under his hand, either taken with him out of Italy or won from the enemy at Carthage, because there ran a rumor, that there was great preparation at Carthage for a navy that year, and that the Carthaginians would take up, and fill all the sea coast of Italy, Sicily and Sardinia, with an Armado of two hundred fall. In Sicily the government was divided in the same manner, Sex.

uus Cesar had the leading of the Cannian army; M. Valerius Lecritus (for his government also was confirmed for a year longer) the charge of that fleet of sewnty ships, which rid about Sicily; with commission to add therto, those thirty ships which the former year lay before Tarrentum and this Armado consisting of one hundred fall, to put over into Africa, if he thought to go good, and there to forragge and fetch bootes. Over and besides, P. Sulpicius was for one year longer to continue in office, and to govern the provinces of Macedonia and Greece, with the force of the said

Navy which he had before. As touching the two legions which remained about the City of Rome, there was no alteration. Only the Comiti were permitted to levy and enrol a new supply as need should require, Thus the Empire and State of Rome for that year was maintained with the power of 21 legions, P. Licinius Varus the Pretor of the City, was charged to repair those thirty old ships, which lay at Hipo, and to furnish twenty new built, with sjailers and mariners, that with this Armado of fifty sail he might be able to defend all the sea coast near unto the City of Rome.

C. Calpurnius was forbidden to remove his forces from Arretium, before a successor came in his place. The same order was given to Tubulus, and to have especially a vigilant eye, that no commotion arose from thence. And then the Pretors went into their provinies.

F As for the Comiti they were troubled in mind and made some request of confidence to go to their provinces, upon the report of some prodigious and ominous signs, and because all their sacrificices they found not the gods so propitious and favourable unto them. For out of Compania news came, that in Caput two Temples to wis, of Fortune and Mars, and also some Tombs and Sepulchers, were smitten with lightning: and besides (see how vain and preposterous superstition, impetueous the least trifling things to the hand of God) that certain Mice, toothoth, in a Chappel of Jupiter gnawed the gold, Also that in Calpurnia, a great swarm of Bees settled in the very market place. Moreover, that the Wall and one of the Gates at Hipo was blasted in brick and lightning. That in Cæs, a Gripe fled into the Church of Jupiter, That at Volsci there was a pool flowed with blood. In regard of these strange and wondrous tokens, there was a devout supplication for one day. And for certain days together, greater beastes were killed for sacrificices, without any good token: and for a long time the grace and favour of the gods could not be obtained. But yet the fortune of the Common-wealth stood full upright, and all this anger and mi-lchief pretended by those wonders, light upon the head of the Comiti alone, and their death excluded all the rest. The Plays called Apollinariis, in the year of Q. Fulvius and Ap. Claud. Comifes, had been by P. Cornel, Sulla Pretor of the City, first exhibited: after whom all the Pretors ever after did the like. But they vowed them a year before, and performed them on a day uncertain.

The same year happened a grievous plague both in the City and in the Countrys about, which yet in the end turned rather to long and chronick diseases, then to sharp and deadly maladies. For in this pestilence there was not only lewmen going in procession, in all the high streets, carriages, and crows ways throughout the City: but also P. Licinius Fatus Praetor of the City, was commanded to propound unto the people, that the Plays above said should be vowed for ever against a hot and determinat day. Himself therefore was the first that vowed them, and exhibited them upon the third day before the Nones of July, and the same day ever after was observed and kept holiday for that purpose.

As the rumor of the Areatus revolt encreased dayly greater, so the LL. of the Senat were careful about it every day more then other. Letters therefore were sent unto C. Helvidius, that he should without delay take pledges of the Areatus: and C. Terentius Varro was sent with commission, to receive the laid hostages at his hands, and to bring them to Rome. He was no sooner come, but Helvidius pretext commanded that one legion, which lay in camp before the town, should enter the City with banner displayed, and there he put sufficient guards in places convenient. Then having called and summuned the Senat to appear in the market place, he demanded of them hostages. And when the Senat required but two days relit to consider of the matter, he made proclamation, that either they should deliver them presently, or else the next day he would leaze upon all the Senaturs children every one. Then he commanded the Colonels, the Captains of the Allies, and the Centurions, to ward the Gates, that none might go forth of the City by night. But this was harkly and negligentely excuted, for seven principal Senaturs, before the warders were set at the gates, escaped forth with their children before night. The morrow morning by break of day, when the Senat began to be creed into the Common Hall, those parties were emiffed, and their goods confiscat, and fold in port-falle. Of the rest of the Senaturs, their children were taken hostages to the number of 150, and were delivered to C. Terentius for to be conveyed to Rome: who when he was come into the Senat, made such a great demonstration of the matter, that the imputation of their revolt was much more pregnant then it was. And therefore, as some instruction had like to come from Tuscain, C. Terentius himself was commanded to conduct one of the two legions about the City of Rome unto Areatus, and there to lie in garrison with it for to keep the town in order. And it was thought meet that C. Helvidius with the army beside, should turn and visit the whole Province, and to be careful and circumstamed, that no occasion or opportunity might be given unto them, that were minded to seek alteration and to rebel. C. Terentius so soon as he was come to Areatus with the legion, when he called unto the Magistrates for the keys of the gates, and they made answer that they were but mistafte aside and could not be found; supposing that they were rather cautiously laid out of the way for the nonce, than left by negligence, caused other keys and locks to be made, and set upon every gate: and took as great heed and care as he could, to have all under his own hand. He gave especial warning also to Helvidius as touching the Tuscan, and told him, that he should never hope to rett in security, that they would not rebel, unless he took order with them beforehand, that they possibl could not rebel.

After this, there was much debate and contention in the Senat about the Tarentins, even before Fabius, whiles himself excused and defended them whom he had conquered and subdued by force and arms: but others were mightily offended with them, yea, and molt of them gave out plainly, that they were full as faulty as the Campans, and deserved no les punishment. And so there was an act of the Senat granted according to the opinion and advice of M. Acinius, that the town should be held with a garrison, and all the Tarentins kept from flirring out of the City: and that the matter should further be debated and decided at another time, when the state of Italy stood in better terms of peace and quietness. And the like contention and variance was among the LL. of the Senat touching M. Licinius Contabile and Captain of the Castle of Tarentum, whereas some were of mind to condemn him as in great fault, because through his carelessnesses and sloth, Tarentum the City was betrayed to the enemy: others again awarded him good consideration and reward, for that he kept the fort so well by the space of five years, and by his means specially and by none elle Tarentum was recovered. But some were of opinion between these and said, that the discussing and determination of that matter pertained properly to the Centfots and not to the Senat: of which judgement Fabius also himself was. And this moreover he said, that he must needs confels, that true it was, which Licinius his friends in the Senat stood so much upon, and iterated so often; namely, that he was the only means that Tarentum was recovered: for in good faith, quoth he, it never could have been regained if it had not once been left before.

T. Quirinius Crispinor one of the Consuls, went to the army which Q. Fulvius Flaccus had with a new supply into the Lucan country, but Marcellus still was laid behind upon occasion of new scruples of confidence, and sundry objects that troubled his mind, and kept a hammering in his head one after another. Amongst which, this was one, that having vowed in the Gauls war at Clusium, a Temple to Honor and Virtue: the dedication of the said Church was hindered by the Bishops, who said, that one Chappel, by right and according to their ceremonies, served but for one Saint, and could not be consecrated unto more. For in case it should be blasted and smitten by fire from heaven, or otherwise some prodigious token hap therein, hardly could the right expiation and purging thereof be performed, because it might not be known, to which of the Saints or gods the sacrifice should be done; for by order one sacrifice could not serve twain, unless there were some particular and especial gods named. So there was pain to be another Chappel built.
A built for _Verres: _but great half there was made for the rearing thereof, and yet it was not his fortune ever to dedicate those chappels. So at length he let forward and put himself on his journey with a supply, unto the army which he had left the year before at _Vernia._

When _Crassus_ minded to assault _Locri_ in the country of the Bruttians, because there were a great name of _Fabius_ for the assailing and winning of _Tarentum_, he sent for all kind of artillery and engines out of Sicily, and ships also were brought from thence, to better that part of the City that lieth to the Sea side. But the enterprise went not forward, because _Annibal_ had removed, with all his forces to _Lacauni._ And besides, the news went that his colleague had already brought out his forces from _Vernia_, with whom he was desirous to join. And therefore he returned out of the Bruttians country into _Apulia_; and so between _Vernia_ and _Brutis_, the Consuls encamped severally, within three miles one from the other. _Annibal_ likewise was retired into the same county, considering that the war was turned from _Locri_. There the Consuls (hot men of nature both) almost every day led forth their men into the field, not doubting but if _Annibal_ once met them (having two Consular armies joyned together) to make a dispatch of the war once for all. _Annibal_ because the year before, he had twice affronted _Marcellus_, and both given and taken the field: like as he had great reason, as well to fear as to hope: if he were to encounter and fight with him alone: so he thought verily, that he was never able to make his part good with both the Consuls together.

And therefore laying off his Lyons skin, he took himself wholly to his old Foxes coat, and bought all means and opportunities to lay a train for to entrap them. Howbeit there passed some light skirmishes between both their camps, with variety of fortune and interchangeable successes. By which, the Consuls thinking that they should hold out and keep the enemies play, during the summer season, and yet nevertheless be able to assault _Locri_, wrote unto _L. Crassus_, that he should take the _Sessi_, and cross over with his fleet out of Sicily to the City of _Locri_. And to the end that the Town might be likewise assailed from the Land side, they commanded part of the army which lay in garrison at _Tarentum_ to be conducted thither. _Annibal_ having intelligence afore-hand of these things, by certain Thaurins, sent forth certain of his forces to beat the ways from _Tarentum_. And there under the side of the Petullian mount, he betook secretly in ambush two thousand horse, and three thousand foot. Upon whom the Romans (matching without their elipsals sent afore them) chanced to light, and were slain to the number of two thousand, and upon twelve hundred alive taken: the rest were scattered and fled over the fields and forrests back to _Tarentum_. Now there was a little hill between both the camps of the Carthaginians and Romans, and the fame all overgrown with wood, which at first was possessed and kept, neither by one nor other: because the Romans knew not the situation of that side which lay toward the enemies camp: and _Annibal_ supposed verily that it was a place fitter for to lay an ambush, than to encamp in: and therefore he went by night for that purpose, certain troops of Numidians, and betook them closely in the midst of the wood, and not one of them stirred all the day long out of their standings; for fear lest either their armour or themselves might be eloped a far off. In the Roman camp, every man generally was of mind, and let not to lay, that the said hill was to be seized and fortified for their use, with a good forrest built upon it, for fear lest if it were first gained by _Annibal_, they should have the enemy as it were over their heads resolute to annoy them. And _Marcellus_ himself was of the same opinion: whereupon, _Why go not we ourselves in person (quoth he, to his colleague) with some few horsemen, to view and consider the place, where our eyes shall be all our judges; and seeing the ground once, we shall resolve more certainly what course to take? _Crassus_ liked well of the motion: and so they went forward accompanied with two hundred and twenty horsemen of which forty were Fregellans, the rest all _Tucians_. There followed after them, _M. Marcellus_, the Consul his son, and _Aulus Manlius_, two Colonels: also _L. Areminius_ and _M. Aulus_, two Captains of the allies. Some Authors have set down in writing, that _Marcellus_ in the _Col_, sacrificed that day; and when the first beast was killed, the liver was found without an head: however in the second, all things appeared that were wont to be seen. In the head of that liver there shewed _Iam wot not how_, a kind of extraordinary excrecence: which the Soothsayer had no liking to, because after those inwards which seemed before short, unperfect, and misliking; now those again were seen too well fed and overgrown. But the Consul _Marcellus_ was so hot and desirous to fight with _Annibal_, that he thought himself never encamped near enough unto him. And even then also as he went forth out of the camp, he gave order to his souldiers to be ready at a short warning, and have their eye upon the place: that presently, if he liked the hill, for which they went to view, they should dislodge, turn up bag and hagase, and follow presently. Now there was a little flat and plain ground before the camp, from whence the way that led unto the said hill, was on every side very open and evident to the eye: where there lay a Scot or Spic, set of purpose to discover any of the enemies gone far from the camp, illagling and ranging abroad, either for fewel or forage; that they might be intercepted; and not for any hope of to great effect as fell out. This fellow gave a sign unto the Numidians, that all at once they should arise out of their lurking and darting holes. And they that from the top & ridge of the hill, were to ride & shew themselves about, never appeared & made head, before that they had set a compass about, for to shut up the passage at the back of the Romans, And then from all parts they began to start up & with a main shout charged & ran upon them. The _Con_, now were in that valley, from whence they neither could possibly get up to the pitch of the hill, posseted aforehand by the enemy nor had any place of safe retreat behind, for that they were invironed & hemmed in on every side. Howbeit they might have maintained skirmish and held out a good while, but that the Tusculans began to run away, and put all the rest in a body forth. Yet the Fregellans, falling. as they were of the Tusculans, gave not over, but fought manfully, (for long as the Consul stood on foot unbear'd) and received the charge of the enemies, encouraging their people, and fighting themselves right valiantly. But when they saw once both their Consuls wounded, and Marcus also run through with the path of a lance, and falling from his horse ready to die: then they also (and few of them God was not remained alive). together with the Consul Crispinus (who was wounded with two javelins) and young Marcus, who was himself also before, fled away and escaped. There were slain in this skirmish: A. Massilius a Colonel, of the two Captains of allies, and M. Plutus was killed out-right, and L. Vatimus taken prisoner. As for the Lieutenants belonging the Consuls, five of them then fell alive into the hands of the enemies: the rest were put to the sword, or escaped with the Consul. So there were three and forty horsemen died either in the conflict, or in the flight, and eighteen taken prisoners. In the camp there was much ado, and crying out for to go and succour the Consuls; when they saw one of them, and the other his son grievously hurt, and the poor remnant of that unfortunate expedition, coming toward the camp. The death of Marcus was much pitied and lamented in many other respects, but for this especially: that he, a man of that age (for he was now above three-score years old) and who should have had more wit: an old Captain and Leader (I say) that should have had more wisdom and foresight, so unadvisedly had brought both his colleague together with himself, and also in manner the whole commonwealth into desperate a danger. I should make much circumstance, and fetch many turns and compasses about one point, if it would rehearse all that writers have diversly let down, as touching the death of Marcus. But to let all others go, L. Calvis delivereth the thing three manner of wise: the one by hearst only, and a general report: the other extant in an Oration of the praise of Marcellus, penned by his own son, that was himself present at the action: the third, which Calvis himself calleth upon his own knowledge, and after diligent inquiry into the matter.

But howsoever the voice and fame varieth in some circumstances, most of them jump in the occasion. That he went forth of the camp to view the place: and all agree of the event. That he was entrapped and so slain. Annibals supposing that the enemies were mightily terrified, as well by the death of the one Consul, as the hurt of the other: because he would take all advantage, and omit no good opportunity offered, forthwith removed his camp, and pitched upon the very hill where he had fought. There he found the corps of Marcellus, and caused it to be entered. with punchion poles, or with darts and javelins flew them, so Amphil caught in his own shares, was fain to depart.

He went from thence to levy and raise the siege before Locri, which Town Cincius bequeathed redightly, and allotted most tolerably, having raised fabrics about it, and planted all kind of engines, artillery, and ordnance against it, which were brought thither out of Sicily, Magos who began already to distrust that he should not be able to defend and keep the City, conceived now the first hope of better, when he heard once of the death of Marcellus. And then there came also a messenger with news, That Amphil having sent afore him the horsemen of the Numidians, followed after himself in person, as falt as he could, with the power of the footmen. And therefore so soon as he perceived, by a sign given from the hill tops, that the Numidians approached him, he set to and raised the gate open, and sudainly fell on both upon the enemy with great violence. At the first the skirmish was doubtful; more because he came upon them at unawares, than for that he was equal to match them in strength: but afterwards, when the Numidians charged them besides, the Romans were so terrified, that they fled here and there in every place to the sea and their ships, leaving their fabrics and engins wherewith they had shaken and battered the walls. So by the coming of Amphil the siege brake up before Locri.

Crispiones, after he was advertised that Amphil was gone into the Britains country, commanded Marcus Macellus a Colonel or knight Marshal, to lead away unto Venusia, the army which had been commanded by his Colleague now deceased. Himself went to Capua with the legions, scarce able to endure the flogging and flashing of the horcilefter, tor pain and grief of his wounds.

C From whence he wrote letters to Rome, giving notice, That his brother Consil was dead, and in what danger himself was. Signifying also, that he could not himself come unto Rome against the election, because he thought he should not be able to endure the travel of the journey; and besides, he was in great Care for Tarentum, left Amphil from out of the Britains country would turn thither with all his power. Moreover, he gave the Senate to understand that it was requisite there should be sent as Embassadors or Agents into himmen of wisdom and discretion, whom he might confer with, and acquaint with his will and mind, as touching State-matters. The reading of these letters, caused them much to lament and mourn for the death of the one Consil, and greatly to fear what would become of the other. Therefore they not only dispatched Q. Fabius, the Senatunto the army in Venusia, but also sent unto the Consil three commissioners, Sex. Julius Caesar, L. Licinius Fufor, and L. Cencius Alcenturus, who but a few days before was returned out of Sicily. These had in commisfion to signify unto the Consil from the Senat, that in case he was not able himself to come to Rome against the election, he should nominate within the Roman territoy a Dictator for to assemble the people for the said election: also that their pleasure was, in case the Consil went to Tarentum, that Q. Claudius the Pretor should withdraw his leagions from thence into their parts, whereas he might defend most Cities of the Alliges.

In the same summer M. Valerius took the Seas, with a fleet of a hundred sail, and from Sicily passed over into Africa; and having disbarked and landed his men near the City Clupea, waited the country all about, and met no armed men, to speak of to make head and withstand his invasion. Then their scouts and foragers retired in haft unto their ships, because on a sudden there was a rumour blown abroad, that the punck Arkado was coming, consisting of 83 Sails. The Roman Admiral fought fortunately with them not far from Clupea. And after he had boarded and taken eighteen of their ships and put the rest to flight, he returned to Lilybeum, with a rich Land-boot, and much pilage found in the ships.

The same summer Philip also sent aid to the Achæi, that earily befought his help: whom not only Macedonias the Tyrant of the Lacedemonians, grievously affrighted with warring upon their confires, but also the Ätolians, who having crost the streights or narrow Sea, between Numidians and Phocias (which the inhabitants there call Ribes) and over a power of armed men, had spoiled their territory. Moreover, there went a great rumour and speech that Attalus King of Asia and the Isles, would fell over into Europe, because the Ätolians in their last Parliament or general Diet had conferred upon him the soveraigne magistracy and rule of their nation. For these causes Philip came down with a power into Greece, and at the City Lamia, the Ätolians encountered him with their Captain Phyllus, who for that year was created Pretor together with King Attalus in his absence. They had in their army certain aids from Attalus, and almost a thousand Romans out of the Roman Armado, sent from P. Sulpicius. Against this Captain and these forces Philop took two battailes with prosperos favours, and in both flew very many of his enemies: and when the Ätolians were driven for fear from thence, into the City of Lamia, and within the walls thereof saved themselves. Philip retired his army into Phalerum, this is a place situate in the gulf of Matra, sometimes much peopled and frequented for the paffing fair haven, and many good harbors and life redes for ships, besides other particular commodites as well of seas as land. Thither repaired sundry Embassadors from divers parts, to wit, from Ptolomæus King of Egypt, from the Rhodians, the Athenians, and inhabitants of Chios, and all to treat about a pacification, to take up the war between Philp and the Ätolians. And of neighbour-borders there was in the behalfe of the Ätolians as peace-maker, Aminander King of the Athamans. All of them were not so careful and earnst for the Ätolians, who were more fierce, stout and imperious than the Nation of Grecians naturally is: as they labourd this point, that Philip with his Kingly soveraigny, to the prejudice of their liberty hereafter, should not be interferred, nor meddle in in the affair and state of Greece. As concerning peace, the confederates were put off, and re-entered the general Council of the Aetolians: and for the said Diet or Council, was a place appointed, and a certain day set down and published. And in the mean time, a truce obtained for thirty days.

Then the King departed from thence, and through Phessaly and Thessalia, came to Chalcis in Euboea, to put by Attalus (whom he heard say to be coming with a navy for Euboea) from arriving in any havens, or landing in any place on the sea coast. Then leaving a guard behind for to withstand Attalus, (if haply in the mean season he should chance to pass over) he marched himself forward with some few horsemen and light armed footmen, and came to Argo. There by the inscriptions and voices of the people, the honour of exhibiting and celebrating the solemn games, called Heres, and Nemesis, was recommended unto him; because the Macedonian Kings gave out and say, that they are descended from that City. After he had performed the solemnity of the Heres, presently he went from the very games and festivities to the Council of his allies long before proclaimed, as is above said. Much debate there was for a small end of the Aetolian war: that neither the Romans nor Attalus might have any occasion to come into Greece. But the Aetolians married all this before the time of the truce was well expired: by occasion that they heard that Attalus both was come to Megara, and the Roman navy anchored at Nauplia. For being called into the Council of the Achaians in which the same Embassadors were, who before at Phalerus had treated for peace, first they complained, that some things had been done, during the time of the truce, against the faith of the covenant and accord. But at last they flatly denied and said, That there could not possibly be an end of wars, unleas the Achaians rendered ships unto the Messenians; and peace was granted and restored to the Romans, and likewise to the Athenians, to Scecedes, Placentia, and Archides, Whereat Philip was very wrath, and thought it a foul indignity, that conquered persons should take upon them to article and capitulate with him their conqueror. * But neither heretofore (quoth he) gave I audience to the treaty of peace, nor yielded consent to truce upon any hope I had that the Aetolians would ever be quiet; but to this end, that all confederate friends might bear witness that I fought means of peace, and they fought occasions and picked quarrels for war. So without conclusion of any peace, he dissolved the Diet; leaving four thousand foudliers for the defence and guard of the Achaenians, and receiving of them five ships of war, (which if he had joyned to the armado of the Carthagians, lately lent unto him, and also to those ships which were coming out of Bilbonia from King Pyrrhus, he determined to assail the Romans with ship-fight, who had a long time been mighty masters of the seas,) himself presently from that Council departed back to Argos; for now the time drew neer of the games Nemeis, which he was desirous to celebrate and honor with his presence. While the King was occupied in the preparation of these games and festivities, and folaced himself during these festival holydays, with more liberty of mind and repose, than he should in time of war; P. Scipio having loosed from Nauplia, arrived with his fleet between Sicyone and Corinth; and wafted that goodly territory, most renowned of all other for fruitfulnes of all things. The noise and rumor of this occurrence awakened Philip, and caused him to leave his disports: and so he took his Cavalry with him in battle, and set forward, having given order that the Infantry should follow his right after: where he found the RomansGragling here and there all over the country, laden with booty and prizes, (as who feared nothing in the World left) set upon them, and drove them to their ships. Thus the Roman fleet nothing well appaid for the booty they had gotten, returned to Nauplia. And Philip greatly augmented the solemnity and magnificence of the games that were behind, by the fame of a victory over the Romans at that time, how much or little love it was, And with great joy and mirth were those holydays kept: and so much the more, because the King for to please the people withall, laid aside the diadem of his head, put off his purple tippets and other princely and royal habit, and in outward port bare himself equal to others, and no better: a thing right acceptable and pleasing to free States, as nothing can be more. By which deed of his, he had given great and undoubted hope unto all men, of liberty and freedom; but that he flained and marred all again with his intolerable lust and looseness of life. For he used to go ranging up and down with one or two of his favourites in company, and did nothing else but haunt suspected houses by the Sea side day and night in dignified manner: and thus by debauching himself to the mean estate of a private person, the lefs he was suspected and known, the more disolute he was: and whiles he pretended unto others a vain flow of freedom, he abused all to his own licentiousnes. Neither paid his purloin for all his pleasures, nor with flattering perverisions and fair speeches obtained he his desires: but to accomplish his wickednes, he used oftentimes forcible violence: and dangerous it was both to husbands and parents, to be any thing frighted, and make it goodly by tedious delay and unfeasible fevery, to seem but to stay the unbridled lust and appetite of the King. From one of the Princes also of the Achaians named Aratus, he took his wife away called Polydoritis, and upon hope and colour of marriage with the King, drew her away with him into Macedonia. Having thus with these lewd and wicked pranks pafted the time of the solemnity of the Nemean games, and some few days over and above: he went to Dyne to disjoin the garrion of the Aetolians, which they had encor and received into the City of Dyne from the Eleans, Cyclinders, who was the sovereign or chief magistrat of that state: and the Achaians met the King at Dyne: who as they hated the Eleans, because they disjoined from the rest of the Achaenians, so they were maliciously bent against the Aetolians, whom they were perfiwaded, A to have stirred the Romans to levy war upon them. So from Dyms they departed and with joint armies passed over the river Larpis, which divided the country of the Eleans from the territory of Dyms. The first day after they were entered the confines of their enemies, they spent in foraging. The morrow after, in battle array, they presented themselves before the City, having sent out their Horatien before them to make bravo's before their gates, and all to provoke the Atolians; a kind of people full of valour, and ready enough to tally forth and make excursions. Now were they not ware all this while, that sublimis with fifteen ships had crossed over from Naxos to Cyllera: nor that he had landed four thousand soldiers in the still time of the night (because they might not be seen to march) and entered Elus. And therefore, this sudden and unexpected object put them in a terrible fear, when they saw and knew not among the Atolians and B the Eleans, the Roman enemys and their armes. At the first, the King would have had his men to retire; but afterwards seeing the skirmish was begun already between the Atolians and Triballi, (a kind of Illyrians) and perceiving that his soldiers also were put to flight and charged, then the King alfo himself with his Horatien alalled the Cohorts or Squadron of the Romans. There his Horie was with a dart shot through: and when he had once flown and left the King forward over his head, there was a cruel and deadly fight on both sides, whilst the Romans laid hand at the King, and the Kings men protected and guarded his person. Himself fought right manfully above the rest, confiding that he was forced on foot, to maintain skirmish among the Horatien. But afterwards, by reason of the great disadvantage, and seeing many about him broken down and wounded, he was caught away by his guard, mounted upon another Horse, and so fled and escaped. C And the same day he encamped his armies from the City of the Eleans. The next morning he led all his whole power to a Caille of the Eleans, natio neer at hand, called Pyrgos into which he had intelligence that a multitude of the country people for fear of being spoiled, were with their cattle driven and retired. This confided, divided, and naked company he took captive at this coming, presently upon the first charge and onset that he gave: and with that booty he3icked himself whole again, and seized the theathetical defence that he had received at Elus. As he was busy in sharing the prizes, and dealing abroad the prisoners (and there were of men some four thousand, and of cattle of all kinds one with another twenty thousand head) there came a poll out of Macedon with news, that one Lepus had surprised Lynoburum, by expending for a piece of money the Constable of the Caille, and Captain of the garrison there: and that he held in possession certain borough towns of the Doriatarians, and still called the Dardanians to Rebellion. The King therefore gave over the Acheans, and the Atolian wars: yet leaving two thousand five hundred armed soldiers of all sorts, under the leading of Memnon and Polydore to try to defend his Allies, he went from Dyms through Achaia, Aetolia, and Boeotia, and upon the tenth day came to Demetrias in Thessaly. Where other messengers also encountered him, bringing tidings of a greater interjection: namely, that the Dardanians had invaded Macedonia, and were masters of Orestis, and came down into the plains of Aestrea: and that the tumor was rise and went current among the barbarous people that Philip was slain. The truth in that expedition whereunto he sought at Sevun with those that preyed, and meddled to spoil in the country, he was carried by his hot and blood-mount Horie under a Tree, and there against a bough or arm thereof that Rod lay, he chanced to break a corner of the crest of his helmet at one end. That piece chanced to be found by a certain Atolian, and was brought into Aetolia unto Serdileus, who knew by the mark that that was the Kings helmet: whereupon the fame of the Kings death was divulged commonly abroad. After the departure of Philip out of Achaia, Serdileus who was arrived with his men at Aegina, went forward, and joyned with Atellus, The Aetioe not far from Messpons struck a forain battail with the Atolians and the Eleans, Atellus the King, and P. Scipio was wounded in Aegina. In the end of this year, T. Quintus Crispinus the Consul, when he had nominated for Dictator, L. Marcellus Turrnianus, for to hold the plebium election of Magistrates, and to set out the games, died of his hurts abroad. Some say he left his life at Taranto : others in Campaun. Thus both Cofl. being slain with any memorable battail, a thing never been since in any other war: left the common-wealth destitute, and asat were cleanathering. M. Atellus the Dictator chose for his General of the Horie, C. Serdileus, at that time Aetolian cander. The Senate upon the very first day that the L. L. were assembled, gave order to the Dictator, to exhibit the great Roman games, which M. Atellus the Pretor of the City, whilst C. Flaminius and C. Serdileus were Cofl. had represented and vowed for 5 years. Then the Dictator, both let them forth and also vowed them for the next five years. But confidering there were two Consuls arms without their General, to meet unto the enemies; the LL. of the Senate and the people let all other matters aggre, and had a principal care above all things, to creat Consuls as soon as possibly they could, and such especially, who were termine and valour should be thought secure and take enough, from Pub. Scipio, Turrnianus, and decreitfuls. For whereas during the time of all these wars, the over- all heads and hot spirits of the Leaders, had been ever dangerous and hurtful to the late: so in this very year, the Consuls upon moderate desire to fight with the enemy, was ratified, and plunged into a jeopardy and milchfire they were aware. Howbeit the immortal Gods had mercy and pity upon the Roman name, in sparing the guilds and armies, and punishing the unconiderate rashness of the Consuls, with the lofe only of their owne lives. And when the LL. of the Senate looked after every way, to see if they could spicout any to make Consuls of:

above all others by many degrees, C. Claudius Nero excelled and was revered by all. But H companion with him in the government they were like whale to whale. As for him, he did not, they deemed him a singular man and a brave Captain: but yet more inward and eager, than the quality and actions of this war required, or to be matched with such an enemy as Annibale was. And therefore they thought good to join with him in his policy, advice, and prudent man, who might temper and qualify that fierce nature and desperate of his. Now M. Livius, many years ago had been upon his Contuship conduced by the judgment of the people. Which ignominy and reproach he took to grievously to the heart, that he departed into the country, and for many years together, for bare not only the City, but to converse and keep company with men. And almost eight years after his conscription aforesaid, M. Claudius Marcellus, and M. Valerius Latinius the Conuls, reduced him again unto the City. But he used to go in old and worn apparel, letting the hair of his head and beard grew long, carrying in his very countenance and array, the fresh and notable remnant trace of the diligence before received. But L. Veturius and P. Livius the Centors, compelled him to cut his hair, and lay away his vile and unpleasing weed, to come into the Senate, and to meddle again in civil matters and affairs of State. And yet in to doing, he would never proceed faster, than to say amen to other men's opinions, and speak but one word, yes and no; or else nothing at all, but flew his mind obeying on his feet to one side or other. Until such time as a hint of man of his own, M. Livius Mecennus, being in trouble, and his name and honour called in question, caused him to stand up in the Consuls-house and deliver his opinion. And when after so long duration, he was seen and heard once to speak, he turned every man his eye upon him, and mistrusted occasion else of speech in the meantime, namely, "That the people had done the man exceeding great wrong, yea, and hurt the common wealth much, in that during the time of so dangerous a war, there had been no playment of so weighty a person, either for his travail and pains, or his advice and counsel. But to return again to the Lords of the Senate: they knew well, that neither Q. Fabius, nor M. Valerius Latinius, could possibly be joyned as companion in government to C. Nero: forasmuch as it was not lawful that both should be chosen out of the Nobles of Latium. And the same was T. Manlius his cafe also. Besides that, as he once refused the Conuls room, when it was offered unto him, so doubt he would not accept thereof the second time if it were tendered unto him. But if they should fort Marcus Livius and C. Claudius together, there would be an excellent couple of Conuls in deed. Neither feuded the people against this overture, this moved him by the Lords of the S. Senat. The only man in the whole City, that denied it, was the very party himself, unto whom this dignity and honourable place was presented. Who much blamed the levity and inconstancy of the City: saying, "That they had no pity of him, when it was so, whereas he was in question and accused, and during all the time of the troubled war poor and simple garments: but now against his will, they affixed him a glittering white robe to stand for a Consulship. Thus (quoth he) they punish and depred, thus they honour and advance the same persons. If they took me for a good and honest man, why concerned they me as they did, for a wicked one and a guilty? If they found me nought and faulty, what cause have they to trust me with a second Consulship, who used the former so badly, which was committed unto me? As he argued and made complaints in this wise, the Lords of the Senat reproved him, and replied again: letting before his eyes the example of M. Furius, who in times past was called home out of exile: and when the state was decayed and lying, let it upright again in her former place and prifinite glory. And like as the cautious and rigor of parents, is to be mollified by patience, even so the hard and forced dealings of a man country, is to be dulced and mitigated by bearing and suffurance. So they all flock clofe together, and chose M. Livius Conul, with C. Claudius. Three days after, they went to the election of the Pretors. And there were created Pretors, L. Porcius Licinius, Cnaeus Manlius, A. Hestius, and C. Hestius, both Caes. When the election was finished, and the games celebrated, the Dictator and General of the Cavalry surrendered their places, C. Terentius Varro was sent into Africa as Pre-petor, to the end that out of that province, C. Hestius should go to Tyrants, unto that army which T. Quinctius the Com. bad, That L. Manlius should not go beyond Sea as Embassador, to see how the world went there: And withal, considering that in former, there were to be solemnized the famous games at Olympia, which were celebrated with a most frequent resort and meeting of all Greeks, in case he might safely and without impayment of the enemy, he should visit that great assembly: to the end that if he could light upon any Sicilians, who were fled and banished their country, or any citizens of Tyrants confined thither and sent away by Annibale, they should repair home again into their own countries, and know, that whatever they were poffed of, before the wars began, the people of Rome would restore the fame, and make good again unto them.

Because it was like to be a right dangerous year, and no Conuls were invested fully in the Common-weal, men despised upon the Conuls elect, and were defirous that they should with all speed, call for their Province: and every man was willing to know whereand, what Province each one should rule, and what enemy he was to deal withal. Moreover, a motion and speech there was in the Senat-house, that the Conuls should be recoucled and made friends, and Q. Fabius Mar, pre pondered that first. For there had been notorious enmity and variance between them aforetime: and the calamity of Livius made the same more grievous and unportable unto himself; in regard that he was persuaded, how in that misery of his, he was defpised depicted of his adversary. Whereupon he grew to be more implacable of the twain, and worse to be interceded. " There needs (quoth he) no reconciliation, neither is it material and to any purpole, For they will do all with more diligence and better spirit, who ever stand in fear that their adversary and concurrent shall grow great and be advanced by their defeats. Yet the authority of the Senate bare in a stroke with them, that they laid aside all malice and old grudge, and with one mind consent, and counseled administered the affairs of the common-weal. Their Provinces were not intermingled, nor their government extended into one another's country, as in former years, but distant, and divided by the remote frontiers and farthest matches of Ithys. For unto one of them were assigned the Brutians and Lucanian country against Amulius; unto the other, Ga-lia against Asdrabal; who as the rumour and fruit went, was come forward near unto the Apes.

B Of those two armies which were in Gallia and in Hetruria, he whose fortune was to go into Gallia, was to chuse which army he would, and have besides, that other of the City, And the whole lot should be to go into the Brutian country, besides the new legions enrolled of citizens, was to take unto him, the army of whether Conful he lift, of the former year. Alto Quintini Fatus the Pro-conful, had the charge of that army which the Conful refused: and his authority was renewed for one year longer. As for C. Hesillus, whose Province Tarentum they exchanged for Hetruria, they altered his Province again, to wit, Carnuntus instead of Tarentum. Into him was allowed that one legion which Fufius the last year commanded.

Now entered their care every day more than other, concerning the coming of Asdrabal into Ithys.
And the Embassadors of the Maffilians had brought news that, he was puffed over into Gallia: and that the minds of the Gauls were mightily cheered up by his coming, because the speech went, that he had brought a huge deal of gold with him, for to hire and wage foctions for aid in the wars. Then afterwards, Sex. Antistius, and M. Recius, who were sent Embassadors back with them from Rome, for to see whether it were so indeed, had made relation unto the Senate, that they had sent certain of purpose guided by the Maffilians, who by means of their especial friends the Princes and Lords of the Gauls, might learn the truth, and bring word back accordingly. By whose report it was for certain known, that Asdrabal having levied already a pur-nant army, was minded the next spring to piace over the Alps: and that there was nothing; else said him, but that it had been done already, having only the patagies of the Alps, which were cloded up with the winter now.

D In the room of L. Mucilius, L. Aemilius Pacu twas created Augur, and to consecrate. And likewise Cn. Cornelius Delobellus was inaugurated or installed king of the sacrifices, instead of Marcus Maecenas, who died two years before. In this very same year the City was purged, and there were a general lureracy and numbering of the people, by the Censors taken, P. Sempronious Tullionia, and Cn. Cornelius Catoque. There were reckoned and entered into the Censors books of Citizens, 1371 of A. C., A smaller number by much, than before the war. It is recorded in the Annals, that this year after that Amulius came into Italy, the Comitium was built over head and covered, and that the Roman Games were once renewed by the Ediles of the chair, Q. Metellus, and C.
Sertorius; and that the other Games called Plebeian, were renewed two days by Q. Mucilius, and M. Caecilius Metellus, Ediles of the Commons: who also offered three images and let them up in the Chippel of Ceres. And the solemn feastfull dinner of Jupiter was celebrated by occasion of these Games.

Then C. Claudius Nero, and M. Livius the second time entered their Consulship, who (because whiles they were but Cof. elect, they had taken lot for their Provinces) commanded the Pretors to do the like. And to C. Hesillus fell the jurisdiction over the citizens, who had that likewise over strangers and foreigners to the end, that the other three might go forth into their Provinces.
To A. Hesillus, was allotted Sardinia to C. Marullus, Sicilia and to L. Porcius Frsica. In sum, the legions were in number three and twenty, divided into the Provinces in this sort: to wit, the Consuls had two apace, Spaniour. The three Pretors for Sicily, Sardinia, and France each of them twain, C. Tarentum in Hetruria commanded two, Q. Fulvius in the Brutian country, other Two, C. Claudius about Tarentum, and the Salernians conducted twain: and Cassius Hesillus Turentum was in Capua, one. Last of all, two were enrolled for the City. In the four first legions, the people chose all the Colonels or Marshals, but to all the rest the Consuls left new to make up the defect.

Before the Consuls went forth there was a Novendial sacrifice celebrated because at Veii it had rained stones from heaven, and after one prodigious fight was once minded and spoken of; there were (as it is commonly seen) others also reported: namely, that in Minerva the temple of Jupiter, and the sacred grove of *Minerva was smitten with lightning: and in Atella the wall and gate likewise, was blasted with fire from heaven. The men of Minerva's image also of a more fearful thing than that, to wit, that there ran a river of blood in their very gate. Last of all,

At Capua a Wolf entered the gate at night, and worried and dismembered one of the watchmen.
These wonderful signs were expiate with sacrificing of greater beasts, and a supplication was held for one day, by venure of a decree from the Prelats. Then was the Novendial sacri-ifice once again renewed, because it was seen, that in Amulium it rained stones; and men's minds were no longer freed of one religious temple, but they were troubled again with another. For word was brought, that at Frasus there was an Infant born as big as ordinary a child is at eight years of age, And the thing was not to strange for the bigness of the body, as for that it was born doubtful, whether it were male or female, like as two years before, at Sinisfella. The wizards that were sent for out of Homer a, said, that this of all other was a soul and filthy monster, and that it should be had forth of the Dominions of Rome, and drowned in the deep, so as it might touch no ground. Whereupon they put it alive into a coffer, and when they had carried it a good way into the Sea, they flung it in. Moreover the Prelates made a decree, that certain Virgins in three companies, having nine spoons, should go through the City, andting certain Canticles. And whereas in the Temple of Jupiter Sutorius, the Maidens were a learning their song by heart, devised and framed in verse by Livius the Poet, the Temple of Queen Juno in the Aventine hill, was striken with lightning from Heaven. And when the Artificialies had declared that this prodigious token touched the matrons and dames of the City, and that the goddess was to be pacified with an oblation: they were (by virtue of an edict granted out by the Eldies of the chair) called all into the Capitol, as many as had any house, either in the City of Rome; or within ten miles every way. And they among themselves chose five and twenty into whole bands. all the rest should form some small portion of their dowry. Of which there was made a fair and large golden bason, to be presented unto Juno: and it was brought into the Aventine: and within, the dames ordered unto her purely and chastly their sacrifices. And straight after the Decemvirs proclaimed a day for another sacrifice of the same gods, the manner and order whereof was this: There were two white heifers led from the Temple of Apollo into the City through the gate Carmentalis: after which were carried two Images, representing Juno, made of Cypres wood: then went there seven and twenty Virgins in long side-strets, chanting hymns and songs to the honour of Juno. Those songs in verse were periladventure commendable, and passed for good with those rude and gros wis within their living: but if they should be rehearsed now adays to our fine heads they would seem but simple stuff, and composed without time or reason. After this row of Maidens, followed the Decemvirs deputed for sacred Ceremonies, with chaplets and garlands of Bays, clothed in vesture and robes embroidered with purple. From the gate above named, they passed by the street Jugarius into the Grand-place, and there rested this solemn pomp and train. Then these Virgins taking hold of a cord, which went through all their hands, sang a song, and danced the measures, footing it artificially according to the note. From thence they went by the Tuscian-street and Vabalbium through the brisk market, and to forward into the Clun Publicus, until they came to the Temple of Juno. There the Decemvirs sacrificed two beasts, and the Images of Cypres wood were offered and let up in the Temple. When the Gods and Goddesses were only pacified the Conuls took quarters more straightly and with greater precisiness, than any man could remember in former ages. For both the fear of the war was two-fold, by reason of a new-eome enemy into Italy, and also there was a store of youth, out of which the soldiers should be enrolled. Whereupon they compelled the inhabitants of the Colonies by the Sea side, who were said to have an especial immunity of warfare (by a sacred law) for to find soldiers: and when they denied, and stood upon their privilege of exemption, they set them down a certain day, upon which everyman should repair into the Senate, and there what cards they had for their immunity and vacation. Upon the day appointed there presented themselves before the Senat these Commonalties following, to wit, of Hefaia, Alba, Asita, Ascur, Montane, Sessoria, and Sena, from the upper Sea. When every one of these States exhibited and read their charter of immunity, there was none of all them dispeaced with, but they of Asita and Hefaia, in regard the enemy abode in Italy: and so the young and serviceable men of those Colonies, were put to their oath and fire, that above fourty of them should lie one night forth of the walls of their Colony, so long, as the enemy continued in Italy.

When all the LT. of the Senat were of opinion, that the Conuls were to go forth to the wars with all speed possible (for that both Altienwald was to be encountered coming down the Alps, for fear, he should follow the Gauls on this side the Alps: and the Tucans likewise who hoped and looked every day for a change and alteration: and also Altienwald was to be kept occupied in his own war, that he might not go forth of the Britians country, and meet with his brother) only Livius made some lay and drew back, as reposing but small truth in the armies belonging to his own Province. And as for his Colleague, well he wist, that he had the choice of two notable Conular armies, and of a third, whereof Q. Claudius had the charge at Taurum. Whereupon he had made some motion of calling the Volones or voluntaries, again to their colours, and to serve in the wars. The Senat granted the Conuls a large and free commission, both to make supply from whence sooner they would, by chusing out of all the armies whom they pleased, and to make exchange with whom they would, yea, and to draw out of the Provinces whomsoever, according as they should think it good for the Common-weal. And all this was executed with the exceeding concord and unity of the Conuls. The Volones were enrolled into the nineteenth and twentieth legions. Some Authors have written, that Secuius sent unto Livius from out of Spain, a strong power of auxiliaries for that war, to wit, eight thousand of Spaniards and Frenchmen, two thousand legionary footmen, and eighteen hundred men of arms, partly Numidians, and partly Spaniards: and that Marcus Lucercius brought their forces by Sea: also that C. M. Martin sent out of Sicily four thousand archers and slingers.

The fear and troubles in Rome were much increased, by occasion of letters sent out of Gallia from L. Porcius the Pretor: purporting thus much, That Altienwald was removed out of his wintering harbours, and was passing over the Alps: that there were eight thousand Ligurians levied Alevied and ready in arms to join with him so soon as ever he was come into Italy, unless some one were sent against the Ligurians, to prevent and keep them otherwise butiled with war. As for himself, he would with that weak army that he had, go forward, as far as he thought he might with safety. These letters caused the Conuls to dispatch the matters in great haste, and to go forth into their provinces, fewer than they had purposed: with this intent, that both of them as well the one as the other, might in his several province keep the enemies occupied, and suffer them not to join, and lay their forces together. And verily the thing that helped them most in this their disengagement, was an opinion and persuasion that Anabau had. For albeit he was assured that his brother would that summer pass over into Italy, yet when he called to remembrance what a toil he had himself, and how much trouble and travail he endured in the passage, one while of the river Rhodanus, another while of the mountains of the Alps, and how for the space of five months together, he was forced not only to fight with the people, but struggle also with the difficulties of the places; he never looked that Aserabau could easily and speedily pass over as he did: which was the cause that he diluded out of his winning places to much the later. But Aserabau found better expeditions, and all things more easy and speedy than either himself hoped for, or others expected. For the Arturus, and other nations (by their example) both of France and also about the Alps, not only received and entertained him, but also accompanied him to the war. Over and besides, as he conducted his army, by those passages which were prepared and made open by his brothers journey, and had been at once time impassable wilds and craggy rags: so against his coming, the Alps were much more easy, by reason of twelve years continual passage to and fro through ways, and the nature of the passers more civil and tractable. For the people before, being not used to any strangers and aliens, nor accustomed to see passengers or travellers coming into those parts, were in manner movable, savage and wild, and could not away with the society of men. And at the first not knowing whether Anabau intended to go, they suppos'd that he came; for to turbine their holds in caves and rocks, to take their forrests, and to drive away their people and cattle as booties. But afterwards, the fame that went of the Punic war (wherewith now twelve years Italy was plagued and vex'd) had taught them sufficiently, that the Alps were nothing but the way for the Carthaginians to travel through. And by this time well they knew, that two molt populous Cities and States, divided and removed: done from one another by a great space of Land and Sea between, thrived together and warred for their greatness and Sovereignty. Upon these occasions, Isy, the Alps were open and passable to Aserabau with ease. But look what time he gained by speedly journeys, the same he lost again by stay about Florence, while he lay there in vain, rather believing than disbelieving it. He was car'd away with a persuasion, that the Town lusted upon a plain and champaign country, might soon be forced and won: and the great name that were of that noble Colony, induced him to believe, that by the overthrow and raising of that City, he should strike a terror to all the rest. But inlying against, he took not only a hundred thousand more, but also told Anabau, who having heard that he was pass'd over the Alps, and come down into Italy, so much sooner than he looked for, was upon the point to dilodge out of his landing wintering camp: to be considered and cast in his mind, not only what a long and tedious piece of work it is to besiege and assault Cities, but also well remembered how himself after his victory at Trosia, afflied to force

F that colony in his return from thence, but might not prevail. The Conuls being departed from the City, and gone divers ways as it were for two hundred wars at once, distracted mens minds with many cares and troublous imaginations, as well in remembrance of those lofes and overthrows, which they had received at Anabau his full coming; as also in thinking, what gods should be so propitious and favourable to the City and empire of Rome, as to prosper the affairs of the State and Common-wealth, at one time in both places. For until then, their successes had been variable and alternative; and their prosperity always delayed with temblable adversity; and again, their losses were recompened with equal gains. For when in Italy, the Common-wealth of Rome went one way downward headlong to the ground at Trasimena and Cannae: the fortunate wars another way in Spain, fit upright again. But afterward, when in Spain one overthrow and defeat hap'n'd in the neck of another, at what time also two noble Captains were slain, and two valiant armies in part destroy'd; the happy and happy hand in Sicily and Italy, made up those breaches, and set the feeling line on foot again. For why? the very distance of the place so far remote (because one of the wars was maintained in the uttermost part of the World) yelded time and respite to breathe themselves and gather new strength. But now, two wars at once are entertained within Italy, two molt brave warriors and renowned Captains enclose between them the City of Rome: all dangers come hurdle together; all the heavy load and whole burden beareth upon one and the selfsame place; and to doubt, whether of these two Captains first shall get a victory, he will within few days after joy himself to the other. The freshest and unutterable remembrance also of the very last year, wherein two Conuls left their lives, mightily stifled the hearts of the people. So as, in these perplexities and troubles of minds, they accompanied the Conuls as they departed and went into their several Provinces. It is more over in ample records found, that when Q. Fabius adviz'd and warned AI Livius being upon his journey toward the wars, not rashly and head on hand to give battle to one enemy, before he knew his numbers and quanities. he full of anger fill and discontents with his fellow citizens, made this answer, that if a ten as ever he could have a fight of his enemies army, he would fight: and being asked again, why he would make such a halt? Mary (you both) either shall I by victory of mine enemies win singular honor and renown: or by the overthrow of my fellow Citizens gain some hearts' case and contentment, if not honest in all respects, yet at least-wise such as they have delvered.

Before that Claudius the Conful was come into his Province, C. Hoftilius Tabulus accompanied with certain cohorts lightly appointed, encountered Annibal as he led his army and marched by the utter confines and marches of the territory of Latinum, which leadeth to the Salentins; and charging upon his disordered army, put them to great trouble, few four thousand of his men, and carried away nine Ensigns. Q. Claudius who had certain garrisons planted in all the Cities of the Salentins country, hearing of the enemies coming, had removed out of his wintring camp; and therefore Annibal, because he would not fight with two armies at once, by night dislodged out of the territory of Tarentum, and withdrew himself into the Bruttian country: and Claudius turned with his army to the Salentins again. Hoftilius in the way to Capua, met with the Conful Claudius at Venasia. There, out of both armies, the Conful picked forth forty thousand choicé Footmen, and 2500 Horsemen, for to war with Annibal. The rest of the forces Hoftilius was commanded to lead unto Capua, and to deliver them to Q. Fabius the Pro-conul.

Annibal having assembled his forces from all parts, as well those which he had in camp during winter time, as those that lie in garrison in the Bruttian country, came as far as Grumentum in the territory of the Lucans, upon hope to recover the Towns, which for fear, had revolted to the Romans. Unto the same place the Roman Coif, making out his epipals before to discover and clear the ways, marched from Venasia, and about a mile and half from the enemy, K encamped himself. The Carthaginians had fortified themselves, and cast a trench close in manner to the walls of Grumentum: and between the camp and the Romans was some half mile. A plain lay in the middle: and on the left hand of the Carthaginians, and the right hand of the Romans all along between, the hills overlooked them, bare and naked, and of neither part suspected, by reason that they had no wood growing upon them, nor any lurking places to hide an ambush in. Into the plain between they used to put out certain bands and companies from the Corps de guard of both sides, and made light skirmishes not worth the talking of. And it seemed that the drift of the Roman Conul was to keep the enemy in, and not to suffer him to go his ways. But Annibal devisous to be gone, entered the field with all his power in order of battle. Then the Conul borrowing a little of his enemies cunning, for that in to open hills there L was less fear and suspicion of ambush, gave order that five Cohorts and Horsemens, reinforced with as many bands of footmen, should by night get over those hills, and in the Valleys behind, fit down closely: with direction to T. Claudius Aelianus a Colonel of footmen, and P. Claudius a Captain of allies whom he sent to conduft them, at a certain time to arife out of ambush, and to charge the enemy: himself by day light led forth all his whole power as well foot as Horse into the field. Within a while after, Annibal likewise put forth the signal of battaile: and all the camp over they set up a cry, running all about to their armour and weapons. Then Footmen and Horsemen both rushed space out of the gates who could be soonest forth; and fattered as they were all over the plain, made halt to the enemies. Whom when the Conul saw thus disorderéd, he commanded C. Aemilius a Tribun or Colonel of the third legion, to put out the Cavalry belonging to that legion, for to charge the enemy with all the violence he could; for that like sheep they were oppressed over the plain without all form and fashion, and might be surprized, discomfited, and beaten down, before they could be brought into array and set in order of battle. Annibal himself was not come forth of the camp, when he might hear the noife of them fighting together and hard at it: and excited with this tumult, he led in great haste all the rest of his forces against the enemy. By this, the vanguard and foremost of his battaile was frigighted with the Horsemens of the enemies: yes, and the first legion of the Infantry and the Cavalry of the right wing began to charge. The Carthaginians disorderd as they were, fought as a venture, as they chance to meet either with Footmen or Horsemens. The conflict grew hotter, by reason of new supplies and fresh succours, and increased still by the number of them that continually ran out to the fight. And surely Annibal, notwithstanding this tumult and troublesome fear, had set and marshalled his men in good order as they were fighting (which had been no easy thing to do, but that the army was of old soldiers, and their Captain well-experienced and beaten to it ) if it had not been for the front of the cohorts and bands above-mentioned, which they had at their backs, as they from the hills behind ran down upon them; and let them in great fear, lest that they would thrust in between them and home, and so shut them out of their camp. Hereupon 1 say they were affrighted, and began to fly here and there. But the slaughter was the less, because the camp was near, and far they had not to run buthe and save themselves in this then fearful flight. For the Horsemens plaited upon their backs fall, and gave over not to : the cohorts from the open Mountains ran hastily down the hill, and charged chirope upon their sides and flanks. However, there were slain more than eight thousand men, and above 2000 taken Prisoners: nine Ensigns won and carried away: of Elephants also (whereof there was little or no use ) in a luddain and tumultuary skirmish four were killed, and two groath alive. Of Romans and Allies, there died two hundred. The next day after, Annibal hirled now. The Roman Conul having brought his army forth into the field, and seeing none come about and make head against him, commanded the plain enemies to be disarmed and depoistd, the
The spoils to be gathered up, and the bodies of his own men to be brought together into a place and buried. For certain days after continually, he pressed to hard at the camp gates, that he might have little of entering thither with banner displayed, In so much as Arbuth not at the third watch of the night, leaving behind him many fires burning, and divers tents standing, on that side especially which looked toward the enemies, and some few Numidians, to make a show upon the Rampier and at the gates: dislodged, and purposed to go into Apulia. The next morning by day light, the Roman army embattailed, approach'd the trench and rampier. The Numidians of fort purpose flewed themselves in the gates and upon the rampier: and when they had a good while dallied thus and played with the enemy, they mounted on Horseback, and spared no Horse-flush until they had overtook their fellows. The Consil percepting that

All was quiet within the camp, and seeing not to much as those few appear anywhere, who in the morning betimes had walked their stations, went forth two Horsemen into the camp as espials. After he understood for certain that all was safe, and the coasts clear, he commanded his ensigns to make an entry, and stay no longer there, than whiles his soldiers ran up and down to pill and spoil. He founded the retreat: and long before night, brought his army back again. The next morrow after, he let forward by the dawnings of the day, and with long journals, following his enemies by the course of the country, and tracing them by their footsteps, he overtook them not far from Venosa. There also was a skulking skirmish between them, and not so few as two thousand Carthaginians slain. From thence Arbuthnot ever marched by night, and journeyed through the mountains, because he would give his enemy no vantage of sight, until he came to Metapontum. From whence Hannibal (for he was Captain of the garrison there) was sent with some few in his train into the Bruttian country, to levy a new army. And Arbuth not after he had joyned those forces to his own, returned again to Venosa, by the same way that he came from thence: and forward he marched to Campania. Nero never left the enemy, but was ready to tread on his heels, and as he marched himself toward Metapontum, he had lent for Q. Fulvius to repair into the Lucan country, because those parts should not be dismembred of defence.

In this mean space, there were four French Horsemen, and two Numidians, sent to Arbuth not with letters from Aderbal, after he was removed from the siege of Placentia: who having travailed in manner all the length of Italy, through the middes of the enemies, whiles they follow after Arbuthnot in his retire unto Metapontum, mischief of their way, and light upon Treccumen: where they were encountered by the forragers of the Romans that ranged about the fields, and by them were brought before Q. Claudius the Praetor. At the first they entertained him with false flames, with doubtful and intricate answers: but when the fear of the rack and other tortures, had forced them to tell a truth, they confessed, that they had letters about them to deliver from Aderbal to Arbuthnot. With those letters sealed as they were, they were committed unto L. Virgi nius a Colonel, for to be conveyed unto Claudius the Consil. And two troops of Castrites besides of Samnit Horsemen were sent to guard them. So soon as they were come unto the Consil, and the letters read by an interpreter, and some examination taken of their captives: then Claudius considering that the common-wealth was not now in that good case, nor the occasion such, that each Governor needed no more, but to make war by the ordinary course of commissi on, within the compass and limits of his own Province, with the help of his own army alone, and against an enemy assigned unto him by the Senate: but that some unlooked for adventures must be enterprized, some new dispositions and unexpected put in execution, which when they were begun and attempted, might make no less wonder and fear among their own friends, that terror among the enemies: and being once performed and done, might turn the former fear into as great joy and gladness; sent the letters of Aderbal to the Senat at Rome: and withal, himself acquainted the Lords of the Senate what he intended to do. And forasmuch as Aderbal wrote unto his brother to meet him in Umbria, he advised them to send for the legation at Caepia to Rome, to take matters also at Rome, and to oppose that army of the City, against the enemy at Narbona.

Those were the contents of the letters to the Senate. He dispatched likewise messengers before, through the territories of the Latins, Marutins, Frenetins, and Pretiunians (by whom he meant to lead his army) for to give notice, that all the inhabitants of those parts, should out of their Villages and good Towns, provide and bring forth victuals into the high ways, for to refresh his soldiers; also to come with their Cat-horses, draught-oxen, and other beasts for carriage, together with wains and carts, that the wearied soldiers might ease themselves thereby. Himself out of his whole army, as well of citizens as allies, chose forth the flour and mottt picked men of all, to the number of six thousand foot, and one thousand horse, and gave it out openly, that he minded to surprize the first City that he came next unto in the Lucan country, and withal, the garrison of Carthaginians that lay there: and therefore commanded them to be ready for the Gourney and expedition. Thus when he had got forward in the night, he turned his way into Piraeum. And the Consil made no more ado, but with long journeys hied him as fast as he could, and led his army directly to his colleague, leaving Q. Tannus his Lieutenants, to guard and command the camp.

At Rome, they were no little terrified and troubled, than they were two years before. At what time as the Carthaginians were encampd before the walls and gates of the City. And men wist not well, what to make of this adventurous and audacious journey of the Consil, whether they should... should praise or dispraise it. And it seemed that they would measure it and report thereof accordning to the event, which alone, there is nothing more unjust and unequal. But thus they whispered, "That the camp was left with an army, and without their General, near unto the enemy Annabals, and the same guarded of all the strength and force thereof: that the Conflual pretending an expedition into the Lucans country, when indeed he went toward Pergamum and Galata, leaving the camp by no one thing more safe and secure, than by the creator and mightaking of the enemy, who is altogether ignorant, that the General is gone from thence, and part of the forces with him. But where would they be then, and in what taking should the camp be in case that were known abroad; or if Annabal would either with his whole army follow after Nero, being gone with more than fix thousand? or assail the camp, left as it were for a prey unto him, without forces, without conducted, and with the fortune and good luck of the General to protect it? The old defeats received in this war, the fresh remembrance of two Confluals but the last year, incresed mens fear. All which misfortunes happen, when there was in Italy but one Captain General, and one single army of the enemies. Now, of one war of the Carthaginians there are made twain: and two Annabals (as a man would say) be both at once in Italy, right valuable and renowned warriors. For even Aftribal also, was Amilcar his son as well as Annabal, as valiant and redoubted a Captain every way: as who for so many years totgether in Spain, hath been exercized in the Roman wars, and born the name of archiving a world victory, and defeating two armies, with two most noble and famous commanders: and for expedition and speed in his voyage out of Spain, and for raising the Nations of France up in arms, he may be made his boal much more truly than Annabal himself. For even in those very places, where Annabal had left the greater part of his soldiers, with hunger and cold, (which kind of death of all others is most miserable) this Aftribal hath levied a power of armed men.

Moreover, they that knew Spain well, and the affairs which had palled there, said besides, That he had not to deal with Nero, as with a warrior whom he knew not already; for why? he had when it was, made a Child of Nero, by a good token. That when Aftribal was by chance in a wood, and could not get out, was put to his flutes; but whiles he tripped out the time with Nero in booketing devious conditions and capitulations of peace; he sheathed him a confoundin ghigian call, gave him the fair slip, and escaped out of his hands. And to conclude, in all their discourses at Rome, they magnified every thing on the enemies part above all truth, and debased all their own means of help beneath all reason; such was their fear, which interpreteth and con-

The Speech of Nero to his

The Confluals,

Nero, when he had now gained to much ground, and was gone so far from the enemy, as it had not mattered much if his designs had been revealed and made known unto him, for any danger that might online thereof: called his soldiers before him, and made some few words to this or the like effect. Never was there derangement (as the General in the field, in outward flew more dangerous, in deed and truth more state and secure than this of mine. I lead you to a certain and confirmed victory, even to that war, unto which my collogue would not go before the Senate had allowed him to his full contentment, a greater power both of foot and horse, and the same better let out and more turned: so if he should have gone against Annabal himself: and therefore whosoever small poise and addition of forces you bring thereto, you shall way whereby the whole, and as it were weighd the balance. For when the enemies ready embrattled to fight, shall bear (and before that time, I will make that bear, that they shall not bear) that another Conflual and another army is come, no doubt the day will be ours, and they shall yield us the victory. For in a name and name only, that lighteth the field & determineth battails. And small matters many times carry away the game, and cause mens minds both to loop for fear, and to take with hope, and verily, of a well bought field you are they shall reap the fruit & gain the glory. For alwayes it feemeth, that a little help that cometh hither, is more than all bodies & seeteth to effect the Whole. And you see yourself, with what concourse, with what admiration, with what affection that all the men do entertain & regard you by the way. And in very truth, as they marched along in their journey, it was a world to see, how both men & women flocked out of all the villages of the country to see them, how they forced themselves into companies & degrees to welcome them, and how they passed as it were in a lane: through them they made vows in their mouth, they poured out their prayers in behalf, & desired praiies among them: calling them the very guard & defence of the Common wealth, the lovers & redeemers of Rome & the Roman Empire: acknowledging that the lives and liberties of themselves and their children, lay in their two right hands, and depended upon the force of their arms: praying to all the gods and goddesses, and to all the holy halows of heaven, to vouchsafe them a lucky journey, a fortunate fight, and speedy victory over their enemies with both heartily that they might be bound and condemned (as it were) to pay and perform their vows, which in their name they had under taken & promised & deuised earnestly, that as now they went along, & accompanied them with careful minds for fear of the peril which they went unto, after few days they might meet with them upon the way with joyful hearts, as they felien with Triumph for their victory. Every man for himself in particular invited them friendly, offered them kindly, entertained and befought them importantly, that all things whatsoever they flow in need of, either for themselves or their friends, they would receive at his hands especially, as being ready to afford them all most liberally, heartily, and with the better. The foildiers again, for very modestly strove to take no more than was very needful and necessary, no day they would make with any, nor one jot depart from their colours. Their meat took by the ways as they went, journeying night and day, and scarce allowing their bodies rest and sleep to content their weak nature that looked for it. Now had Nero sent afore-hand to his brother Heliades, to give him a declaration of his coming and to know again from him his mind, whether he should come openly or secretly, by day time or by night, and lodge in one camp with him, or in another apart by himself. Livius his advice was, and he thought it the better of the two, to enter into his camp, closely in the night season and had given a postern word, and made it known throughout all the camp, that every Marshal and Colonel should lodge a Marshal or Colonel, and every Centurion entertain a Centurion, every knight or man of arms receive a knight or horseman, and every footman take unto him a footman into his pavilion and cabin.

For it was not expedient that the camp should be enlarged and set out wider, for fear that the enemy might take knowledge of another Conulis coming: and so much the more easily might many of them be brought in the fright round of their pations, because the army Conulis had brought in manner nothing with them in this expedition but their armour only. Moreover, in the very way as they came, the company was well mended and much encreased by many voluntaries that offered themselves willingly of their own accord, as well old soldiers, such as had erst out their years as young and lusty men; whom Claudius preparing so to strive for to have their names enred if he law them personable and strong of body and like to do good service, had enroiled into the mitter book. The other Conulis lay encamped before * Sena, and

A thousand foot from him. And therefore Nero was now appro'd and came near, and sat him down close among the mountains, because he would not put himself within camp before night. And when they were come thither, they were welcomed every man according to his degree, and by their own place and calling and brought into their tents and pations and with a general joy of all friendly entertained as their loving guests. The next day following they assembled together to counsel: at which meeting, L. Porcius Leopis the Pretor was present who was himself encharged close into the Conulis legion. He before their coming, by leading his army over the high places, and one while keeping the narrow heights of the forest to impeach and keep the pations; another while charging upon the flanks and sides of the upon the back and tail of the enemy, had by all the devices and policies of war, mocked him and kept him play. This man, I say, was at the forecial council. Many men were of opinion, that the day of battle should be deterred for a time, while Nero might have some few days more, for both to refresh his followers, weared with weary and much watching, and also to know the quality somewhat of his better of his enemy. Nero not only perfused till to persevide, but also began most earnestly to intract. That they would not by long delay make that design of his to seem rash and dangerous, which speedines in execution had made safe and secure. Considering this, whiles Made, upon ignorance and error (which is not to continue long with him) lay still asleep and bemummed, neither on one thought upon it, to affail the camp left without a General, nor put himself upon the way, to make prudent after me; now before he en't, I mis (quoth he) defeat the army of Afric'hal and return again into Apulia. But he that by deferring till, giveth the enemy time and rest, that they may refresh in them, the camp into Amadu' and bring the praetor him into Gallia, to joy with Afric'hal at his good pleasure and pleasure. Nero (quoth he) the signal of battle must be given forthwith, and we must to the field. We fail, I say, take the vantage and make the bell of the error and ignorant of our enemies, both absent there, and present here: that neither they with Afric'hal may know that they are to deal with fewer: nor the again beware that they are to fight with more in number, and stronger in power. Thus the counsel brake up, and the signal of battle was put forth, and presently they went into the field. The enemies were already advanced in battle array, and flock with displayed ensigns. The only day of joying in fight was this. That Afric'hal riding out with some few Horsemen before the ensigns, chanced to mark some old targets of his enemies which he had nor as yet seen, and their Horfes more lank and lean, than before came. For, and (as he was grieved) the number also was greater than ordinary and usual. Suspecting therefore, that with which was indeed, he founded the retreat in all bat; and sent out precisely to the rivers where they used to water, or else if they might either light upon some &c catch them prisoners, or at least take good mark by their eye, whether any of them had better or not at the higher and lower, looked uncumber, precisely upon their late travel. Alleo he gave them commandment to ride aloft about their camp, and to spie whether the enemy were enlarged or out either in any place, and to diligently watch whether the trumpet sounded single or double within the camp. When all other circumstances besides were related in order affirmatively, only the not enrolling of the camp, put them by their him and gave the occasion that they were beguiled. Two or all camps they were, like as before the coming of the Conulis: the one belonging to M. Livius, and the other to L. Ploctus. And in neither of them were the campers and tents let out any jot, whether they might put up more tents and quarter themselves in larger room. But this one thing troubled this old experienced Captain, and acquainted so well as he was with the Roman enemies that his epistles brought word how in the Pretors camp they founded the trumpet once, and in the Conulis twice. For surely that was an evident argument that two Conulis were there. And in thinking how the other Conulis had departed from Amadu' and given him the slip, he mightily remonstrated himself. And he could not suspect & imagine that, which was indeed the truth, namely, the that Ammibal was, deluded and mocked in a matter of so great moment, as to be ignorant what he was become of the General, or of the army, to which he lay so close and near encamped. Surely (thought he) and without all question, he had received no small spoil and overthrow, and in this fright darest not make after and follow the enemy. Nay, he feared much, lest all were lost and gone, and that he should not come time enough to help and succour him: and that the Romans had gotten already the fame good hand in Italy, which they had before in Spain. Otherwhiles he was perfwaded, that his letters never came to Ammibal his hands, that they were intercepted, and to the Conful made shift to prevent him, and give him the foil by the way. Being perplexed with these careful cogitations, he caused the fires to be put out, and at the signal given at the first watch, to truss up bag and baggage, and to dislodge, and be gone. In this tearful, and nightly tumult, the guides while they were slenderly looked unto, and small heed was taken of them. I one of them sat down and refted close in a secret lurking hole which he had before delineed in his mind; the other waded over the river Meamum, through the foords that he was well acquainted with, and so got away and made an escape. So the army left at random without their guides, first waded over the fields, and then divers of them being weary and sleepy with overwatching, laid them down along here and there, and left their colours with few about them. Ammibal commanded them to march along the bank of the River, and to follow it, until the day-light might direct them the right way; and so going a compass in and out according to the winding reaches and cranks of the River, waded a great while, and gained but a small ground forward. Now when day light once appeared, he purpoted to spie out the first place for convenient passage and there to get over. But finding no foords, by reason that the farther it was from the sea, the higher were the banks from the water that kept in the River, he spent all the live-long day, and gave the enemy time to follow after him. And first Claudius Nero came with all the Horlemen, then Percius followed hard after with the van-corriers, and light armed footmen. Whilesthey made offer to charge their enemies in their march, every way, and paid strict upon them, into much as now Ammibal leaving to journey forward (wherein he seemed rather to flee than march) was defirous to take a little hill along the river side, and there to encamp and fortifie; Livius came alo with all the main power of footmen, so armed and so orderly appointed and marshalled, as they were not only provided to march in journey, but readily also prepared to give battle. But when they were all joyed together, and aranged in battall array, Claudius had the leading of the right wing, Livius command the left, and the Pretor took the charge and conduct of the main battall. Ammibal seeing no other remedy but to fight, never fortified his camp; but in the fore-front before the vanguard, and in the very mids, placed his Elephants: among them in the left wing he opposed the French against Claudius not so much trusting upon them, as supposing verity that the enemy was afraid of them: and in proper person he took up the right wing against Livius for himself and the Spaniards, in whom (being old bestonfiders) he reposed his most hope. The Ligurians in the mids were leftowed behind the Elephants. But the battall was rather drawn out in length, than stretched forth in breadth. The Frenchmen were defended with the bill that bare out over them. That front which the Spaniards kept, encountered with the left wing of the Romans. And all the battall of the right side, which bare out from the conflict, stood still and fought not. The bill that was opposite against them, was the caule that neither afront, nor flank, they could charge upon the enemy. But between Livius and Ammibal there was an hot figh begun already, and cruel bloodshed on both sides. There were both the General Captains: there was the greater part of the Romans, as well foot as Horie: there were the Spaniards, old and experienced fcondiers, skillfull also in the Roman manner of fight: there were the Ligurians, a tough nation, and sturdy in fight. Against this battall were the Elephants turned, who at the first shock and onefter troubled and disordered the vanguard, yet, and began to force the cenfins to give ground. But alter upon the noise that grew greater, and the battall that waxed hotter, they began to be unruly, and travers between both battails, as it were doubtfull to wherfe side they belonged, much like to ships left railing and floating without their pilots and fleers men. Then Claudius cried out vifions to his fcondiers: To what end, quoth he, we fuch pool haft, and took fo long a journey? But feeing that he laboured in vain to advance his banners and mount up against the bill opposite unto him, and perceiving that way how it was impossible to come unto the enemy, and to enter upon him, he drew forth certain cohorts out of the right wing where he faw they were liker to stand still than to fight, and wheeled about behind the enemies battall, and so unawares not only to the enemies, but also to his own men, he charged upon the left flank of the enemies: and he bellifked himself to nimblly, that when he had flew himfelf on the fides, presently he plaid upon their backs; in fuch For the Elephants there were more of them killed by the hands of the governours and guides that bare upon them, than by the enemy that fought against them. For A their manner was to have about them a Carpenters chisell and a malleter, and when the beatles began once to rage and to run upon their own fellows, their masters would let the said chisell between their ears, even in the very joynt where the rape of the neck and the head meet together, and with their mallet to drive it as hard as he could: this was found to be the readiest and most speedy way to kill so mighty and huge a beast, when they were past all hope to rule them and keep them in order. And the first inventor and practicer of this feat was Afrordius, a famous and memorable Captain, as in many other respects, so especially for this battail. He it was that held out to the end, exhorting his fouldiers to fight, fighting them self, and adventuring all dangers: he it was, that when his men were weary and drew back (by reason of long toil and labour) incensed them again, one while by fair words and intrest, another while by sharp checks and rebukes: he reclaimed them again when they were running away: he renewed the fight in divers places when it flaked and gave over. And at the very last, when he saw evidently that the enemy had the honor of the day, because he would not remain alive after to great an army defeated that followed his standard, and were induced by the reputation and name that went of him, he let flaire to his Horle, and rode among the Squadrions of the Roman Horlemen; and there, as before Amilcar's son, and Amulbius brother, fighting right manfully, was slain. Never during the time of this war in one field were there so many enemies killed: and it seemed now that for loffe of Captain and overthrow of army, they might well cry quittance with them for the defeat at Cannae. Slain there were 36000 enemies, 6400 taken prisoners: and a rich booty and pillege gained of all forts, besides gold and silver. Moreover, there were recovered of Roman citizens above four thousand, who had been taken prisoners, and were among the enemies.

B That comfort they had to make amends for the fouldiers that died in this battail: for they won not the victory without bloudshed in this field, wherein to the number almost of eight thousand Romans and allies together, lost their lives. And the Conquerors themselves had to much their fill of bloud and slaughter, that the next morrow, when word was brought unto Livius the Conul, that divers Cisalpine Gauls, and Ligures, which either were not at the battail, or escaped out of the execution, and were going away in one company all together, without a certain Leader, without Ensigns, without any order or command, and might all be put to the word and utterly destroyd, if there were but one cornet of Horlemen sent out after them, " Nay, quoth he, let some reain alive to tell the news both of our enemies loose and ruin, and of our own virtue and valour. And Nere the very next night the battail, marched with more speed backward, than he came thither, and within six days returned again so far as to his standing leaguer, and the enemies. All the way he marched, he was not indeed restored unto and frequented by so many men, by reason that there went no harbingers or meffengers before: but his coming was welcomed, with so great gladness and mirth, that for very joy, the people were welcom more than themselves. As for Rome, it cannot be uttered and expressed in words sufficiently, how men were affected the one way or the other: neither how penive the City was in double expectation of the event, nor how joyful and jocund again, upon the news and tidings of the victory. For never one day (after the rumour once was blown thither, that Claudius the Conul was gone forth in his expedition) from the run-ringing unto the setting, departed either Senators out of the Council-chamber, from attendance upon the Magilstras, or the people out of the Common-hall. The dames of the City, because other help they could yield none, betook themselves to their beads and devotions, and in every Church went up and down, and plied all the Gods with prayers, with vows, and humble applications. As the City was thus perplexed and in suspense; first there came some flying news, that two Horlemen of Numma were come out of the battail, and returned to the camp which lay to guard and keep the lightes and pilleges of Umbria, who had entred word thither, that the enemies were defeated. At the first, they rather lent their ears to these tidings, than bent their minds to entertain the same, as being greater than they might in heart conceive, and more joyful than they could asserdly: and the exceeding twiftnes of the rumor hindered the credit thereof, because it was reported within, that the battall was fought again but two days before. Then were lettres brought from F. M. Ailus Aelius, sent out of the camp, which confirmed the arrival of those Horlemen of Nunma. Those lettres were brought through the common place, unto the Tribunal of the Praetor: whereupon the Lords of the Senat were sent forth out of the Council-hall. But the people kept such a thrallling and thurging about the door of the Senat, that the meffengers could not passe thither, but was haled and pulled by the people, questioning with him, and calling hard upon him, that the lettres should be read at the market cros, and in the Rocfr: before they were opened in the Senat. But at the last, they were refrained by the Magilstras and caufed to void, and hardly could the joy be contained among to unruly people, who had no measure nor rule of their affections. Well, the lettres were first read in the Senat, and then in the assembly of the people; and there, according to the divers dispositions of men, some took joy and contentment of mind, as upon a certainty: others would give no credit, before they either heard the meffengers speak directly from the Conulians, or saw their lettres. After this word came, that there were Embassadors themselves at hand. And then indeed, there ran to meet them, of all fortes, young and old, every one defirid to be the first, to see and to hear these so glad tidings. And they went out to far as the bridge Mileius, and all the way along, was full of people. Thes Embassadors or meffengers, were L. Festus Philo, F. Lucinius Farnus, Q. Cecilius Metellus, Who being accompanied with people of all degrees and qualities, that flocked about them, came as far as to the common place: some H questioned with themselves, others erred of their train and fortune, what news, and how the World went. And as any one had caught an end from them, that the army and Captain General of the enemies was slain, or the Roman legions safe, and the Consuls alive and well, he would immediately impart his joy unto others. Much ado had they to come into the Curia, and more ado there was, to keep out the multitude, that they were not mingled among the Lords of the Senate. But at last the letters were read in the Senat. From thence were the Embassadors brought into the general assembly of the people, and L. Peturius after he had read the letters, explained himself from point to point in order, how every thing was done, with great applause; and afterwards, with a general shout of all the assembly, who hardly could conceive in their minds to great joy. Then they ran divers ways, some to the Temples of the Gods to render thanks, others to their own houses, to communicate with their wives and children to luckily and fortunate tidings. And the Senat decreed a solemn procession for three days together, so many as M. Livius and C. Claudius the Consuls, with the safety of the legions that had vanquish'd the enemies, killed their General, and put their army to the sword. This procession, C. Hicilianus the Pretor, published in the open assembly of the people: and it was celebrated and solemnized both by men and women. All the Temples for three days fully, were likewise replenish'd with the one fex and the other. For the Maroons and Dames of the City, in their best apparel, together with their children, yeelded praise and thanks to the immortal Gods, as if now they had been freed from all fear, and the war come to a final end for ever. This victory altered the very state and course of the commonwealth, so as from that time forward, as intimate of feted peace, men durst make contracts, buy and sell, borrow and lend, yes, and pay debts to their creditors.

C. Claudius the Consul, so soon as he was entered into the camp again, caused the head of Attalus (which he had preferred with great care and brought with him) to be thrown out before the Corpo de guard and leaders of the enemies, and that the African captives, should be shewed bound as they were in chains; and two of them to be sent loose unto Attalus, to declare and recount in order, how every thing happened. Attalus having at once received this double blow, mourning as well for the publick loss of the state, as for the calamity happened in his own house, fetched a deep sigh (by report) and said: Ah, I see well the hard fortune of Carthage. And disdaining from hence, because he would bring together all his forces (which being dispersed under, he was not able to hold and maintain) into the utmost angle of Italy, (the Britains country) he brought thither as well the Metapontins, even the whole tribe of them, who abandoned their own Towns and Cities, as also the Lucans, as many as were subject unto him, and under his obedience.

But it seemed that Spain was as much in war as it had been therewith, by the voyage of Aemilius Paullus; behold, all in a sudden those rising troubles there equalled to the former. And as for the Provinces of Spain, at that time, they were oppressed between Romans & Carthaginians in this manner, and first when the son of Giscards was retired with his power far within the country, even to the Ocean and beyond, but the coasts bordering upon our sea, and in manner all Spain bending toward the East, was held by Scipio and subjunct to the Roman Empire. Hannibal, the new General, being passed out of Africa, with a fresh army, and entered into the room of Aemilius Paullus, joyed with Mago; and when he had put his army within a short time, a great number of men in Celtiberia, which lieth in the midst between the two seas: Scipio sent forth against him: M. Sylla made ten thousand foot, and five hundred horsemen. This Sylla acted with speed by taking as long journeys as possibly he could (considering how much hindered and troubled he was, both by the roughness of the ways, and also by the straitness, environed with thick woods, and forrests, as most parts of Spain are) that notwithstanding all those difficulties, he prevented not only the messengers, but also the very fame and rumour of his coming, and by the guidance of certain fugitives revolted out of Celtiberia, he pulled forward from thence to the enemy. By the fame guides he had intelligence, and was for certain advertised (being now some ten miles from the enemy) that about the very way where he should march there were two camps: namely, on the left hand the new army aboved (of Celtiberians, to the number of more than nine thousand, by encamped, and the Carthaginians on the right. For as this Leager it was well defended and fortified with corps de guards, which watch and watch both night and day, according to the good order and discipline of war, but the other was as much neglected, dilatory, loose, and out of order, like as commonly barbarous people and raw foundiers are, and such as fear the least, by reason they are at home within their own country, Sullame thinking it good policy to fet upon them first, gave commandment to march under their ensigns and colours, and bear toward their left hand as much as they could, for fear of being discovered in some place or other by the guards and sentinels of the Carthaginians. And himself in person, having went before certain vane-couriers and epilaps, with his army advanced space directly toward his enemy. Now was he approached within three miles of them unespied, and not descried at all. For why a mountain country it was full of roughs and crags, over-spread and covered with woods and thickers. There in a hallow valley between, and therefore secret for the purpose, he commanded his foundiers to sit them down and take their reflection. In this mean time the epilaps came back and verified the words of the fugitives aforesaid. Then the Romans, after they had piled their packs, their trusses and baggage in the midst, armed themselves, and in order of bataill formed to fight. When they were come within a mile of the enemies, they were discovered by them, who began suddenly to be afraid, Mago at the first outcry and alarm, set spurs into his horse, and rode a gallop out of his Camp to inure. Now there were in the army of the Celtiberians, four thousand footmen tagertiers, and two hundred horse. This Troop being in manner the flower and very strength of the whole army, and as it were, a full and compleat legion he placed in the vanguard: all the rest, which were lightly armed, he belowed in the rearward for to inure and reduce. As he led them forth thus ordered and arranged they were not well instiled without the trench, but the Romans began to lance their javelins and darts against them. The Spaniards to avoid this volley of shot from the enemies, couched close under their shields, and defended themselves, and afterwards they role up at once to charge again upon them. But the Romans standing thick as their manner is, received all their darts in their targets, and then they closed man to man and foot to foot, and began to fight at hand with their swords. Howbeit, the ruggedness of the ground, as nothing availed the ivireness of the Celtiberians (whoone gaites is to run to and so in skirmish and keep no ground,) so the fame was not humilial all to the Romans who were used to a fast bataill, and to stand to their fight: only the strait room, and the trees and thorns growing between parted their ranks and files asunder, so as they were forced to maintain skirmish eitherly one to one, or two to two at the most, as if the y had been matched to cope together even. And look what thing hindered the enemies in their flight, the same yielded them, as it were, bound hand and foot unto the Romans, for to be killed. Now when all these tassetters, well-near of the Celts, were slain; their light armed foildiers, and the Carthaginians also, who from the other camp ran to succour, were likewise disarrased, discomfited and hewn in pieces. So there were two thousand footmen, and not above, and all the horsemen (who scarce began battle) fled with Mago and escaped. As for Hannoth, other Generalls, together with them who came left, and to the very end of the fray, was taken alive. But Mago fled still: and all the Caualy, with as many as remained of the old footmen followed after, and by the tenth day arrived in the Province of Gades, and came unto Asdrubal. The Celts, that were but new foildiers, split into the woods next out of the way, and so from thence fled home.

This fortunate victory hapned so good a time, not so much stifled the present war in the very birth, as it cut off the matter and maintenance of future troubles in case the enemies had been let alone, and suffered to sollicit and stir other nations to take armies, like as they raid’d the Celts, and the Celts already. Whereupon, Scipio having highly commended Sylla’s, and conceived great hope withall to dispatch quite, and make an end of the wars, in case himself left not the matter, and made long stay; purfied the remnant behind, and led forward into the utmost Province of Spain against Asdrubal. But Asdrubal, who hapned then to lie encamp’d in Tarracon to keep his Allies in obedience and faithfull allegiance, all on a sudden dislodged, pluck’d up standards, and away; and more like one that fled than marched, led his army farther into the country, even as far as the Ocean, and to Gades. But supposing that so long as he kept his forces all together, himself was the only mark which the enemy would flouor at; before that he cut over the K straights of Gibraltar to Gades, he brake up his whole army, and sent them away here and there to their several Cities, both to fave themselves within the walls, and to defend the walls by force of arms. Scipio so soon as he perceived that the war was thus divided into fundry parts, and that what leaded about his forces from City to City, was rather a long and tedious piece of work, than either difficult or much available, retired back. But because he would not leave that country clear in the hands of the enemies, he lent his brother L. Scipio with 1000 foot, and 1000 horsemen, to aflail the mightieft and wealthiest City in those parts, which the barbarous people call Orinisia. This City is leated in the confines of the Meliffs (a nation meer Spaniards) the foil fruitful, and the inhabitants therefind silver mines. This was the fortores of Asdrubal, and his place of safe retreat, when he made outwards all abroad into the midland countries of the main, and spoileth the people. Lucius Scipio having pitched his Camp under the said City, before that he entrenched and blocked the town, sent certain to the gates, who by parling near at hand, might feel and sound the dispositions of the Citizens; and persuade with them to make trial of the Romans friendly alliance, rather than their forcible violence. But perceiving by their answers no mind at all nor inclination to peace, he call’d a trench, and raised a double rampart about the town, and divided his army into three parts, to the end that one of them should ever follow the affairs, while the other twain took rest and cena. And when the fift troop and regiment of them began to give a camifado, there followed a fierce, cruel, and doubtful skirmish. For they could not easilily either come under the walls, or bringing scaling ladders to fect by, by reason of the flipt that light upon them. And such as already had reared up ladders to the wall, fome of them were pulled off, with certain forks provided for that purpose; others were caught hold of with iron hooks from above, and were in danger to be hung up in the air, hoisted aloft, and fetched over the walls. Scipio fearing that the conflict was unequal, by reason of the small number of affilants; and that the enemies had the advantage besides in that they fought from the wall top: caufed that fift regiment to retire, and with the other twain at once gave a treth assault to the town. This stroke brot a great fear into them who were already wearied with fighting that not only the town men suddenly abandoned the walls and fled, but also the Carthaginian garrifion foildiers, for fear lest the City was betrayed, for look’d aloft their stations and places of guard, and gathered themselves into one place. But then the towns’men were afraid, left if the enemies put themselves within the City, they should be maffacred every where as they came in their way, without respect and difference who were Carthaginians, or who were Spaniards. Whereupon they fct one gate open on a sudden, and in great numbers ran out of the town, bearing their tagers before them again the darts that were fhort afar off, and thefwoung aloft their naked right hands, in token that they had laid aside their swords. But whether the enemy could not well discern them so far off, or whether they infefted some crafty and deceitful practice, I wont not, but they fell upon thefe that fled and yielded unto them, and drew them downright, as well as if they had affronted them in the face of a battell, and at the fame gate entered the City with bloody banners. In other parts likewise they fell to hewing down the gates with axes, and to break them open with crowns of Iron. And as every horfeman got into the City, he rode amain (according to the direction given by the Generalls) into the market place; to be poifefled thereof, and to thefe horfemen were assigned the Triaul for aid and assistance. The Legionary foildiers besides ran over all the other parts of the City, spoiling and killing all that ever they met, fave such as defended themselves with their armour. All the Carthaginians were taken prisoners and committed to ward, likewise of towns’men about three hundred, such as had shut the gates; but unto all the rest the town was rendred again, and each man had his own goods delivered and restored unto him. There were slain at the affault of that City, of enemies almoft two thousand: but of Romans nor above
A fourcore and ten. As by the winning of the town they that were employed there took great joy and contentment: so in their return to their Generall he left and the rest of the main army, they made a goodly show as they marched with a mighty multitude of prisoners led before them, Scipio having praised his brother in the most honourable terms that he could devise, and namely, for this exploit of setting Ormus, making him equal in glory to himself for the conquest of Carthage: because winter drew on that he could neither give the attempt upon Gades nor yet follow at once upon the army of Gisrulals, so dispersed as it was in sundry parts over the Province, conducted his forces back again into the Province of Spain; that lieth on this side Iberia: and when he had dismissed his legions into their several standing camps to winter in; and sent his brother L. Scipio to Rome, together with Hanno the Generall of the enemies; and other Gentlemen prisoners, he withdrew himself to Taracum.

In the same year the Roman Armado being set out under the conduct of M. Valerius Leceinius the Pro-Consul, made a voyage from Sicily into Africa, and forsook all over the Territories of Bithia and Carthage, infomuch as they drove booties out of the very utmost Confinis of the Carthaginians, and even about the walls of Bithia. As they failed back for Sicily, they were encountered by the Carthaginian fleet, consisting of seventy long ships of war, whereas of seventeen were boarded and taken, four sunk in the deep seas, the rest were put to flight and dispersed. Thus the Roman Captain Valerius, after victories at three ends, and land, returned with rich prizes of all sorts to Lilybaeum; and hereupon by reason that the seas were opened and cleared of the enemies' ships, great store and abundance of grain was brought to Rome.

In the beginning of that summer wherein these things hapned, P. Sulpicius the Pro-Consul, and King Attalus, after they had wintered in Agina, as is abovefaid, with a joint army passed over from thence into the island Lemnois. The Romans were twenty five Galliaces of five ranks of oars, and the King had thirty five, Philip for his part because he would be ready at all times to meet with the enemy either by land or sea, were himself in person down to the sea-side, as far as Demetrius, and made proclamation, that all his forces should by a certain day meet together at Larisa. Upon the same that went of the Kings coming, there repaired sundry Embassadors from the federate States of all parts unto Demetrius. For the Etolians having taken heart unto them, as well for the society with the Romans, as upon the coming of Attalus, waited and imploied their borderers. And not only the Acharians and Boetians, and they that inhabit Euboea, were in great fear, but also the Acharians whom over and besides the war from the Aetolians, Macchandis also the Lacedemonian tyrant terrified, who encamped himself not far from the confines of the Argives. All these States made report what perils were like to ensue both by sea and land to their several Cities, and befougth the King his aid. Moreover there came unto him from his own Realm no good tidings of peace and quietness, for that Scevriditas and Pleuratis were gone out and rebelled: and of the nations of Thrace, the Medi especially were ready to invade the frontiers adjoining upon Macedonia, in case the King should fortuited to be bufied and occupied otherwise in any long wars. The Boetians likewise themselves, and other nations inhabiting the more inland parts of Greece, had given intelligence, that the pappages of the forrest Thermoplaes, where as the narrow gullet of the heights yielded small passage, were stopped up by the Aetolians with a trench and pallisado, that it might give no access at all unto Philip, for to come and defend the Cities of the Allies. Thus many troubles coming fast and thick one upon another, had been able to have roused and awakened even a deepy and flow Captain, and made him to look about him. These Embassadors he dispatched and sent away, promising every one of them help and succour, as time and occasion would permit: and willing them each one for the present to provide those things that were most urgent and important. Then he sent a garrison unto that City from whence new came, that Attalus having passed with a fleet from Lemnois, had waited and forsook all the territory about it. And he sent Polyphantes with a small power into Boetia, and Menippus likewise, one of his own Captains and Cavaliers, unto Chalce, with a thousand targetiers, called Pelasgi, (now the P.h.c are certain small buklers or targetiers, nothing unlike unto the Spanish Cetres) unto whom were joyed five hundred Athenians, that they might not be gured all the parts of the Island: himself in person went to Scio and, and there he apprized the Rhodians, that all the forces of the Macedonians should be brought thither from Larisa. News came unto him there that the Aetolians had summoned and proclaimed a general Diet of Council at Heraclia, and that King Attalus would require thither to consult about the managing of the whole war. And with an intent by his hudden coming to trouble this solemn assembly and meeting of the States, he took great journeys in his march, and led his army toward Heraclia: but the Councill was newly dislodged when he arrived thither. Howbeit, he destroyed all the standing corn, which was near-hand ripe, specially in the vale along the Gulf of the Athenians, and so reduced his army back again to Sciofa; and there leaving his whole power, he retired himself to Demetrius, attended only with his royall guard. And because he might from thence be ready to meet with all sudden fiats and invasions of the enemies, he sent out men of purpose into Phocias, * E/elea, and * Piapers, to chule out certain high places for beacons, from whence the fires might be seen afar off. And himself set up one watch tower upon Ciffars (a mountain so the top whereof is of an exceeding height) that upon the signal of the beacons on fire from afar, he might in the minute of an hour have intelligence, so soon as the enemies were about any trouble whatsoever. But the Roman General, King Attalus, sailed the fleet from Pergamum to Mycaen, and from thence sailed with their Armada to En caea, unto the City Oreum, which a man beareth his course from the gulf of Demetrias to Chalced and Enepirus, is the first City of Euboea that they had met upon the left hand. And thus it was agreed between Attalus and Sulpius, that the Romans should give the assault from the sea side and the King with his forces on the land, Four days after the fleet was arrived, they presented themselves before the City to affright it. For that time between was spent in secret talk and conference with Plator, who was appointed by Philip governor and Provost of the City. The City had within it two Citadels, the one commanding the sea, the other situated in the very heart and midst of the town. From thence there is a way under the ground that leadeth to the least end whereof there flood a fabric or tower five stories high, a singular bulwark and place of defence. There at first began a most sharp and cruel conflict, by reason that the turret was well furnished with all kind of shot and artillery: and likewise from out of the ships there was planted much ordnance, and many engines bent to impeach and affright the same. Now when every man's mind was amaz'd, and eye fixed upon this hor and eager light, Plator received and let in the Romans at the gate of the other Citellus that flood over the land, and so in the turning of an hand it was surpriz'd and won. The townsmen being expell'd and chaited from thence retired and took themselves into the middle of the City unto the other fortresses, But certaintold underes were set of purpose there to burn the gate upon them: and so being excluded, they were killed and taken prisoners in the midst between. The garrison of the Macedonians' round gathered together under the Castle wall and neither fled openly amain nor yet began to fight, as if they meant to flock to it unto the end. For whom Plator obtained pardon of Sulpius, and having embarked them, brought them to Demetrias of Phocis, and there let them a-shore, and himself returned to Attalus.

Sulpius bearing himself bold for this so good and speedy successes, immediately fled with his victorious Armada against Chalced. Where the event in the end answer'd nothing unto his hope and expectation. The sea lying broad and large on both hands, gathered in that place to a narrow room, so as at the first light it made a shew of a double pector or hour, opening upon two divers mouths, but in very truth there is not lightly to be found a worse harbour, and a more dangerous rode for ships. For not only for exceeding high hills on both sides of the main, the winds arise suddenly and blow butterous, but also the very straight it is of Enepirus, ebbeth not at all and floweth seven times in the day, as the voice goeth, at certain feet and ordinary hours; but without all order, as the winds drive the sea turneth and rolles in hither and thither, working up and down, and like a flowing tumbrun restless and very violent, as it were, doth at a deep hill: so as another night on day the ships there riding have any rest and repose. As the Roman Armada was thus engaged within so dangerous a rode; so the town of the one part was environd with the sea and on the land-side fiercely fortified; besides the defence of a strong garrison there and the assured loyalty of the Captains and principal heads and rulers; whereby it was chiefly guarded, which at Oreum was but vain, sick, and unitned; by means whereof it was trouble and impregnable. The Roman General in this case, considering how he had begun a vast enterprise and seeing many difficulties on every hand, wrought wildly yet in this one point, that he that could give over, because he would spend no time in vain, and sailed over with his fleet from thence to Cyrusus (a town of Mercian belonging to the City of Opus, situate a mile from the sea.) Philip was warning by the beacons on fire that appeard from Oreum: but by the fraud of Plator, the other were with the lastest fire a burning from the watch-tower above. And forasmuch as he was now strong enough at sea, he could not with his navy have easy access into the island. So that service was delayed and altogether neglected. But he behirled himself quick to the succour of Chalced, to soon as ever he espied the fire from the beacon. For albeit Chalced it fealt be a City of the fame island, yet is it diiled from the Continent by so narrow an arm of the sea that there is no more but a bridge between it and the land: and on that side it hath more eafe access than at water. Philip having desir'd the garrison there, cast down the fort and discomfited the Etolians who kept the straight passage of Thermoypyle, came from Demetrias to Scoristis, from whence he departed at the third watch: and when he had driven and chased the enemies in great fear to Heraclea, himself in one day reached to Elata in Pheos, a journey above 60 miles. The very same day in manner the City of Opus was taken by K. Attalus and put to the ranke. The whole pillage thereof, Sulpius had granted to the King, in regard that Oreum a few days before was spoiled and riled by the Roman soldiers, and the Kings men had no share with them. New was the Roman Armada retired to Oreum, and Attalus not ware of Philip his coming, spent time in exacting monies from the chief and principal Citizens. But so sudden and unexpected was this accident of his approach, that had not certain Cretans by good hap gone forth a forraging craft from the City, and descried the march of the enemies a great way off, he might have been overtaken and surpriz'd. Attalus unarmed and out of order as he was, made haste & ran amazed to the sea-side for to recover the ships. And even as he by his men were looting from the land and lancing into the sea, Philip came, and from the very shore put the mariners and sailors in great fear. From thence he returned to Opus, crying out upon God and man, and blaming his ill luck, that he had miss'd so narrowly the opportunity of so great an exploit, and let it go, as it were, snatched out of his very eye. In the hunt of anger he reproved and revil'd the Opuntians, for that being able to hold out the siege until his coming, so soon as they saw the enemy they presently had yielded themselves in a manner voluntary into his hands. When he had set things in order at Opus and thereabout he took his journey to Tarentum. Attalus at the first retired himself to Tarentum: but upon the news arrived how Prusias the King of Bithynia had invaded the frontiers of his kingdom, he left the Roman affairs and the Eolitan war, and from thence sailed over directly into Asia. Sulpius also retired his navy unto Aegium, from whence in the beginning of the spring he had departed and taken a passage to Tarentum. And Philip forced and won Tarentum, with as small ado as Attalus before had taken Opus. That forelaid City Tarentum was inhabited by certain that were fled and driven out of Thessalus in Phlebius. For when the City was taken by Philip and they fled for protection unto the Eolitians, (to whom they recommended and committed themselves) the Eolitians gave unto them that place to lodge themselves in being a City wanting and in manner defolate by the former war of Philip. Then Philip having recovered Tarentum again, as is before departed, departed from thence, and won Trinunum and Dyrrachium, two small and base towns of no account in Durrus. From whence he came to Eleana, where he had given command- ment, that the Embassadors of Polomenu and the Rhodians should give attendance until his coming. Where, as they were treating about the making an end of the Eolitan war (for much as those Embassadors to the same effect had lately presented themselves at Heraclea, in thee Council and assembly of the Romans and Eolitians,) tidings came, that Macchinidas purposed and determined to let upon the Eleans, as they were preparing to exhibit the solemn Olympic games, Philip supposing it good to prevent that, courteously answered the Embassadors and gave them their dispatch saying that as himself was not the cause of that war so he would not hinder and lay the conclusion of peace upon any equal and reasonable conditions. And so with a power lightly appointed he marched through Rutus to Megara and from thence went down to Corinth: where having furnished himself with victuals, he marched forward to Philos and Phaneto. And being now come as far as to Epea, and hearing there that Macchinidas upon the rumour of his coming forwar was fled back to Lacedaemon, he returned to Aegium, unto the general Diet and Council of the Achaei: supposing with all that he should find there the Punic armado, which he had Best to come thither, because he might be able to do somewhat also by sea. But some few days before the Carthaginians had sailed out into Phocaea, and from thence were gone to the havens of the Aecarnanians, so soon as they heard once, that Attalus and the Romans were departed from Tarentum, fearing that they would make out after them, and left they should be overtaken and surprized within Rhium, which is the very mouth of the Corinthian gulf. Philip very gladly heereat, and was wonderfully troubled in mind, seeing what haste ever he made himself in all his empires, yet he came too short and effected nothing in due time as if fortune in taking all things out of his very eye-sight, had deluded, disappointed, and mocked all his speediness and expedition. Howbeit, in that solemn Diet and assembly, he diffemblen his grief, and in his passionate affections, and thus with an haughty mind he spake and said, "That he called both God and man to witness, that he had for ever no opportunity of time nor vantage of place, but when and wherever he heard but any inciting of the enemy, and the least ruffling of armour, thither he had made all haste that possibly he might: but he could hardly devise and conceive, whether himself were more ventu- rous in seeking war, as the enemy nimble and quick in avoiding the same. So Attalus at Opus, Sulpius at Chales, and the other day Macchinidas escaped out of his hands and got a- way. But falsely (quoth he) his running away will not always prosper and speed well: neither is that to be counted a dangerous war, wherein a man may be sure (if he but meet his enemy once) to have the upper hand. That which is the principal point of all, this much have I got yet at the enemies hands, that they confels thereby, how they are not able to make their parts good with us and I doubt not but shortly I shall achieve the victory of them, and the event and for- tune of their fighting with me, shall be no better than their present hope. The Kings allies were glad to hear him speak thus. Then here retired unto the Achaeans, Epea and Triphylia, and delivered again Alipheuo unto the Megalopolitians: for that they were proved by good evidence, that it be- longed by right to their territory and confines. Thus having received of the Achaeans certain ships to wit, three Galleasses or Carvels of four banks of oars, and as many galleys of two ranks, from thence he cast over to Amicyra. And then with seven Carvels of five ranks of oars, and more than three banks besides, which he had sent into the gulf of Corinth to joyn with the Carthaginian navy, he made sail to Frityro in Eolos, near unto Exaporia, and there disembarked and landed his men. But the Eolitians were advertised beforehand of his arrival and coming afore: for all the people that inhabited either the country towns and villages, or the Castles near to Pata- doma and Apolioms, were fled into the mountains and woods. As for the castell, which in that hurry and haste that they made could not be driven away with them, those they prayed upon and brought them to the ships. With these and all the rest of the booty he sent Nicias the Praetor of the Achaeans to Aegium, and sent forward to Corinth: and from thence he commanded that the land forces should be conducted and march by land through Boeotia: whilst himself falling from Condras along the coast of Attica, above the point or cape of Suntium, sailed even through the midst of his enemies armado, and arrived at Chales. Then after he had commanded the Citizens there for their fidelity and venire, in that neither fear nor hope was able to change and turn their resolution minds, and exhorted them for the time to come, to continue fidelity in their alliance and allegiance, if they made more reckoning of their own fortune, and loved it better than the condition.
dition of the Orontes: and the Opanthi he failed from Chæleis to Oceum. And when he had committed the government of the state, and the guard of the city, unto those principal citizens, who chose to go when the city was lost, rather than to yield themselves unto the Romans, himself passed over from Euboea unto Demetrias, from whence at the first he took his voyage to the aid and succour of his friends and allies. After all this, having appointed and let out at Castræ vast, and taken up a number of shipwrights to finish out the rest of the work, seeing that all Greece was now in quiet, both because Attalus was departed from them, and also for that himself had in good time succoured his allies and confederates, who were in some trouble and distress, he returned back again into his own Realm, for to make war upon the Dardanian.

In the latter end of that summer, wherein these affairs thus pissed in Greece, when Q. Fabius Maximus the father being lent as Embassador from M. Livius, the Consul unto the Senate at Rome, had brought word and made report, That the Carthaginians should fortify for the Province of France: and that himself might well be spared, and depart from thence, and the Consular army withdrawn out of those parts: the Lords of the Senate gave order and determined that not only M. Livius, but C. Claudius also his Colleague, should return to the City. This difference only between the one and the other appeared in the decree, in that they gave direction, that the army of M. Livius should be brought home, but the Legions of Nero should remain still in the province, and be opposed against Annibal. The Consuls by encounter of their letters passing between, agreed thus together. That like as they had with one mind and consent made war and managed the affairs, so, albeit they were in divers parts far asunder, yet they should meet in one place, and at one time make repair to the City of Rome: and that whether of them twain came first to Perusia, he should there attend the coming of his Colleague. And it was ordained, that they arrived both upon one and the same day at Perusia, From whence they lent an edict before, that the third day after the Senate should generally assemble together in the Temple of Belus: and so they were met upon the way with a multitude of people, who accompanied them as they returned into the City. And they were not content all of them in general to salute them and welcome them home; but every man was desirous particularly to take the Consuls by their victorious right hands some with congratulations, wishing them joy, others with thank-giving, acknowledging that by their good means and virtue the Commonwealth was preserved and let upright. Now when they had related in the Senate house (as the manner was of all Generals) what acts they had achieved, and withal demanded, that for their valiant and faithful service to the Commonwealth, first, due honour should be rendered to the almighty gods, and then they themselves allowed to enter the City in triumph: the IL, of the Senate made answer, That they for their parts were ready and willing to consider first and principally of the merits and goodness of the gods, and next and immediately of the good deferts of the Consuls: and as they decreed divine proceedings and supplications in the name of them both, so, they granted triumph, as well to the one as to the other. But the Consuls, because they would not divide their triumph (since that they had managed the war with one accord and common consent,) thus agreed between themselves. That forasmuch as the battle was fought within the Province of M. Livius, and the very day of the field fought, it was thought to be his turn to take the sign of birds, and have the entire rule: and besides, the army of M. Livius was brought back and came to Rome already, but that other of Nero could not be removed out of the Province; therefore M. Livius should ride in a chariot drawn with four steeds into the City, with his fouldiers following after, and C. Claudius presently came after mounted on horseback without his fouldiers. Thus the triumph was communicative to the one and the other, and increas'd the glory of them both; but especially of him, who the more that he exceeded his Colleague in desert, the more he yielded and gave place unto him in honour. So said every man. He there on horseback travelled in six days space the whole length of Italy, from one end to the other, and fought the very same day with banner displayed against Annibal thought verily be lay encamp'd against him with his army in Apulia. See how one and the same Consul, in the defence of the one part of Italy, and the other, against two Captains, may against two noble Generals of two armies, in one place employ'd his service and counsel, and in another opposed his body and force of arms. Behold (say they,) the very bare name of Nero was insufficient to keep Annibal within his camp: and what was it else, that disputed and defeated Annibal but even his only coming? Let the other Consul therefore be set up on high, and rid in a chariot drawn with as many horses as he will; all the while that the triumph indeed passeth through the City upon one horse only, Nay, if Nero went but on foot, he would be memorable for ever hereafter, as well for the refall of glory in that triumph, as for the winning of honour in that war. With these and such like speeches they entreated Nero as they beheld him, and so accompanied him even to the very Capitol. They brought into the Treasury-hone of the City in coin the thirty hundred thousand Sestertii, and 8000 Ases. Among the fouldiers, M. Livius divided six and fifty Ases to them apiece. And C. Claudius promised as much to his fouldiers that were absent upon his return to the army. This was noted and observed in the triumph, that the fouldiers uttered more ditties and rimes full of pleasant conceits and jests (as their manner was,) upon C. Claudius than their own Colleague: and that the gentlemen and horsemen highly extoll'd and magnified above all the rest, L. Petronius, and Q. Cicero the two Liucanimani, and exhorted the Commons to create them Consuls against the next
The eight and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

A next year: likewise that the Consuls for the time being confirmed this prerogative choice and election of those gentlemen, with their own affent and authority the morrow after, in a frequent assembly before the people, giving honourable testimonie of the valiant and faithful service of those foreaid Lieutenants in that war.

Now the time drew near of election of new Magistrates: and when it was thought good by the Senate, that a Dictator should call that Iolem in assembly for the laid election; C. Claudius the Consul nominated for Dictator his Colleague M. Livius, And Livius named Q. Cestius General of the horsemens. So there were created Consuls by M. Livius the Dictator, L. Petar/us, and Q. Cestius, even he who then was General of the Cavalry. After this, they went to the election of the Praetors and chose therein were C. Servilius, M. Cecilius Metellus, T. Claudius Aemilius, and Q. Marullus Curius, who then was Aedile of the Commons.

When these elections were finished, the Dictator having resigned up his office and dissolved the army, by virtue of an act of the Senate took his journey into the Province of Tuscany, to sit in commission and make enquiry, what states either of the Tuscans or Umbrians intended and plotted to revolt from the Romans, and to turn to Africabul at his coming into those parts: and who they were that had afflicted him either with auxiliary londiers, or with volunteers, or with any aid and help whatsoever. And these were the acts for that year, as well at home as abroad in the wars.

The great Roman Games were wholly tenet and set out again three times by the Aediles of the chair, C. Servilius Capio, and Serv. Cornelius Lentulus. Likewise the patines and plates, called Pluteus, were once fully renewed and exhibited again by M. Sempontus Matho, and Q. Marullus Thurinus, Aediles of the Commons.

In the thirteenth year of the second Punick war, when L. Vitellius Pholus, and Q. Cestius Metellus were Consuls, both of them were appointed by the Senate to make war upon Annibal in the Province of the Brenici. Which done, the Praetors cast lots: And to M. Cecilius Metellus fell the jurisdiction of the Citizens; to Q. Marullus, of the foreinners, C. Servilius his lot was to govern Sicily, and Q. Cestius Sardeca. As for the armies, they were divided in this manner: one of the Consuls had the conduct of that which was under C. Claudius the Consul of the year before, The other Conoul had the leading of that (namely, two full legions) which C. Claudius the Pro-Praetor before commanded, M. Livius as Pro-Conoul, whose government was prorogued for another year, received the charge of two legions of voluntaries in Heteronia, at the hand of C. Terentius the Pro-Praetor, and Q. Marullus was appointed by a decree of the Senate to deliver over his jurisdiction to his Colleague, and to take the charge of Gallia with the forces there: wherein L. Porcius the Pro-Praetor was Captain: and he had in comission to waste the lands of those Gauls who were revolted to the Carthaginians upon the coming of Africabul, C. Servilius was affighted with the power of the two Cannian legions to defend Sicily, like as P. Marullus had before. Out of Sardeca the old army was withdrawn, which was under the government of A. Hho/lius: and the Consuls enrolled one new legion, for T. Claudius to sail over with, Quintus Claudius, and G. Hho/lius Tubulius, had both of them their commissions newly sealed for one year longer, the one to govern Tarquinia, and the other to rule Capua. M. Valerius the Pro-Conoul, who also was Admiral for the sea-coast and river along Sicily, was commanded to give up thirty of his fall unto C. Servilius, and with all the rest of the Navy to return to the City of Rome.

As the City was in inulence and proud double their for the variable event of to greatest war, attributing on all was the woe, of prosperity and adversity to the gods: behold many prodigious tokens were reported to have hapned. Namely, That in Tarentum the Temple of Jupiter, and at Sardeca the Chappel of the goddesses Mount, were blazed with lightning from heaven, and the inhabitants of Sardeca were all terrorized with two serpents that were crept into the temple of Jupiter. From Antium there was word brought, that the harvest folk as they were reaping spiced certain ears of corn boldly. At Cardea there was a bow that was pulled a pig with two heads, and an ear yeaned a lamb both male and female. It was reported also, that at Alba there were two suns seen: and at Freccisle by the day-light appeared, also in the territory of Rome, by report, an Ox leke: and the altar to Neptune within the Cirke Flammea brake out into much flames: and the Temples of Ceres, Solus, and Quirinus were blased and smitten from heaven, The Consuls were commanded to espate and purge their fears full frights with excution of greater battles and to make supplication one day, Which was done according to the decree of the Senate, But above all the wondrous signs, either reported from abroad, or seen at home, the minds of men were put in fear, for the going out of the fire in the Chappel of Vesta. For which cause the Vestal Virgin who had the charge that night to look unto it, was by the commandment of P. Licinius the Bishop well and strongly charged. And albeit this hapned by humane negligence, and that the gods portended nothing thereby yet it was thought good that an expiation thereof should be made with greater facincs, and a solemn supplication held in the Chappel of Vesta.

Before that the Consuls went forth to the wars, they were put in mind by the Senate to take regard and order for the Commons, and to procure their reducing again into the country, and placing them in their lands and farms. For seeing that by Gods goodness the war was removed far from Rome and Latium, the country towns might be without fear of danger inhabited and frequented again neither was it a meet thing, that they should have more care to inhabit Sicily than Italy.
Italy. But the matter was not easily to be compassed and effected by the people, for that many of the free-holders were consumed up in the wars; and great scarcity there was of servants and horses to till the ground: besides, the cartell was driven away in booties, and the manor houes were either ruiuate or burned. Howebeit, a great fort were compelled by the authority of the Consuls to repair againe into their country habitations. The motion hereof was first occasioned by the Embassadors of Placentia and Cremona, who made complaint, that their territories were much dammified and wasted by the incursions and rades of the Gauls their next neighbours bordering upon them: and that many of their own natural inhabitants were fled and gone away, so as their Cities were not well peopled, and their country lay waste and defet. Whereupon Mamurius the Praetor had commision to defend and guard the Colonies from the enemy. And the Consuls by vertue of an act of Senat made an Edict and Proclamation, that all Citizens of Cremona and Placentia should by a certain day return into their Colonies. And then they themselves in the beginning of Spring took their journey, and set forward to war.

Q. Cæcilius the Consul received the army of Cilarno: and L. Peturinus of Q. Claudius the Pro-Praetor, and made up the full number of all the companies with those new foundiers whom he himself had enrolled. The Consuels led their army into the territory of Consentia, and having forraged and spoiled there and there, and being heavily laden with good booties, they were in a narrow and frighteful passage much troubled by the Bruttii and the Numidian archers: insomuch as not only their prizes were in danger to be lost, but they themselves that were armed in some jeopardy. Howebeit, the alarm was greater than the skirmish, and the booty being sent before, the legions escaped safe into places of security. And so from thence they went into the Lucanian country. All that K nation without any fight returned under the obedience of the Roman Empire. With Annibale that year was nothing done: for neither he himself made offer of war, upon the fresh hurt and loss received as well in publicke as private, nor the Romans provoked him as long as he was quiet. For they were all of this judgment, that there was such metall and value in that one commander, although all things else about him went to wrack, that they held it no good policy to provoke him, and make a sleaping dog; and verily I wot not what to make of him: whether he were more to be wondered at in adversity than in prosperity. For why? warring as he did in his enemies land for the space of thirteen years, so far from home, in much variety of fortune, with an army not consisting of natural Citizens and subjects, but mingled of a confudid ruff-ruff and medley of all nations having neither the same laws, nor manners, and customes, nor language; differing in fashions, in habit, in apparel, in armours, in rites, in religion, nor serving, as it were, the same gods: he had to knit and united them in one link and fireight band, that they mutinued neither among themselves, nor against their General, notwithstanding oftentimes there wanted money for pay, and vielues in their enemies country; for default whereof in the former Punick war, many outages were committed both among Captains and soldiers, But when Asdrubale the Captain together with his army was defeated and overthrown, in whom they repose all their hopes of victory, and when they were fain to quit, as it were, all Italy beside, and to retire themselves into an angle and corner of Bruttium; who would not think it a marvellous matter, that there was no stir nor commotion in his Camp? considering that over and beside all other difficulties, he had no means nor hope else to maintain his army, but out of the Bruttian country; and fay, that it were all wholly tilled, fowed, and well husbanded, yet a small thing it was to find and feed so huge an host. Moreover, a great part of their youth was fent away from the village of the fields and grounds, and wholly employed in warfare: to say nothing of the natural guilt and corrupt usage of that nation, which in time of war was wont to live and maintain the same by robbing and thieving. Neither had he any succour at all sent from home out of Carthage: whiles they all were fudious and careful only to keep Spain, as if all had gone well with them in Italy.

In Spain the fortune was in some respect all one and the same, in other far unlike and different: the same, in regard that the Carthaginians being defeated in a fought field, and having lost their Captain, were driven to the utmost coast of Spain, even as far as the Ocean sea: different, in that N Spain is a country more apt and commodious to the reparacion of new war, not only than Italy, but also than any land in the world, as well for the site of the region, as for the nature of the people. For although they were the first nation of all the main and continent, that the Romans went fight in hand withall to reduce into the nature of a Province; yet it was the last of all others that was subdued, and but lately in our days even under the conduct and happy fortune of Augustus Caesar. There at that time Asdrubale the son of Giffo, the greatest and noblest Captain in all those wars (next after the Barchin house) returned from Cades, and hoping by the help of Magno the son of Amilcor, to wage war in the, took mutiners throughout the farther part of Spain, and armed to the number of fifty thousand foot, and 4500 horse. And as for the Cavalry, all writers in manner do agree; but for the Infantry, some write, there were 70000 brought into the City Silpia. There upon the open plains fate these two Carthaginian Captains down, because they would not seem to fall off and refuse battle.

Scipio, when news came unto him of to pillifie an army levied, supposed that neither with the Roman legions he was sufficient to match such a multitude, unless he opposed the aids of the Barbarous nations; if it were no more but for shew and outward appearance, yet was to repose such assured confidence in them, as in the fundamental strength of his army, that in case they should
A should give him the fip when the time came, (the only occasion of the overthrow of his father and uncle,) they might do much hurt to the main change and total limb of all. And therefore he sent Sulla, before into Cales (a Lord over the dignity of eight and twenty towns,) to receive of him those horse and foot which had promised to levy in the winter time. Himself departed from Tarentum, and gathered some small aids of his allies that inhabit along the way as he marched, and so came to Capua. Then Sylla brought also certain auxiliaries to the number of three thousand foot and five hundred horse. From thence he went forward to the City Batallia, being in all of Citizens and Allies, with footmen & horsemen together, one with another 4500 strong. As they were pitching their tents and encamping, Aggeus and Marcellus, with all their Cavalry let upon them: but no doubt he had minded them mightily as they were making their defenses, but that certain troops of horsemen hidden behind an hill, whom Sertorius for the purpose had there betatowed, suddenly at unawares ran upon them and rejoiced them; as they were foolishly ridden forward without order and array. There had not well begun skirmishing with them, but they dismounted the foremost of them, and in such wise as engaged them, as next to the trench, to impede and annoy the pioneers and labourers at work: but with the rest that kept to their colours and went orderly in their ranks, the fight was longer and for a good while continued doubting. But when the squadrons which stood ready appointed in their guards and lattices, were struck forth; and after them, the lancers also from their work and fortifications were called to take arms: and still more and more continually, man to man, in heart, in place of those that were westering, so now from all parts of the Camp there was gathered together a full power, and ran to the battle; then the Carthaginians and Numidians turned their backs plain and fled. And at the first they went away by troops and companies keeping their order and array still, and not disbanded for battle order. But afterwards, when the Romans began one more eagerly to play upon the handful of them so as now their furious violence could no longer be restrained, then without all regard of tents or files they forgot their array, and ran on all hands by heaps, seeking every man the next way he could to escape. And all this by the skirmish, the Romans were made to understand their good deal, and the enemies hearts much disordered for certain dyes ensuing there in several actions and skirmishes maintained by the horsemen & foot that were light armed. Now when their small fightings, they had made plentiful trial on both sides of the fight, Adrastus first led forth his horse into the field: and then the Romans likewise came forward ready to receive them. But when both armies stood without their Camp, arranged in battle array & neither of them gave the charge: when the day drew toward the morning, Adrastus first retired with his men into the Camp and after him the Roman General likewise. Thus continued they for certain dyes together. Adrastus was evermore the first that came aboard and the first again that founded the retreat to his soldiers, wearied with long standing. But of neither side they made out to skirmish or did charge any foot, or gave alarms and set up array. Of the one part the Romans on the other the Carthaginians and together with the Africans stood in the main battle: and the allies of either side kept the wings, and those were Spaniards as well in the one array as the other. But in the front of the Carthaginian battle were the Elephants placed, who off and on a flew as if they had been Cales. And throughout both armies this word went for certain, that when the time came they would fight as they flood day by day strangled in feign, that the main battle were the Romans and Carthaginians, between whom was the quarter. So occasion of the fight, with like courage of heart and force of arms would en counter and cope together, Sertorius perceiving this once to go for good & to be fully tried in their opinions, altered all on for purpose against the day that he minded indeed to give battle. And over-night he gave a watch-word and taken through the camp, that both horse and man should take their dinner before day, and that the horsemen in arms ready appointed should hold their horses saddled and bridled. Now before it was broad day light he sent out all the Cavalry together with the light armament, to charge upon the Camp de general and standing watch of the enemies, and himself straight after advanced forward with the whole strength of the legions armed at all pieces, and clean contrary to the conceived opinion and perdition both of his own men, and also of his enemies he strengthened the wings with Romans, and marshalled the main battalions with the allies. Adrastus raised with the number and front of the horsemen leapt forth of his passion and perceiving a tumultuous alarm and fearful stir of his own men before the rampart and trench, and seeing far off the glittering ensign of the Legions, and the plains over-spread with enemies, presently made forth all his Cavalry against the foremid horsemen. Himself with the horse of footmen thence out of the Camp, and made no change or alteration at all in the marshalling of the battalions, otherwise than he rode the dikes part. The horsemen continued the fight a long time doubtfully: neither could it be determined by either, because evermore, as any of them was put back (which happened on both part in manner by turn,) they retired fiery into the battle of footmen.

him to draw it at length on the right: with direction also unto them, that they together with the light horsemen and light appointed footmen should encounter and close with the enemy, before that both battalions might meet and join together. Thus having enlarged all at full their wings, they with three squadrons of footmen, and as many corues of horsemen, together with the light armed skirmishers, advanced with full pace directly against the enemies, whilst the rest followed sedately across. Now there was a void piece of ground in the midst between, by reason that the Spaniards' ensigns went but slowly forward: and the wings had been in conflict already, when the flower and strength of the enemy battalions, consisting of old beaten Carthaginians and African soldiers, were not yet come within the darts shot neither did they in to succour them that were in fight, for fear they should form the main battalion for the enemy that came directly against them. Their wings were much diffusely in the sight on every side: For the horsemen, the light armed fowlers, and the skirmishers, having wheeled about and set a compass to environ them, ran upon them on their flanks. The cohorts of footmen charged upon them asfront, and all to break off their wings from the body of the battalions. And as now in every respect the fight was unequal, to the rabble of camp-followers, Balearic islanders, and raw untrained Spaniards, opposed against the approved Roman and Latin fowlers, pulled down aside. The day went on still, and Aemilius his army began to faint: and no marvell, for they were surprized and taken on a sudden, betimes in the morning, & were forced in battle to enter into the field & go to battle before they had refreshed and strengthened their bodies. And to that purpose Scipio had drawn the day on length, & trifled out the time that the battle might be late. For it was the eleventh hour, or one a clock after noon, before the enign of footmen charged upon the side points. And a good deal later it was ere the main battalions fought and joined together: so that the heat of the noon sun, the pain of long standing in armor, and hunger and thirst came all together to enfeebles and spend their bodies, before that they came to hand to hand & to buckle with their enemies: which was the cause that they stood leaning and resting themselves upon their shields. And over and besides all other troubles, the Elephants also affrighted and maddened with the tumultuous and disorderly manner of fight of horsemen, skirmishers, and light armed fowlers together. ran from the wings, upon the main battle. The Captains therefore themselves, being thus tamed as well in courage of heart as in bodily strength, gave ground and retreated. Howbeit they still kept their array as if the whole battalion had retired whole and found by the commandment of their General. But when the winners and conquerors on the other part were so much more forward to charge upon them more hastily on every side, because they saw them to lose their ground and shrink back, so as their violence could not well be endured; then albeit Aemilius held them still together, and did what he could to stay their flight, crying oftentimes aloud unto them, that there were hills behind them, and places of safe retreat, if they would retire in good sort; moderately, and in order; yet when they saw their enemies press so hard upon them, killing and wounding in pieces those that were next unto them, fear was above shame, and so immediately there flew their back parts, and ran away all at once as fast as they could. Yet at first, when they came to the root and foot of the hills they began to make a stand, and rally the fowlers again into order of battle, seeing the Romans to make some stay and of advancing their enigns up the hill. But afterwards, when they perceived them to come, luttily forward, they began again to fly apace, and so in fear were forced to take their Camp. Neither was Scipio himself far from their trench and ramparts, but in that very bunt had been matter thereof, but that immediately upon the hot gleams of the sun, when shined in a watery sky full of black and heavy clouds; there poured down such a shower of showers and tempests, that hardly could he himself after his victory recover his own camp. And some there were also that made in a humble and matter of confidence to attempt any more for that day, the Carthaginians, although they had great reason to rejoice themselves, and take their necessary rest, so weared as they were with travel, and sore wounded, especially seeing the night was come, and the torrny rain continued: yet, because their fear and present danger wherein they stood gave them no time to lye down and their clothes, against the next morning that the enemies should early still their Camp, they gathered up stones from out of the valies near about them, and piling them one upon another, amended the height of their rampart, purposing to defend themselves by the strength of their fence, seeing small help and remedy in force of arms. But the failing away of their Confederates was the cause that their departure and flight from them seemed more likely than their abode there would have been, This revolt was begin by Aemilius. A great Lord of the Turdets; for he with a great power of his followers and retainers fled from the Carthaginians to the adverse part. Whereupon two strong walled towns together with their garrisons were yielded by the Captains unto Scipio. Aemilius therefore, fearing lest this mischief might spread farther, now that their minds were once set upon rebellion, dislodged about the midnight following, and removed. Scipio so soon as he was advertised at the break of the day, by those that kept standing watch in their stations, that the enemies were gone; having sent his horsemen before to command them the standards and ensigns to be advanced, and led to speedy a march; that if they had gone straight forward and followed their tracks directly, they had no doubt overtaken them: but believing certain guides, that there was a shorter way to the river Po, they were advised to charge upon them as they passed over. But Aemilius seeing the passage of the river stopped against him, turned to the Ocean: and even at the first they departed in great haste as if they fled, which was the cause that they got the tare of the Roman legionary footmen, and won a good space.
A space of ground before them, But the horsemen, and light appointed footmen paid one while upon their tails, flanked another while their side, and by this means with charging and recharging they wearied them and lapsed their march. And when as upon many of those troubles by the way, their designs were to stand and erect to maintain skirmish, some time with the horsemen; and some times with the light javeliers and auxiliary footmen behind the legions also came on space and overtook them. Then there was not so much fighting and reaping as mischief and slaughter of them: down they went with them and killed them like sheep, flying, until their Leader himself began to fly, and escaped into the next mountains together with those who had asked and unarmed. All the rest were either slain or taken prisoners. Then the Carthaginians began to Encamp and fortifie in all haste and tumultuous fort upon the highest mount they could: and from whence (by reason that the enemies had at first in vain to get them, having to diffuse an assault they had not so much ado to defend themselves, but at a pace being bare and naked, and disfushtened of all commodities for their relief, they were not able to stand at the siege for a few days. And thereupon the fouldiers fell space to fortify their own camp and to go to the enemy. So that at the length the General himself in the night time abandoned his army and having got shipping (for the sea was not far off) he embarked and fled to Cades. Scipio being advertised that the Captain of his enemies was fled, left with Sylla ten thousand footmen, and a thousand horsemen to continue the siege of the Camp. Himself in person with the rest of his forces within seventy days returned to Tarracon, for to examine and hear continously upon his arrival the causes of the Princes and States: that upon the true estimate of their defects they might be rewarded or chastised accordingly.

After his departure, Masinissa having had a secret conference with Sylla, about inducing his people also to be able and to hearken unto a change, passed over into Affrick with some small retinue. At which present time very the occasion of his sudden alteration was not to evidence and apperent, as afterwards his most constant truth and full allegiance observed unto his dying day was a good proof and argument, that even then he entered not into this designment and alteration, without good and important cause. Then Magus, in those ships that Affrach had sent back, passed over to Cades. The remnant, thus forsook of their Captains, some by way of voluntary yielding and ranging themselves to the adveris part, others by flight, were scattered among the next Cities, and no troop remained of them behind of any mark and reckoning to speak of, either in number or strength. In this manner and by these events the Carthaginians driven all out of Spain, by the conduct and happy fortune of P. Scipio in the thirteenth year of the war, and in the thirtieth of Scipio his government in that Province and command of the Army, and not long after Sylla returned to Tarracon unto Scipio, and brought word that the war in Spain was fully ended. And L. Scipio was sent with many noble persons captives, as a messenger to carry tidings to Rome of the conquest of Spain. And when all other took contentment and infinite joy at this news, and abroad in all places highly magnified the glory of this service, he alone who was the man that did the deed (as one who had an inaltiable desire of vertue and true honour) made but small reckoning of the recovery and winning of Spain, in comparison of those matters that he hoped for, and conceived in that high and magnanimous spirit of his, which he carried with him. For now he thought in mind and aimed at the conquest of Africa and great Carthage: and therewith, to make perfect and consummiate that glorious war to his own immortal honour and renown. And therefore supposing it was now a good time to begin the way to those high exploits and to layplans, to prepare storehand, yea, and to win unto him the hearts of the Princes and nations, he determined first of all other to seek and alay King Syphax. This Syphax was King of the Masjisis, a people bordering upon the Moors, and abutting upon that part of Spain especially where new Carthage is situate. At the same time the King was in league with the Carthaginians: which Scipio supposing that he would observe no more readily and precisely, than commonly the Barbarians use, (wholefidelity dependeth upon Fortune) sent C. Latus with rich gifts and presents, as an Orator to treat with him. The barbarous Prince was glad hereof, both because the Romans then prospered every where: and also the Carthaginians in Italy lived by the loss: and in Spain went down to the ground, where they had nothing left: and thereupon he condescended to entertain the friendship of the Romans. But for the confirmation of this amity, he neither would give nor take assurance, but only in the personall presence of the Roman General himself. So Latus having obtained the Kings royal word and warrant that Scipio might come unto him with safe conduct and security, returned unto Scipio. Now for him that aspired to the conquest of Africa it was a matter of great consequence and importance in all respects to make himself sure of Syphax, the most mighty and puissant King of all that Land, who had aforetime made proof what the Carthaginians could do in war, and the confines and marches of whose kingdom lay fitly upon Spain, and but a small arm of the sea between, Scipio thinking it therefore to be a matter worth the adventure with great hazard, (for otherwise it might not be ) leaving for the defence and guard of Spain L. Marcius at Tarracon, and M. Sulla in new Carthage (whether he had travelled by land from Tarracon, and taken great journies) himselves and Latus together loofed from Carthage with two great Carvels of five banks of oars, and passed over into Affrick, through the calm and still sea, most of all rowing, and otherwhile also making sail with a gentle gale of wind.

Haply it to fell out that the very same time Asdrubal, driven out of Spain, was entered the haven ven with seven galleys of three course of oars, and rid at anchor near unto the shore for to be let a land. When he had a kenned of the two Carvels aforelaid, which albeit no man doubted but they were enemies, and might have been boarded by them being more in number, before they could gain the rode; yet hereupon enued nothing else but a tumult and hurry among the mariners and fouldiers together, in vain preparation of their ships and their armour. For the wind being somewhat big and high drawe the Carvels with full all out of the main sea into the haven before that the Carthaginians had any time to weigh anchor: neither durst any of them proceed to further dealing within the Kings Rod, so Aframshal first let a shore, and within a while Scipio and Lelius landed and went all to the Court. Syphax took this for a great honore done unto him (as indeed it was no leis) that there were come to him at that time, and in one day two General Captains of two most mighty and puissant States to sue for peace and amity with him. He inviteth both of them friendly, and gave them entertainment: and since it was their fortune to enter under one roof and the same house for to be lodged in, he endeavoured to draw them to a parley, and to make an end of all quarrels, grudges, and controversies between them. But Scipio denied flatly, that either there was any private malice or hatred between him and Aframshal. That should ict need an end with conference and speech; and as for State-matters, he might not treat with a professed enemy as touching them, without express warrant and commissiion from the Senate. But when the King laboured greatly with him, that he would find in his heart and not think much to bear Aframshal company at meat and me (because he would not seem to exclud either of them from his board), he yielded thereunto, and was content. So they supped both twain together with the King, and Scipio and Aframshal late both at one table in one meis, and upon one bed, for Fto it was the Kings pleasure. But so courteously Scipio behaveth himself (as he was a man that naturally knew how to carry himself with a grace and dexterity in all things, and in every place wheresover he came) that by his fair language and eloquent speech, he won not only the favour of the barbarous Prince Syphax (who before was not acquainted with the Roman fashions) but also the good will and love of Aframshal, a most malicious and mortall enemy: who seemed to have him in more admiration upon this one meeting and communication in presence personal, than for all his feats of arms achieved in war, and made no doubts but reckoned fully that King Syphax and his Realm would presently be at the devotion of the Empire of Rome. Such a singular gift had that man to win love and favour. And therefore the Carthaginians were not too much to seek how Span was lost, to consider and think how they might keep and hold Africk. For had they thus conceived, That this noble Knight and worthy Roman Captain was not come other wandering a venture, nor as a traveller to see countries, and to solace himself with walking along the pleasant and delectable coasts, leaving the Province which he had newly subdued, leaving his armies which he commanded falling thus with two fhips only into Africk, and committing himself into an enemy country, and into a Kings hands, of whose fidelity and protection he had no experience: but no doubt upon some great hopes to compleat the conquest of Africk. And this was that long since Scipio had in secret purpose and disposition, this was it that openly he fretted and formed at, namely, that he warred not himself as well in Spain as Annibal in Italy. Well, Scipio having concluded a league with Syphax, departed out of Africk; and now withstanding he was tossed upon the seas with variable winds, and those for the most part boisterous and raging yet up M on the fourth day he arrived at New Carthage.

As Span was generally at peace and rest for any Carthaginian war, so it was well known that certain particular States, in regard that they were touched with the guilt of treafures committed, were quiet for fear, rather than for any loyal allageance. Of which the most notorious, as well for their own greatnes and power, as for their fault and transgression, were Illicium and Caffiia. The Carthaginians had been Roman Confederates in time of prosperity, were revolted unto the Carthaginians, upon the defeat of the two Scipio and their armies. The Illicrians besides their revolt and rebellion, added this wickednes, in that they betrayed and murdered the Romans who fled unto them for succour after that overthrow. These two nations, if Scipio at his first coming had proceeded in rigour to revenge (whiles the States of the country flood in full N pene) he should have regarded their defect more than his own good and commodity. But when all troubles were composed and reduced to quietness, he thought it then a convenient time to punish and chastise them accordingly. And therefore he called L. Martinus from Taracum, with a third part of his forces, and sent him to affail Caffia. Himself with the rest of the army marched toward Illicium, and within five daies pretended himself before it. The gate he found barred him, and all preparation and furniture for defence and to withstand the assault. For their confcioue bare them witness what they had deferved, and needed there no other defence or intimation of war against them than the privy of their wicked fact, Heron upon Scipio took occasion to exhort his fouldiers, and began in this wise, "The very Spaniards themseles, quoth he by shutting their gates declare plainly what they jutly are to fear: and therefore ye ought o war o with them in more hostile malice and deadly hatred than with the Carthaginians. For with them the quarrel was maintained, as it were, without anger and rank, or only for losersight and glory: but of them are ye to take vengeaue for their doliloy treachery, for their cruelty and wicked villany. And now the time is come, to revenge not only the unworthy death of your fellow souldiers, but also the like ill'nood prepared for your selves. In case your hap had been to have fled for refuge thither at any time: yea, and to shew exemplary justice in all poelry, "
A polterity, that no man hereafter be so hasty as to wrong any Citizen or sojourner of Rome, in what poor estate to ever he be, without fear of condign punishment. Upon this exhoration and comfortable words of the General, they belittled themselves and divided the scaling ladders amongst choice men out of every company. And having to part the army between them, that Lelius the Lieutenant had the conduct of the one half, they gave assault with great terror unto the City in two places at once. But neither any one general captain, nor many principal Citizens encouraged and heartened the townsmen manfully to defend their City, but only their own fearful and sinfull conscience for they will well and remembered, yea, and put one another in mind, that it was their punishment and not victory that the Romans fought for. And as for themselves, since they were to lose their lives, this was the only point that they were to consider upon, namely, where

B they were bold to die, whether in fight and in the field (where the fortune of battle was common, and oftentimes lifted up the conquered, and put down the conqueror) or after their City burnt and razed, to yeeld up breath in the sight of their wives and children taken captives amidst the storms of whipping and hard irons, when they had endured all villanies and indignities. Whereupon not only the serviceable youth for war, but only men lay, but women also and children, even above the bodily strength of that age, or courage of that sex, were ready and preferred themselves to defend the walls. Some brought weapons to the defendants, others carried flowers up to the walls unto them that were fortifying and repairing the breaches. For why? they flood not upon their liberty alone, which whereto the tromakses of valiant & magnanimous men only, but they

C set before their eyes all extremities of torture and punishment, yea, and the shamefulst death that could be devised: and their hearts were incendicted to undergo all pains and peril, by striving togethe, and seeing one another to hazard themselves. In so much as they flood to it, and fought for it obstinately, that even that noble army which had subdued all Spain, took the repulse often times at the hands of the youth of one City, was driven from the walls, and familly to their honor received some soil in fight and began to fear. Scipio seeing that, and doubting left upon so many bootless attempts the enemies might make threats and his own foilliers be taunted, thought good to enter himself personally into the action, and to take part in that dangerous service. Having refulcd therefore his men for their cowardice, he commanded the ladders to be brought and set up, threatening that himself would scale the walls, if the reft made hafting and thus drew back. With

D that he made no more ado, but approached under the walls in great peril of his person. Whereupon on the ladders respecting the dangerous state of their Generall, and fearing greatly of his behalf, set up a shout on all hands, and began to rear ladders in many places at once. Lelius likewise on the other side plied the assault and gave not over. Then at last the townsmen, for all their resolute refolution, were overcome; the defendants overthrown and beaten from their standing, and the walls polisshed by the enemies. The castle also on that side which was thought impregnable, was in that brunt and tumult taken. For there were some Africans serving then among the Romans (fled before the enemy) who whiles the townsmen were wholly turned to defend those places that seemed to be exposed unto danger, and the Romans climbing and entring where they could, eplied one part of the City much higher then the reft, which because it was compassed

E about with an exceeding high rock, was neither fortified otherwise with bulwarks, nor manned with any defendants at all: and being men (as they all are) light and agile of body, and nimble by reason of much practice and exercitae, they climbed up the rock where they could meet with any cag thereto to bear them unequally from the reft, and to yeeld them hold and footing: but when they came to a plump upright steep place, and where the cliift was even and smooth, they fastened certain great iron spikes and nails, which they carried about with them of purpose, and stuck them a pesty distance slander, like greeks and flairs to climb upon: and ever the formost pluckt him up by the hand that followed next, and the hindmost heaved up thole that went before them, until they were gotten up to the top; and then they ran down with an outcry into the City, which was already won by the Romans. Then it was well seen that they forced this City from very de-} fperate anger and deep hatred. There was no thought of taking any prisoners alive, there was none that once minded any pillage, notwithstanding all lay open unto them for to be ravished and rifled. But down they went with the unarmed as well as the armed, killed men and women one another: may, their cruel mood was such, as they spared not the licking babc, Then they set fire on their houses: and what the fire favd they rashed and pulled down; so caned a mind they had, and to bent they were, to leave no monument and token of such a city, and utterly to abolis and root out the memory of those enemies.

After this, Scipio led his army against Capaula. This City was defended not only by Spaniards who thither were repaired out of others parts, but also by the reliques of the Carthaginian army which were scattered abroad in their flight, and thither fled. But ere Scipio was come before the Carthaginians, they had heard the news of the woeful calamity and destrucion of the Ilturians: by reason whereof they were all terrified and in despair of themselves; and as it felleth out in such variety of casuses and deferts every man fought means to fluit for himsell the best he could, without regard of his neighbour. And at first they began to have a secrect jealousy and suspicion one of another; but afterwards they brake out to open diytention: information the Carthaginians and Spaniards divided themselves, and parted slander. Corridius openly advised the Spaniards, and put to them, to yeeld. Himile was the Captain over the Auxiliary Carthaginians, whom whom Cedabellus (upon promise secretly before made and protection gained) betrayed, togethcr with the whole city besides, into the Romans hands. This victory was pursued with less cruelty: for neither was the offense on their behalf committed to heinous, and the heat and choler of the Romans was well cooled and allayed, by reason of their voluntary surrender. From thence was Marius sent against others of the barbarous people, to reduce unto subjection and obedience, as many as yet were not fully subdued.

Scipio returned to new Carthage to pay his vows unto the gods, and to exhibit and set out a death cleft between pliers at thrice, which he had prepared for the honor of his father and uncle deceased. This paftime and solemn feast was not performed by those kind of men, out of which matters of felfe, usually, as were picked out of bondslaves and freed men, that use to make sale of their blood for money, but all those that he employed in combat, were such as offered themselves and their service voluntarily and without hire. For some were sent unto him from the LL. of the city, to make them and proof of the valour in which naturally in that nation; others of their own accord professed to fight, for the love of the General himself, and to shew him pleasure: and some there were again, who, upon emulation of glory were drawn to make challenge, while others that were defrayed refused not, but strove to get the victory. There were also divers that determined those controversies by the bow, which, by arguing and pleading they either were not able or not willing to end: having agreed among themselves that the matter in hand should fall to him that should need to have the upper hand. And these were no mean persons of base degree and parentage, but of noble defcent and famous houses: as namely, Carbis and Orfius, two [brethren] could Germans by the father side: who differing and being at variance, about a principality of a city and state which they called Ileus, made profession to try the title at the utterance by dint of sword. Carbis was the elder of the twins: but Orfius his father had been the last Prince before, and received that Seignory after the death of his elder brother. And when Scipio was very desirous to debate and decide the matter with words, and to appease their anger and mood, they both made answer and said, that they had denied to the common kindly of either party, and that they would have no other god nor man to be their judge, but only Mars. Both of them were fierce: the elder presuming of his strength of body, the younger bearing himself upon the flour of his fresh youth, wifhing rather to die both twain in fight, than the one to be subject to the dominion of the other. In conclusion where by no means possible they could be reclaimed from this furious rage of theirs, they became a goodly shew and pageant to the whole army, and a singular example to prove what a mischievous malady among mortal men, the love of lordship is, and the desire of sovereignty. The elder, through prudence of his weapons and cunning flight, soon overcame the foolhardiness and inexpert firences of the younger. After this paltime of the twain followed the funereal games and plaies which were set forth magnificently, according to the wealth of the province, or the furniture of the army might afford.

In this mean time, the Lieutenants spied and sped their business nevertheless, according to their commissions: for Marius having passed the river Bollis (which the perambulations of that country called Citius) received two most rich and worthy cities, surrendered into their hands by composition, without any fault. Now, there was another city called Atiposa, which ever solicited with the Carthaginians: and yet it desired not too much anger and indignation in that regard, as for that, (letting slip the necessities that follow war) it ever bare a fruitful hatred against the Romans: neither was the town either for natural inlet into it strongly foted, or by means having so ample fortified that the inhabitants therein should take more heart, or presume the rather to be lightly and boldly. But the natural disposition of the people delighting in robbery, moved them to make roads and invade the territories of the allies of the people of Rome bordering upon them, and to catch and take prises in any louders, tellions, lackies, and followers of the camp, or merchants of the Romans, whom they could light upon ranging abroad. Yeas, and when there hapned a great company of them together, to pass through their marches and confines (for in no wise might they few travel in safety) they were surprized by an ambuscule laid for them, and being environed in a place of disadvantage, were taken and made men. When the army was come before this town to attack it, the townsmen carrying a guilty conscience for offences committed, thought it not the least felt course for themselves, to yield and give up the place to the enemies whom they had so much provoked against them: and seeing no hope of saving their lives, either by the strength of their walls, or force of arms, they resolved to execute upon themselves, and those things that was nearest and dearest unto them, a foul, detestable, and cruel death. They let out and appointed a compass of ground within the market place where they betowed and laid on a heap the most precious goods, that they had. Upon which they commanded their wives, and children to sit, and then they piled about them billets of wood, and laid saggots upon, of small young twigs. And after this they gave in charge to fifty lusty tall fellows armed that so long as the battle continued doublefull, they should defend and guard all their goods, &c. the bodies of those persons more dear unto them, and all the goods in the world, but an case they perceived their own side to go down and have the worst: and the city at the point to believe, they should then wot well and be suffered, and that all they whom they law going forth to battle, would freely lose their lives in that very flight and skirmish. And here was, which they belotted them in the name of the gods both celestial and infernal, to be mindful of their liberty, which that day was to take an end, either A "either by honourable death or shameful servitude: and to suffer nothing to remain, upon which the enemy in his furious anger might excite his cruelty: & considering they had both fire and sword in their hands to do the deed, to let those friendly and faithful bands, consume and dis parch the things which were sure to be lost and perish, rather than the proud enemies mutil over them and make al scorn of them. To these exhorations they adjourned a heartfull and horrible curse, to as many as either for hope of life, or upon timour of heart & fear of death, should alter their mind and resolution. Whereupon all at once they rushed out of the gates set wide open, and with a mighty tumult and noise, made a rally. Now there was no sent guard and station of any force opposed to retell them, for the enemies feared nothing else, then that they durst once issue forth of the gates. Some few troops of horse and the light armour, of a sudden were sent out of the B camp to make head, and they encountered them. Between whom there was a skirmish hotter and sharper in regard of courage and violence, then ordered by any skill and good government.
And therefore the horsemen were discomfited, that first presented themselves against the enemy, ye, & put the light armed footmen also in great fear. And truly they had proceeded to have fought even under the very rampair, but that the main strength of the legions, who had but very small time to be marshalled and arranged, put themselves in array and came into the field. And yet for all that, they were defeated for a while about the ensigns, by reason that they ran as blind and men in their furious fit & as bold as wildbeasts for want of fence, even upon the sword and their own deaths: But afterwards, the old experienced troopers, having lithly flown out against the first rash brute and violent flock of the enemies, ye, and killed the formost, bridled and fled the rage of those c that seconded them: and when they assailed with in a while after, to enter forward themselves & break in upon them, & saw none of them to give one foot of ground, but every one reloue to die in the very place where he stood; they opened their batell in the midst (a thing that they might easily do, considering the multitude of the foeldiers) compaigned and environed the wings of their ene-myes, who fighting round in a ring, into the last man wearthen every one. Thus were they that were in arms and made resistance manfully dealt withall by their enemies according to the rigor of war, and in the angry mood of teeldiers: & such was their end. But within the City there was fouler work, and a more cruel butchery and slaughter committed, when the feeble unarmed and naked multitude of women and children were murdered by their own neighbours and citizens, who having left the forreisad pile of wood on fire, fell to massacre them, and flung their bodies when D they were but half dead, into the light fire under them: so as their streams of bloody rushing out of their veins, were ready to quench the flame beginning to break forth. And in the end, when they themselves were even wearied with the pitifull slaughter of their own friends, they call themselves armour and all into the midis of the said fire. When this massacre was done and ended, the Romans entered the City with victory. And at the first sight of this monstrous object, they wondered for a while and loud exclaimed. But afterwards when they saw the gold and silver glittering within the heap among others goods, they were ready and defirous (as the nature of man is greedy of such things) to take and pull the same out of the fire: but some of them were caught with the flame and burnt: others stabb'd and haid bangan with the hot tleam of the vapour and breath issuing from the light fire, such a mean as were forlorn, & could not retrieve themselves back, by reason of their exceeding prize behind, that burnt them full forward. Thus Afra was destroyed by fire and sword, and yielded no pillarage to the enemies. And when Marcus had all the rest of the country yeeded unto him for fear of force, he led back his victorious army to Carthage unto Scipio.
About the very fame time there came from Gades certain fugitive renegates, promising to try-the garrison of the Carthaginians lying there, and likewise the captain of the garrison, together with the navy. Now had Mago retired after his flight, and having gathered together the ships in the Ocean, levied and raised certain aids, as well as, and the narrow seas along the coast of Africa, as also out of the parts of Spain next adjoining unto him, and all by the means of captain Hasmo. When as between the Romans and those fugitives, there had past faithful promise and security and troth, both Marcus was sent thither with certain squadrons and compan-yes lightly appointed; and also Lutius with 7 Tribunes [of three banks of oar] and one great gallay of five, for to war joyntly together by common councell, as well by sea as land. Scipio himself fell laik of a grievous malady, but much worie by report then it was, by reason that every one as men commonly have a desire & delight to solter & multiply rumours for the nonce, made ever somewhat of his own head, and put into the ret of the news that he heard: which brought the province out of frame and caused great disorder, especially in the most remote parts thereof; whereby it was well seen, what a world of troubles would have ensued upon some calamity indeed, when a vain rumour only, was able to raise such storms and tempests. For neither the Allies continued loyal in their allegiance, nor the army dutiful in their wonted obedience. And Indubius, who made full account of the whole kingdom of Spain, now that the Carthaginians were driven out and expelled, seeing nothing answerable to their hope and expectation, and themselves disappointed of their desigments, raised peasants and inhabitants of their own countries and those were the Lascans & solicited the youth of the Celtiberians: the country also of the Seetians and Sedetians, that were confederate States with the people of Rome, they walked in all manner of hostility. Besides, there arose a civil mutiny and dissention within the camp at Susa where there lay eight thousand foeldiers, as a guard and garrison for all the nation that inhabit this side Ibercus. Whole heads were set a work, and began to be butie not at that time.

when doubtful & fulpicious rumours were spread of their General, how he was in danger of death, H but long before, upon a licentious course of life that they had taken to, and so much the rather, for that now in time of peace they were held in, more frightly and nectly, who before were used in their enemies land, during the wars, to break out in more loose manner, and to live upon rapine and robberie. At the first they began to mutter and whisper secretly these and much like speeches: If there be war still in the province of Spain, what do we here among peaceable people? And if the war be ended, and the time of the commiision come out and expired, why are we not had again back into Italy? Then they proceed to demand their pay very malaperitly, and more laucly than might stand with the duty and modesty of soldiers: ye, and the Sentinels and corpor de guard would not stick to give reproachfull terms and railing words to the Tribunes or Marshals, when they went the round: and some of them made no bones to enter by night into the peaceable territory about them, for to fetch in boozes and prizes; until at length openly at noon day, they departed from their colours without passport and licence. All things they did as transported away with luft and left-will of soldiers, not guided by the order and discipline of warfare, nor directed by the commandment of their captains and rulers. Nevertheless, there was retained still a form of Roman camp among them: and that upon this only hope that the soldiery had of the Tribunes aforesaid: whom they suppose in time would come to the bent of their bow, enter into the fame furious courtes, and have their hand in the mutinies, and follow them in their rebellion: and therefore they were well content with them to fit judicially in Marshall court, in the usual place of Principisp to minilter law and execute justice also to call for the watchword and signall of them, yes, and orderly to go to their watch and ward in their course and due times. And K whereas in very deed they had cast off all reverence and obedience of government, yet they would seem to shew a kind of Iollat and dutiful diligence; in that (forfooth) they would be commanders of themselves, and keep some order without constraint. But in the end the mutiny broke out into open sedition: namely, when they perceived once, that Tribunes misliked and reproved their doings and endeavoured to croffe their deignes, yes, and denied fali and openly to take part with them in their follies and furious outages. Whereupon they difcreased the Tribunes of their judicial places in the Principisp, yes, and dispossessed them quite of all room in the camp, and by a general consent conferred the sovereign rule on two common soldiers, the captains of this their feditious commotion, Album Calenus, and C. Arimin Vnder, Who not contented with the * marks and ornaments of the Tribunes, were so bold as to handle the rods and axes, even the very roall ensigns of sovereign rule; never thinking how those kniches of rods, and axes flicking within them, which they caufed to be born afome to them the fear of others, were ready to light upon themselves, to scourge their backs and fides, and to chop off their own heads not long after. The suppozed deale of Scipio, whereupon they vainly built, was that blind his wits and minds upon the rumour whereof, being already notified abroad, they had no doubt, but all Spain generally would beep in armes. In which garboll and hurribull, they made reckoning, that they might levy monies of the confederat States, and Ipoil and pill the Cities neer unto them. And a mid these troubles, when all were in an uproar, and every man would venture to do every thing at his pleasure, then they suppozed their own deeds and actions would be Ieffecibled and marked. Now when as they looked every day still to hear fresh newes, not of his death only, but also of his funeral: and seeing there came none at all, but rather, that the former tidings were checked, and proved but a flying tale without head or foot, then they began to make femblance of enquiring after, & feeking out the first authors who raised thofe false reports: then they seem to be angry also and offended with them, to the end, that they forfooth might be thought rather to have beleved things inconceivably, than to have devised such a matter themselves purposely. These leaders and captains thus disappointed and abandoned, began now to dread and fland in horror of their own enigns of majesticy that were carried before them, and in stead of that imaginary rule which they almar, they feared greatly, that the very edge indeed of the true and lawfull power of authorite would be shortly turned upon them. As the sedition was thus dafhed, by occasion, that it was credibly and for certain reported, first, that Scipio was living: and within a white alter, that he was recovered and in health: there came seven Tribunes or Colonels, lent from Scipio himself. At whole ft arrivall at the camp, the soldiery grew more angrie and waipith before: but anon upon fair words and speeches, wherewith the Colonels entertained those of their acqaintance, with whom they had communication, they were well contented and appeased: for that they went about to their pavilions from one to another, and afterwards to the Principisp and the Pretorium, where they hapned to espie some knots of soldiery met togetheter and talking one with another: and so.ipake unto them, as if they rather questioned with them what the caufe should be of their anger and fuddan commotion, then blamed them, or laid any action to their charge. The reason commonly pretended, was this, that their wages was not duly paid at the day. Befides, they alleged, that whereas at the sametime, when upon the trecherous fact of the Illigurians, there followed the loffe and death of two Generals, and the defeat of their two armies, they by their vertue had defended the Roman name and honour, and likewise kep the province to their behoof, the Illigurians had indeed received con dign punishment for their offence and trepaffle, but there was none that had requited and reco- mpenced them for their good service accordingly. Believe me (say they again) your complaintes are just and requited reasonable, and we will make relation thereoff to the Lord Generall, and glad we are in our hearts, that it is no worfe, and that the calle is no more incurable therein:
A "for God be thanked, P. Scipio and the common-weal, are both sufficient and alfo willing to make "you amends for all.

But Scipio, a man though not to the wars, yet altogether unacquainted with forms of souldiers mutinies, was much troubled in spirit and perplexed, for fear the army might exceed measure in transgrefling or himfelf pass his bounds in punishing; for the fent he thought good to deal gently with them till, as he had begun, and fent abroad the collectors about the Tribunial Cities to gather up the revenues, whereby to put them in good hope of pay, and that with speed. And here-upon there went out an edict and proclamation, that they fhould repair to Carthage, there to call for their wages, either by companies apart one after another, or altogether in general, whether they would themselves.

B And now by this time, the sudden pacification of the Spaniards that were about to rebell, filled the fedition of the souldiers quite, which of itfelf began to cool and fade already. For Mandates and Inquilti, after it was reported that Scipio was alive and livelike, gave over their enterprize, and were retired again within their confines. So as now the souldiers had neither Citizen nor foreiner to take part with them in their folly & furious rage. And when they had call all about what course to take and what to tlake as they had found no other evasion, but the most common refuge and retreat of all lewd counsels and bad defignments, even to commit themfelves either to the juft wrath of their Generall, or else to his Clemency and mercy, whereof they were not palt all hope, and in utter defpair. For why he had not pardonned even the very enemies, with whom he had fought in warre. And as for their mutiny, it was as yet without bloodflied, and no hurt done: and as it fell was not cruel and outrageous, it had deferved no extreme and rigorous punifhment: thus reason'd they and comforted themfelves, as naturally men are too prompt and elerquent, to extirpate, to palaft and cloke their own faults, more I wot, then they fhould. This was their only doubt, whether they were better to go by cohorts and squadrons, or all at once to command therpy. In the end they were of opinion, that the fatter way was to go all in one train. At the very fame time, whiles they among themfelves laid their heads thus together in the camp, there was a counfult held at new Carthage about them, and much difpute there was, and variety of opinions, whether they fhould proceed againft the heads and Captains only of the feditious (who were in numner not above five and thirty) or by cutting off the greater fort to punifh this to ominous example and president of a rebellion rather then a mutiny. But the milder fentence took place, namely, that from whence the offence began, there the punishment fhould tell. And for the malaud, tame chaffiment and rebuke was sufficient for their correction. When the Counciil was difembled and broken up, to the end that it might be thought abroad that they fat about nothing else but this which they pretended, they published an edict throughout all the army in Carthage, for an expedition or journey againft Mandates and Inquilti, and gave commandment to make provision of viualls for certain days. And those leven Tribunes, who had before gone to Siculo to appeale the mutiny there, were now fent to meet that a my again and having four names given them of the principal authors of the forefald tumult, they had a direction un- to certain perons for the purpole, to the whom good countenance, to speak fair unto them, and courteously to invite them home to their houses, and afford them kind and friendly entertainment; and after they had made them good cheer and brought them to bed, to take them behin' the feapef upon their libertal drinking of wine, and to bind them faire hard and foon. Now when they were not fcarce from Carthage, they understood by whom they met and encountered upon the way, that all the whole army, was the next day following to fett forth again the face ans: which ridings not only rid them of all fear, which secretly surprifed and promised their minds, but alfo made them exceding glad and joyous, for that they fuppofed their Generall being now left alone with their forces, they might do with him what they would themfelves, rather then be at his commandment and devotion. And about fun-fitting they entered the City, and perceived the other army providing and making all ready for the voyage above named. Received they were and welcomed with gentle words, defived and framed on purpole: namely, that the L Generall took great joy and contentation for their coming, for that they were come to jut before the fetting out of the other army: and fo they went to repoie and make much of themfelves. And without any fliet and tumult at all, the ringleaders of the feditious, were by the means of those Tribunes entertained and lodged in the houses of certain perons of good behavior and meet for that purpole, and there apprehended and imprifonned. At the reliefe of the fourth watch, the camp to be of that army, whole expedition was pretended, began to fett forward on the journey: and some what before day the standards and ensigns advanced, but the whole army was detained and flaced at the gates, and certain warders fent to keep all the puages and wayes, that no man fhould go forth of the City. Then were thofe fouldiers who came the day before summoned to an audecie: and they ran boldly into the market place to the Tribunial of the General, and with their onerous and clainours they would have put him in some fear and dread of them. And at one time both the Lord General himfelf in perion accended up the Tribunial, and with all the armed fouldiers were brought again from the gate, and enclosed round about at their backs the armed multitude gathered together to hear an Oration. Then were they danted, as lately as they were before, and all their courage cooled: and (as they contefted afterwards themfelves) nothing terrifyed them fo much, as the healthfull strength and bold colour of the L Generall beyond all their expectation, when they thought vertily to have found fick and crafte: yes, and his countenance and face so vigorous and courageous, as they never remembered to have seen him so lively in any battle before. For a while he sat still and said never a word, until he was assured that the Captains of the mutiny were brought into the place and all things else in readiness. Then after silence made by an Oyes of the cryer, in this wise he began and said,

"I would never have believed that I should have wanted words and proper language unto mine own army: not because I have exercised my self at any time rather to make eloquent speeches then to manage valiant actions, but for that being always from mine infancy almost trained up in the camp, I have been acquainted with the natures and humours of soldiers, But in what manner I should speak unto you, neither my wits will give me advice, nor my tongue afford me utterance: you, I say, whom I wot not so much as by what name to call. Should I term you Citizens, who have revolted from your native country, or fooldiers, who have renounced your General, refused to be under his command, his charge and government, and made no conscience to break the oath of your allegiance? Lat it all, should I give you the name of enemies? Now surely, me thinks I agraine the bodies, the faces, the apparel and habit of mine own natural Citizens: but contrariwise, I see plainly the deeds, the words, the intents and minds of arrant enemies. For what have ye wished and hoped for else, but the Herveges and the Lacetanes have done the like? And yet I must needs say, that they had to follow for their captains in their outrage, Mandonius and Indibile, two Princes of roiyall blood: whereas you imitated the sovereign command & government upon Vmber Aries, & Calenus Albinus, two bale companions. Denie it now hardly if you will, that you all either were in the action, or willing in the intention. Verily I can easily believe you in so disavowing, and namely, that all this proceeded from the folly of some brainick fellows among you. For the trepisses committed are of that quality and consequence, that if the whole army were culpable, the expiation & purging thereof could not be procured without great sacrifices and exquisite punishment. Full against my will I touch these points, as fores and galls that will not abide the rubbing; but unless they be touched and handled too, they cannot possibly be cured and healed. I assure you, for mine own part, I thought verily, that when the Carthaginians were driven out of Spain, there was neither place nor person throughout the whole province that had envied my life and health: such hath been my cariage and so have I demeaned my self not only with Allies, but also with enemies. But see, how much I have been deceived! even in mine own camp the news of my death was not onely received with joy, but expected also with a longing desire. I speak not this, that I would have any man to imagin that I conceive, how all in general are guilty of this fault (for if I were permitted to dwade in my mind, that my whole army withed my death, I would here die pietly before your eyes; for what good would my life do me, repined of my fooldiers and fellow Citizens?) But the multitude of every people is like the least in nature; which of themselves are unmoveable and stir not as the winds blow, as the gales go and come, so are they either calm or troublesome and unequiet: and even the cause and source of all this fury and outrage, is in some few heads and leaders. As for ye, you have caught the infection from them, and played the fools with them for company. Surely I am thus persuaded on this day, that ye know not yet, to what enor- mous height of folly ye have proceeded, what mischievous act ye were enticed into against mine own person; what you attempted against his native country, your wives and children; what you entered against the gods and ancestors of your loyal oath; what ye have done against the sacred altipes and happy forms, under which ye have served in warfare; what ye have committed against the cusumes & law of war, against the discipline of your ancestors & finally, how prejudiciable and offensive your designs have been against the sovereign majesty of the Roman empire. As for my self, I am willing to say nothing: content I am to think, that ye rather gave credit to my death rashly and inconsiderately, then hearken there it willingly and gree-
dly. And it may be, that I have so behaved my self, that no wonder it is, if mine army be wea-ty of me and of my government. But what harm hath your country derived at your hands which to betray, ye should complott with Mandonius & Indibile? How hath the people of Rome offended you, that you have deprived the Kn, Marshals and Colonels created by the voices of the people, of their lawful rule and authority, and confir'd the same upon privat persons? And being not therewith contented, to have and a knowledge them for your Colonels; you, even you the army of the Romans, have taken the knitches of rods belonging only to the Ge-eral, and bestowed them upon those that never kept so much as a bondslave of their own to command, Albinus and Aries foorth, let up their pavilions in that chief place and State in the camp, where the sovereign magisfrate ought to quarter: with them the trumpet founded: from them the signall and watch-word was demanded, they far as judges in the Tribunal feast of Scipio the Pro-conful: upon them the Lictors and Sergeants attended: for them they made way & voided the place, against they should go forth & march in their state: and before them were the rods born, and the axes withall. When it rained stones, when thunderbolts are shot, when lightnings flash from heaven, when beasts bring forth strange, uncouth, and monstrous young ones; contrary to the course of nature, you take them for prodigious signs and fearfull tokens. Nay this is a monstrous fight and wonder in deed, which by no sacrifices of beasts,by no supplications and praiers, can be purged and expiat, without the blood of them that have committed so haunous a fact. And albeit no wicked crime can be founded upon any reason, yet would I gladly know of you (as in a case that indeed should not be once named and remembered) what
"what was in your mind? what imagined you? and what was your desigment? There was in times past a legion sent to Rhegium, there to lie in garrison. Traitorously and villanously they murdered the principal citizens there, and for ten years space polefled and kept that wealthy town to their own behoof. For this notorious and basely fact the whole legion, even four thousand men and no fewer, were in the market place of Rome beheaded every one. And yet they at the first followed not for their captain Atrius Ember, one little better than a lander, skulker, and follower of the camp, a man of an unlucky and unfavoured name, but Decius Inebibus a Tribune or Kn. Marshall, neither joined they with Pyrrhus nor with the Samnites and Lucans, professed enemies of the people of Rome. Whereas, ye have plotted in counsell, and meant to have banded in armed forces together with Mandamus & Indubius, their purpose was to have seceded themselves for ever in Rhegium, like as before them the Campanes, who took Capua from the Tuscaus, the old inhabitants, and the Mamaritans likewise: who polefled themselves in Sicily of Messana, and never minded to molest and make war upon the people of Rome, or any of their allies and confederates. But tell me, ye pray, intended ye to have made your continual residence, and to have dwelt at (where?) where if your General at my departure out of the province, when my time and the commisary was expired, should have left you behind, ye might have cried out upon me, and called for vengeance to God and man in regard of hard usage and wrong offered unto you, in that ye might not be permitted to return home to your wives and children. But alas, wife and children were clean excluded out of your minds: ye thought no more upon them, then of me or of your native country. Well, I will follow on till, and discourse upon your plot and designs, wicked and ungracious though they were yet haply not altogether so foolish & foolish in the highest degree as may be supposed. Imagined ye being eight thousand men in number, (and say that ye were all of better account & reckoning then Albins & Atrius are, under whom ye submitted your selves) to have been able for to defeat the people of Rome of the province of Spain? so long as I lived, and the other army round sound and strong: wherewith in one day I forced new Carthage, with which I discomfited, put to flight, and chased out Spain, four brave Generals, and so many puissant armies of the Carthaginians? But let that go by, and to lay aside my name, and to speak of no more abuse but this, that ye were very credulous and quickly beleaved that I was dead. How then? what if I was departed this life and gone indeed? Had the common-wealth together with me yeldeed up her ghost? Would the principate and empire of Rome have lain to the ground with me at once? Forteund (O Jupiter, almighty and most gracious) that ever a City hauing first most happily, with the approbation of the gods, built eternal for ever to endure, should be comparèd and made but equal with this frail and mortal body of mine, Flaminius, Punicus, Gracchi, Porphonius Albins, M. Marcellus, T. Quintius Crispinus, Cn. Fulvius, two Scipios, my father and uncle both, so many noble warriors and captains have been slain in this one war; and they are dead and gone: yet the people of Rome continueth on foot and overliveth them, yes, and shall still, when a thousand more of them shall die, either upon the edge of the sword, or upon some fickness or other. How should then the fate of the people of Rome be entered & buried with the dead corps of me, but one man and no more?

Even you yourselves (to go no farther to seek examples here in Spain, when my father and uncle two Generals were killed, chose Septimius Maruus for your captain, to lead against the Carthaginians, being in the ruff and jollity of their breath and late victory. I speak now, as though if I had miscarried, Spain had been left delictute and without a Commander and General. M. Sylla whom I had sent in the province, joined in the same commissary and of equal authority; L. Scipio my brother, and C. Labrus, both Lieutenants general: would they have sittill and done nothing? would they have failed to maintain and recover the majesty of our empire? What? could ye have compared army for army, captains for captains with them? was either your reputation and credit your quarral and cause comparable or toppose that in all these regards, ye have been superiour and gotten the vantage, would ye indeed with the Carthaginians, have born arms against your native country? against your fellow citizens? would ye in very truth, that A-friek should have commanded Italy, and Carthage the City of Rome? And for what desert and great treaspe, I pray you, what your country had committed? Coriolanus long ago, being wrongfully condemned and unworthyly banished, seeing himself to live a miserable exiled man, was moved to take arms and to come against his country to aflail it. A private regard of love and natural kindneffe, reclamed them from publick particide. But what grief of heart, what fit of anger hath incited and provoked your? Set cace your wages were paid latter by some daies, whiles your General lay sick; was that a sufficient cause for you to give defiance to your country & profession open war against it? was that enough to cause you to revolt from the people of Rome, and turn to the lerrgates? and to spare no law of God and man, but to break all and make shipwreck of concience and common honesty? now surely, louders, ye were out of your wits, and fools ye were in the heightest degree. I was not my self farther out of frame and ficker in body, then ye were in your mind and understanding. I tremble to think upon it and to rehearse, what folk beleved, what they hoped, what they wished. Let all be forgotten and buried in oblivion, it be possible as if not, as we speak of it yet, however we do, take it up deep silence. I cannot deny, but my words have leemned sharp and bitter unto you, and all this my speecho very rigorous. But, so much more cruel think ye are your deers, then my words tare and tour? And if ye deem it reasonable, that I should bear & put up the things that ye have done, wil ye not abide then and and take in good part, and patiently to bear me to tell all that I can say? But these matters I will H lay no more in your dish from henceforth; ye shall be checked no more for them. Would God ye could as soon forget them, as I will put them out of my remembrance. And therefore as touching you all in general, if ye repent and be displeased with your selves for your fault and folly, I shall be content and think you punished to the ful. But as for Albinus Calvus and Arrius Vimbler, with the rest of the authors of this cursed and detestable mutiny, they shall make amends for their crepitation and transgression, even with their heart-blood; and they shall surely die for it. The spectacle of their exemplary punishment ought not to seem unto you grievous and odious, but rather a pleasant and detestable sight, if ye have any grace in you, and be come again to your right wits. For their intent was to hurt and do mischief to no man alive, more than to your selves.

He had scarce made an end of his speech, when all at once, according to the order given before-I had, there was presented to their eyes and ears a terrible and fearful object on all sides. For the army which had environed the assembly round that clustered their swords & bucklers together.
The common cryer was heard to cite by name all those that were condemned there, in the presence of the whole audience. Stripped they were naked, and laid forth in the mids of them all, and every thing brought out at once for to accomplish the execution. Thus were they bound to the flake, whipped with rods, and their heads chopped off. So benumbed they were all and astonished for, that were present at the sight thereof, that there was not heard amongst all them one shrewd & hard word, in misliking the rigor of the punishment, no, nor so much as one groan or secret sigh. Then their bodies were all drawn at one side, the place was made clean, & purged & all the sounders were called by name & before the Colonels & Kn. Marshalls, iware allegiance,

At the same time, Captain Hannicus by Magos from Gades with a small power of Africans, solicited the Spaniards about the river Batis, for many, to rebel and put in arms upon a four-thousand able men. But afterwards he was forced by L. Martinus to quittance his camp, and having left the greatest part of his men in the very tumult of taking the camp, yea, and some in the flight, whom the borne pursues in chase and flew as they ran straggling, himself with few others escaped away. While these things happened about the river Batis, Latius in the mean time having paffed through the frights into the main Ocean, arrived with his nave at Cartesia. This is a City standing on the sea coasts bounding upon the Ocean, even in the mouth of the river, where it first openeth from the frights into the broad seas. Now there was some hope (as hath been foregoing) to gain the City of Gades without any assault, by treason, for as much as there came some into the Roman camp, that of themselves made offer and promise thereof. But the treason brake forth too soon and was revealed before it was tyme, the conspirators were all apprehended; and sent by Ma-gus unto Adherbal the Pretor, for to be convicted to Cartagin. And Adherbal having embraced those traitors in a Caravel or Gallion of five banks of oars, and fent them thence, because the flower of the real of those three banks; himself with eight three hundred gallies, followed a pretty way after. The said Caravel of five courses of oars, was not so soon entered the straights, but

Scipio also being embarked in another Caravel of the same fort, made out of the haven of Cartesia with seven Gallies of three ranks of oars and invested Adherbal and the foresaid Gallies: supposing verily, that the enemies Caravel being taken tardy in the very current, was not able against the tide to retire. Adherbal being thus surprised on the lattisem, for a while flood in fear and doubt what to do; whether he had best to follow on after his own Caravel, or turn the prows and beaks of his gallies, and make head against the enemy. Thus whiles he flood at a bay lingering, he loft the opportunity of shifting and avoiding a battle: for now they were come within the dare shot, and the enemies on every side were ready to charge. And the current was so strong, that they were not able to rule and manage their ships as they would. But the manner of fight was nothing at all like to a sea-battle, for as much as they could do nothing to their mind, nothing by skill dexterity, nothing by counsel and advice. The nature only of the narrow seas, the violence of the current was all in all, and ruled the conflict, driving the ships one against another, as well up on their own fellow as upon their enemies; not with standing they rowed and labored what they could to the contrary. So as one while ye should see a ship that fled and scuded away, whirling about back again with a whistle by the waves, upon those that had her in chase: and likewise another that seemed to follow and pursue after her enemies, if she had hopped once into a contrary course of billows, to turn top and tail, and seem to flee. And in the very conflict it fell out, that when as one vessel ran with her beak head full butt upon another, she was forced by waves to turn her side, and receive in her flank the pails of her enemies. And contrariwise, when as one lay with her flank opposite to the enemy, sudenly all at once the she would wind and whilte again upon her prow. As the gallies fought thus doubtfully together, hap hazard, at the pleasure and will of Fortune; the Roman Caravel (were it because of her weight the she was able to land more steadily against the skipping billows, or by reason that she had more banks of oars that cut the wave, and to more easily ruled) had chance to sink two of the smaller gallies of the enemies; and running fast by one with a forcible violence wip's away clean all the oars of one side, and had no doubt spoiled and marred all the rest that she would have invested and charged upon, but that Adherbal, with the other five made sail, and got over into Africk. Latius having failed back to Cartesia with vict'ry, and heard what had been done at Gades, namely, how the comptor of betraying the end was disclosed, the conspirators sent bound unto Carthage; and consequently all their hope fruitered and turned to nothing upon which they came to Gades; dispatched messengers to L. Maritius, giving him to understand, that unless they meant still to lie before Gades, straying away the time and doing no good, the belt way was to return unto Seipio the lord General: and so with the consent of Maritius both of them within few days repaired to Carthage. Upon whose departure Mago had not only a time to breathe himself being frighted as he was with a double fear both by land & sea, but also hearing that the Illegates were revoluted, conceived some hope to recover Spain again, and addressed his couriers to the Senate at Carthage: who by relating not only the civil mutiny that arose in the Roman camp, but also the rebellion of the confederates (safed all by way of amplification and enforcing every thing to the highest degree) should encourage and exhort them to lends aids for to regain the dominion of Spain, left unto them by defeat over their ancestors, Mandritus & Indubila who were retired for a time into their confines, until they knew how the sedition iped and what was the ille thereof; reflet still in influence. For if the natural citizens had their trepacity forgiven, they made no doubt about themselves, but they might be pardoned also. But when it was published abroad how severely and sharply they were punished, they supposing their own Transgression to deserve the like punishment, solicited their own people again to take arms; and thus having levied and assembled the fame power of aids which they had before, they pressed into the sedetans country, whereat the beginning they lay in standing camp, being in all 20,000, and 250 horse strong.

Scipio after that he had soon reconciled and won again the heart of his loudiers, as well by making true payment of their wages, to the faultly and innocent alike, as also by showing a loving countenance, and giving friendly words unto all indifferently, before that he dislodged and removed from Carthage, assembled them all together to an audience. Where he inveighed bitterly and at large against the falsehood and treachery of the lords of the country that rebelled, and protested before them all, that he went not now to be revenged of them for their wickednesses with the same mind, wherewith lately before he had cured the folly, and reformèd the error of his natural citizens: for that he thought with grief and gror, and with tears like as one that rent and cut his own bowels, expiated and purged either the inconfedist folly, or the wilful malice of eight thousand men, with the head of thirty persons: but now I go with joy and glad heart, yea, and with a resolution to execute and annihicate the Illegates. For neither are they born in the same land with me, nor linked now in any society at all unto me: the only bond of faith and amity which was between us, that they have themselves first ripped broken. But in my own army, besides that I see they are either Roman citizens or else allies, and those not Aliens but meer Latins: this doth me good and moved me much, that there was not among them so much as one londier to speak of, but was brought out of Italy either by ininculce Scipio (who was the first of the Roman name that came as L. Depuy into this province) or else by my father who was Conful, or last of all by my mine own felt. They are every one of them well acquainted & inured with the name of Scipios, and lied to their fortune and government: whom I gladly would conduct home safe with me to defende triumph, and whom I hope to find ready to affit me with their favour when I stand for a Confulship, if it were a matter that concerned the honor of them in all general, as well as mine particular. And as for the expedition now in hand, whosoever taketh it to be a war, little remembereth the noble sets by me archieved: for surely I make more reckoning of Mago and his exploits, who is fled with a few ships as it were out of the compass of the world, in an Iland environed with the Ocean sea, then I do of the Illegates. For there in that place is not only a Carthaginian captain, but all the Carthaginian forces and strength that now remain. Here are none but theves and robbers, and their leader: who peradventure may be of some power and sufficiency to forage the fields, to burn the houses, to drive away some castell of their neighbours: but to come to hand-frokes in a set fight and ranged batail, they are of no valour and worth at all: who no doubt will come into the field, trusting upon their good footmanip to run away in the rout, more than upon any force of arms to maintain the fight. And therefore I have thought good to put down and suppress these Illegates, before I depart out of the province; not for any present danger at all, or fear of greater war that I see may spring from thence: but first and principally, that I may gracie the rebellion should not remain unpunished: and next because it might not be said, that in a province so subdued, as well by singular prowess as rare felicity, there was left one enemy behind of the Romans. And therefore in the name of the gods follow after me, not so much to make just war (for ye are not to deal with enemies any way comparable unto you) as to take vengeance of wicked men, and to punish gracelesse persons. When he had fulfilled his speech, he dismissed them, with commandment to be ready the next morrow to put themselves in the journey: and after that he set once forward, by the tenth day he came to the river Iberus, and when he had passed over, within 4 days more, he encamped in the sight of his enemies. Now there was a plain there, environed round about with mountains: into which vale between, he caufed the castell (and those were for the most part driven out of the enemies company) to be put forth to grazing and all to provoke the anger of the fierce and savage enemies: and lest out withall, the light appointed archers to guard them: he took order besides, that when there were one in skirmish with the vancurses of the enemies, Lelius with his Cavalry should closely from some covert place give a sudden charge. And for this purpose, there was a hill that bare out handsomely to hide the ambush of those horsemans.
And presently without any delay, they came to skirmish: for the Spaniards made out to the Houst, so soon as ever they discovered them a far off, the archers again and againers the Romans ran upon the Spaniards as they were busie in their booty. And at first they terrified them, and skirmished with their foot; but afterward, when they had spent their arrows and darts, which were better to begin a fray, then determine a battle, they drew their naked swords and began to fight close together foot to foot. And surely the skirmish of the footmen had been doublely decided, but that the horsemen came upon them: who not only afforded the enemies in their face, and trampled them all under their horsefeet that came in their way, but also some of them having wheeled about, and set a compease along the hill foot, presented themselves at the back of the enemies, so as they enclosed and shut up the most part of them in the middle between. Infoo much as there caused a greater fltughter, then commonly upon light skirmishes by way of such rods and excursions. But the barbarous people by this discomfyt were rather kindled and enflamed to anger, then dautned any way or discouraged. And therefore, because they would not seem to have been dismayed or affrighted, the morrow morning by day-light, they showed themselves in battell array. The brightne and narrow valley, as it is beforefaid, was not able to receive and contain all their power; for two third parts wellner of the infantry and all the horse were come down into the plain field: and the rest of their footmen besides, stood together quartered on the side of the hill. Scipio judged that the feantnesse of the ground made for him, both because it seemed that the Roman soldiers were more fitted to fight in a small room then the Spaniards: and also for this the enemies were engaged within that place, which was not able to contain the whole multitude: and therefore he devisd a new stratagem before. For considering that he K could not in to narrow a space bring his own c. valie about to compease and charge the wings and points of their battell, and that the horsemen which the enemies had arranged together with their infantry, would serve them in no fead; he gave direction unto Lutius to conduet the horse as closely as he could about the hills; and to keep off the squadrons of the cavalry so far as possibly might be from the skirmish of the Infantry. Hymelf directly turned all the enigses of the footmen oppost against the enemies, and marched the forefront with four cohorts only, because he could not stretch out the battell any broader: and then without delay he made half to begin the conflict, to the end, that while the enemies were smote and occupied in fight they should be withdrawn from eying the horsemens as they traversed over the hills. Neither had they an eye of them at all, while they were brought about, before they heard the noise and tumult of them as L charged upon their backs. So they fought thundcr in two or severall places, and battells of foot, and as many of horse encountered & joyned along the plain, because the brightnesse of the ground would not admit both horse and foot to fight together in one plot at once. Now when as the infantry of the Spaniards could not help the men of times, and they again were more succoured by the cavalry, but that the footmen trysting upon the cavalry, were without good direction put rashly to fight in the plain ground, and to beaten down and slain; and the horsemens being enclosed round, could neither abide the enemies footmen from them (for by this time their own infantry was overthrown and defeated) nor yet endure behind them the hot affult of their horsemen; they left their horses, called themselves into a ring, and after they had fled to their own defence long time, were slain every one to the last man: there was not I say one footman or horsemans left of all those that fought in the valley. As for that third part which fled upon the hillside, rather to behold the foot in a piece of security, than to part with their fellows in the battell, they had both time and space to shift for themselves and escape. Among whom, were the Princes alfo themselves in person, Madridius and Inhibiti: who were slit away in the first tumult of the fight, before all the battalions were environed. The same day was the camp also of the Spaniards forced, and therein besides other pillage, were taken prisoners almost three thousand men. Rom. ns and allies there died in that fight upon a 1000, and above three thousand were fore bent. The victory no doubt had been obtained with little bloodshed, if they had fought in a more open piece of ground, where there had been better scope to fly away. Then Inhibiti giving over clean to think any more of wars, & supposing nothing later, then to have reconce to the approved goodness and clemency of Scipio, lent his brother Madridius unto him: who fell plott, down at his feet, blaining much (as the cause of their folly) the far rage and fury of the time; wherein not only the Fligeres and Lieetenes, but also the Romes camp, as it were by some contagious and pestilent infection, became franticke and besides themselves; and laid withall, that the condition of himself, his brother, and their followers and subjects was such, as they were ready if it were so thought good, either to yeeld up their lively breath unto Scipio, at whole very hands they had once received the tyme, or if they might now be pardoned and Lived, to devote and employ their lives for ever hereafter wholly in his service, as being now twice due unto him alone, and nother. Once after they prefumed upon confidence in their innocent cause, when as yet they had no experience of his clemency: but now contrary wise they repayed all their full hope in the mercy of the conqueror, and nothing trutting in the goodmen of the quarrell. Now it was an old custom among the Romans, not to execute the absolute authority of the government upon any (as they did to peaceable subjects) with whom they were neither confedered in equal and reciprocally covenants, nor linked in the bands of amity; before they surrendered up unto them all rights, as well divine as humane: before they had receivd hostages of them, taken armor from them, and granted garrisons in their towns and Cities. Scipio after he had sharply rebuked and A and roundly shaken up Mardonius there present, and likewise Indibilis that was absent, said, that for their wicked parts and lewd demeanor, they had worthily deserved death; but five they should by his goodnes and the gracious favour of the people of Rome. And moreover he promised neither to depopil them of their armours & weapons (the seizing whereof was put a pawn and assurance unto such as feared rebellion; for as for him, he left unto them their armours freely to use at their pleasure, and their hearts and minds secured from fear) nor proceed in rigor and cruelty against the guileless hostages, but against their own persons, if they went out and revolted again: nor yet would be content himself to be revenged of disarmed and naked enemies, but the offenders & transgressors should in their arms suffer for their delerts. And now since they had tried both fortunes, as well the one as the other, he put unto their choice, whether they had rather the Romans practised or displeased, friends or enemies? So Mardonius had a fair delivery; only there was an imposition and fine laid unto him and Indibilis, of a sum of money for succours pay. Scipio himself after he had sent Mardonius before into the farther part of Spain (beyond the river Iberius) and Syracus back again to Tarracon, laid some few days until the Illergetes had made payment of the monies that they were charged with: and then with all his succours lightly appointed without carriages marched in a running camp to overtake Mardonius, who by that time approached nearer unto the Ocean.

The treaty when Mafaufla began before time, was upon sondry occasions put off till and deferred. For the Numidian Prince was very desirous to parley & commune with Scipio himself in person & in the right hand to allure him of fealty: which was the very cause then, that Scipio took so long a journey to far out of his way. Mafaufla being now at Gades, and advertised by Mardonius that Scipio was coming and near at hand, threw false semblance to Mago, made many excuses, & found much talk, namely, that their houses being pinned up and pelried within the land, were well secured and spoiled: and that by their long abode there, not only they made others feel the want and scarcity of all things, but also tasted thereof themselves: and besides that his men of arms for very ease and idleness, became feele and unly. By which suggestions he persuaded with Mago, and prevailed with him so much, as to suffer him to crosse over into the continent, under colour to wait and spoil the land of Spain next adjoyning. When he was passed over, he sent before him three principal Numidians, gentlemen of mark, to appoint both the times and the place of their meeting and conference, and gave order, that Scipio should detain some of them with him as pledges; the third was sent back to conduct Mafaufla to the appointed place according as he was commanded, and so with a small company they met for to parle and commune together.

Now was Mafaufla the Numidian King possessed before with a wonderful admiration of Scipio and his person, by reason of the name that was blazed abroad of his noble acts: and had conceiv'd within him, and imagined, that he was a man right personable, of a mighty and goodly frame, but when he once saw him in place, he grew into a very greater reverence and honor of his person. For besides the exceeding majesty and port that naturally he carried with him, his goodly long bulk of hair well became and grace him: the habit also and stature of the body, many & fouldierlike, not brave nor tricked up daintily and delicately, much adorned and let him out. And for his age he was in the bell of his height, more full, more strong and stately, as if the very prime and flour of his youth had been renewed, and himself call again in a new mould. The Numidian (as at their first meeting) almost astonish'd, gave him thanks for sending back his brothers unto him, saying, "That ever since that time, he bought to elip upon some occasion and in opportunity, which now at length by the goodness of the immortal gods being present upon him, he had not neglected and set a fip; promising that he was most desirous both to do him favour, and to gratifie the people of Rome in any kind of service so much as there was no one foremar more earnest & ready to advance and better the State of the Romans than himself: which if he had been willing unto heretofore, he could not possibly have in effect, so long as he was in Spain, strange country, and unknown unto him; but in that wherein he was born & brought up in hope of succession in his fathers kingdom, he would be most for- ward to perform. For, in case the Romans would send but Scipio as a general into Africa, he made no doubt but hoped affur'dly, that Cartagia had not long to continue and stand, but soon would come to an end: Scipio for his part was glad both to see him, and hear him to speak, knowing this well, that of all the cavalry of the enemies, Mafaufla and the Numidians went ever away with peace & prize & the young man himself in his very countenance carried with him a good the w of a brave and happy mind. So after a tryst'full promisse given and received on both parts, Scipio returned to Tarracon: and Mafaufla when he had by the permission of the Romans foraged the coasts next adjoyning, because he might not seem to have pass'd over into the main land for nothing, returned into Gades.

When Mago now being in utter despair of Spain (whereof he had conceived great hopes, and bare himself to proudly: first upon the mutiny of the foouldiers, and after wards upon the revolt & rebellion of Indibilis), mad preparation to fall over into Africa there came a message unto him from Cartagia, that they there had given order and direction, that he should transport the armado which he had at Gades, and pale into Italy: and there to take up and wage all the afo men that possibly he could levy, either of Gauls or of Liguurians, & so to join with his power unto Aemilia; and not to suffer that war to quail and flake now, which was enterpris'd with greatest force and endeavor, and yet, with greater favour of fortune. For this exploit, both treasurers was H brought from Carthage to Mago: and himself also raised as great sums as possibly he could of the Gaditans, having not only emplaced the common treasure of the land, but spoil'd also the temples, yes, and forced all privat persons to bring aboard all their gold and silver whatsoever. As he sail'd along the coast of Spain, he land'd his soldiers not far from new Carthage: and after he had walled and overrun the territories by the Sea side, he approach'd near with his fleet, and rig'd at anchor before the City: where all the day long he kept his soldiers within their ships, and by night let them ashore, and led them toward the part of the wall, where Carthage was by the Romans won: supposing that the City was not sufficiently defended with a strong gaurd, and that some of the townsmen, upon hope of a change and alteration, would rise up in arms and rebel. But there were come poets out of the country in all haste beforehand, who had brought news, as well as the foraging of the country & fearfull flight of the ruralic peasants, as of the coming of the enemies. Moreover the armado was defer'd also in the day time, & it was apparent, that they made not choice to anchor even just in the rode before the City, for nothing. And therefore the City soldiers good ready, well appointed, and in armes, and kept within that gate, which turned toward the lake and the sea. And when the enemies, souldiers and mariners confidually together, were come in great disorder under the walls, with more tumultuous noise then forcible violence: the Romans at once suddenly set open their gate, and with a great cri and shout, made a sally upon them, charged the enemies, troubled and disordered them, & at the first onet & volly of shot discomfited and put them to flight, yes, and with much slaughter chass'd them to the shore: and but that the vessels flood close to the strand, ready to receive them abroad as they fled to K fearfully, they had not been one left alive, either in the flight or flight. Nay, they that were in the very ships were in great fright & peril, whilst to prevent the enemies of breaking in upon them, they pull'd up the ladders, drew in the planks, cut two the ropes where by the ships were fasten'd to the banks, yes, and the very cables for hale, that they might have no hinderance by weighing anchors, so that many there were, who in swimming to the ships, because they knew not in the darke night, which way to go or what to avoid, perished miserably. The next day, when the armado was fled from thence back again into the Ocean from whence it came, they were found slain eight hundred men: and of armors and conflicts between the City wall and the sea shore, two thousand.

Mago being retir'd to Gades, was excluded from thence, and arriv'd with his fleet at Cinibus, L. a place not far from Gades. From whence he sent Embassadors, to complain that the gates were shut against him, being their ally and friend: and when the Gaditans excus'd themselves and said, that it was long of an uprore of the multitude, who were offended & aggrieved for certain robberies committed, and spoil made by the souldiers at their departure, and when they were ready to be embark'd, he train'd forth to parly their head magistrats (whom the Carthaginians call Suffetes) together with the chief Treasurer: and after they were scourc'd and their skin pittcously torn, he commanded them to be roundly taus'd and crucified. From thence he sail'd to Pitynys, an island distant from the main an hundred miles, inhabited at that time by Carthaginians, where the fleet was friendly and peaceably receiv'd; & not only prov'd for liberally of store of victuals, but also furnish'd with lully men, for mariners to serve at sea, yes, and with armor and munition for souldiers. Upon which forces Mago bare himselv confident and bold, and sett sail fell within the Balear lands, that were fifty miles off. Now there are two of these islands called Balears, the one greater then the other, and more mighty both in men and munition: having an haven and harbour where Mago suppos'd that he might commodiously winter in. But the Islands withflood his navy with as great bollivitie, as if they had been Romans that had inhabited the Island, they could not have done more. And as now adays they use for the most part flings, so at that time they praftic'd no other kind of weapons at all, and in no nation besides, can ye find one special person, so much to excel in that feat, as all the Balears generally do exceed and surpass others in the and flight thereof. And therefore they discharg'd and levelled among them, as the armado approach'd the shore, such flone offstones flying about their ears as thick as hail, that N they durst not enter the haven, but turn'd their ships into the main sea again. Then they put over to the lefther Land of the Balears, which as it was fertile in soil, so far men and armor it was nothing so strong. Whereupon they disembark'd and came land, and above the haven in a strong and well fenced place they encamp'd. And having gotten to be masters both of the City and territorio about it, without any force of armes and confliet, they levied and enrol'd there among them two thousand auxiliary souldiers, whom they sent to Carthage for to winter, and then they drew up their ships along into the dock. When Mago was once depart'd from the Ocean sea coast, the Gaditans surrend'rerd themselfs to the Romans.

These were the acts achiev'd in Spain, under the condud & fortunat government of P. Scipio, who having deliver'd the charge of the province to L. Lutonius, and M. Acilius, returned to Rome with a fleet of ten sail. He had audience given him in the Senat, and being in the temple of Bellona, without the City: where he discoursed before them in order from point to point, of all the affairs and exploits that he had done in Spain: Namely, how often he had fought in sea and ranged battles: what a number of towns he had forced and won from the enemies; how at first he...

he passed into Spain, against four general captains and four victorious armies: and now had not left one Carthaginian in all those parts. Yet for all these noble deeds, he rather allowed what hope he might have of a triumph, than made any hot & earnest plea therefore because it was never seen to that day, that any one had triumphed who made war, being himself no principal Magistrate. After the Senate was roused and dismissed he entered the City; and called to be entered before him into the Chamber of Rome, of silver in bullion, 1,342 pounds weight; and in coin besides, a great quantity. Then L. Vettius Planc held the solemn assembly for creation of CoH, and all the Centuries in general, with exceeding favour and affection elected P. Scipio CoH, and for to be his companion in government, P. Licinius Crassus, the Archbishop was joined into him. But this assembly (as we find in records) was celebrated with more frequency of people, than ever any had been known during this war. For they repaired and met from all parts, not only to receive their voices, but also to see Scipio: nay they ran in great numbers to his house, and into the Capitoll, when he sacrificed and slew an hundred oxen in sacrifice for the honour of Jupiter, according to his vow which he had made in Spain. And all mens minds gave them, and they were allured and persuaded in their hearts, that as L. Licinius finished the former Punick war, so P. Cornelius would make an end of that which was now in hand: and like as he had driven all the Carthaginians forth of Spain, so would Scipio drive them out of Italy: and many in his own conceit wished and attinog to him the Province of Africa, as if the war in Italy had been fully brought to an end. Then entered the election of the Pratores. And two were created that were then Alone of the Commons, to wit, Sp. Lucretius and Co. Ollivius: and of private persons, Co. Servilius Scipio, and L. Annius Pappus.

In the fourteenth year of the Punick war, P. Cornelius Scipio, and P. Licinius Crassus entered their Conniphillid. And unto the Conills were the Provinces appointed: namely unto Scipio was Sicily granted without paying lots, and that with the content and good liking of his Colleagues, because he being the Archbishop, was by virtue of that dignity kept still in Italy, for to see the sacrifices divin service, and Church matters: and unto Crassus the country of Regia was assigned. Then the provincies for the Pratores were put to the lottery and the civil jurisdiction within Rome fell to Co. Servilius Ariminum (to so they called Galba) unto Sp. Lucretius Sicily was allotted to L. Annius, and Lardianus to Co. Ollivius.

The Senat assembled in the Capitol, where Publius Scipio propounded in A.B., and it was confirmed by the authority of the house. That out of the money which himself brought into the common treasure he might be allowed to defray the charges of those places and games that he had vowed in S.p.m. during the time of the Souldiers mutiny. Then he called the Embassadors of the Saguntins into the Senate house: and the most ancient men amongst them spoke in this wise:—

Although right honourable, it be not possible to find anymore miferies & calamities than we have endured already in the maintenance of our faithfull allegiance unto you even unto the end, yet such have your deferts been to us ward. & so many favours have we received of your Captains Generalls, that we think not much nor rens of any damage or los, that we have sustained in that behalf. For first ye entered into the quarrell, & began the war for our sake: and having once begun it, ye have continued therein for the full space of 14 years; and that with such resolution that oftimes, as ye have plunden your selves into extrem peril & danger, so we have engaged no les the State of the Carthaginians, for at what time as ye had within Italy a cruel and bloody war: & Ambush your mortal enuy, ye sent forth your Coh with armies into S.p.m., as it were to gather up the broken reliques of our shipwrick. Pub. and Co. Corellii the two brethren from the first time that they came into the Proings, never ceased to deuide & do whatsoever might either advantage us, or endanger our enemies. For first and foremost they restored unto us our town again: then having made enquity throughout all S.p.m. where any one of our Citizens were sold as slaves, they delivered and redeemed them out of miserable furnitute, and recovered for them their former freedom. But lest when we were well-near come to this good pace, that from our poor & pitiful estate we were raised up to a wifed for and desirable fortune, then Pub. and Co. Corellii your Generals suddenly died: whose death hapned in manner more fameable and dolorous unto us than unto you. For then we thought verily thus of our selves, that we were reduced from remote & distant places unto our ancient habitation for this purpose, that we should perish once again and see a second overthrow and destrution of our native country; knowing thus much, that for to work our utter destruction there needed not a Carthaginian captain or army to be the instrument and the mens; for even the Tuderets alone, our most ancient enemies who were the cause of all our former ruin and undoing, were able with their own forces to root us out and extingush our name: But behold whiles we were in these perplexities immediately beyond all our hope and expectation, ye sent amongst a noble Scipio here in place, in whose behalf we count our selves of all Saguntins most happy because we have seen him declared CoH, already, and shall be able to report the news unto our nearest neighbours.

and fellow Citizens that we have beheld with our own eyes, even our whole hope, our help, our health and safety. Who having forced & won very many Cities and towns of our enemies in Spain at all times and in all places let the Saguntins apart from our of other Prisoners & captives, and sent them home again into their own country. Finally, as for Tuderets a nation to advertise and to danger us enemies unto us, that it should continue still in prosperity, Saguntins could not possibly stand upright: he hath by force of arms so quelled and tamed it, that neither we our selves nor (be it spoken without arrogance) any of our posterity hereafter need stand in fear.
feare any danger from hence, we see before our eyes their City raised, at whole inflation & whou for to gratifie Ambassadors before had raised Saguntum and out of their lands now, we gather rents and revenues which concerneth our hearts, not so much for profit & gain, as for quittance and revenge. In consideration and regard of these benefits and good turns, which be such, as greater we cannot hope nor with for at the hands of the immortal gods; the Senate and people of Saguntum hath lent us ten here in Embassie unto you, for to give unto thanks in their name and with all to rejoice and congratulate in your behalf the happy hand ye have made, and the fortunate exploits ye have achieved these last years past, as well in Spain in Italy, namely, that ye have subdued, and do hold in possession all Spain, not only so far as to the river Tormus, but even to the lands end, and the utmost point lying upon the Ocean sea. And as for Italy, ye have left no more ground in it for Ambassadors, and the Carthaginians, than they emplace within the compass of trench and rampier. Moreover we have in especial charge not only to render thanksgiving here-fore to almightie and most gracious Jupiter, the patron of the fortres and Cuffy of the Capitol, but also to offer & present unto him, if it might stand with your good grace and liking, this golden crown; and so set it up in the Capitol, in token and memorial of Victory, Which we humbly beseech your HI., of your favour to grant unto us; and moreover, if it please you, to ratifie and confirm for ever by your authority and approbation all these benefits, franchises, and privileges, which your Generals have of their good voucheas to endow us with.

The Senate made this answer to the Saguntin Embassadors, 'That both the rating and also the rearing again of Saguntum should be a memorable example to all nations, of the faithful society and alliance, observed both of the one part and the other inviolate, And whereas their Generals had re-edified the City of Saguntum, & delivered the Citizens thereof from servitude and bondage, they had therein done well and truly, and by direction, according to the will and pleasure of the Senate. And whatsoever else was performed by them to the good and benefit of the Saguntins, the Senate good willing and contained therewith, and gave order therefore. As for their present and obligation, good leave they had to bellow it solemnly in the Temple of the Capitol. After this order was given, That the Embassadors should have their lodging appointed them, and presents lent unto them, and all other entertainment at the charges of the City, ye, and by way of a reward, an allowance of no less than ten thousand Alies spece.

Then were the other Embassadors admitted into the Senate-house, and audience given them. Alto the request of the Saguntins was granted to go and see Italy for their pleasure, so far forth as they might with security of their persons: and certain guides were assigned to conduct and accompany them, with especial letters also directed unto all Cities and towns, for to receive the Spaniards friendly and give them courteous entertainment.

These things done, the Senators sat in consultation about the late and commonwealth, & treated concerning the levy of new armies, & the distribution of the Provinces. Now when as the common brute went that P. Scipio was defined & named to a new province of Affrick, & all mengave out with open voice, that he was the man to be sent thither directly, without calling lots for the matter; and himself besides not reeling content now with mean glory, said openly, that he was declared Consul not only for to maintain war but also to finish and make an end thereof once for all, which could not be effected by any other means, unless himself in person made a voyage with an Army into Affricke, & to pollut the manner, that the Senate crostled and gainfaid this design of his he would proposu it to the people, and carry it away clear by their voices: whereas the principal I.L. and ancients of the Senate were nothing pleased with this resolution of his, but durst not say a word and speak their minds, either for fear, or for courting of him in hope of preferment; only Q. Fabius being demanded his opinion, speak to the matter in question to this effect,

'Right honourable, and my I.L. of the Senate, I know ful well, that many of you here assembled are of this mind severly perwillad, That we are set for this day to no purpose, but even to contile & debate of a matter clearly determined; & that in vain he shall spend words, who shall deliver his advice of the Province of Affricke, as of a point as yet doubtfull & not resolved upon already.

For mine own part, I am not willing nor say not will it enter into my head, how Affricke can no possibly now be accounted as a Province & assigned certainly unto your Consul, let him be a man right hardy, & of as much valour as may be considering that neither the Senate unto this day hath judged it the people ordained & assigned it to any person in the nature and name of a Province. Furthermore, if it were indeed without all precedent then in my judgement the Consul, hath done amiss, who in making remembrance to put a matter for to be debated, which is already agreed upon, hath defiled and mocked the whole Senate and not the Senator, who in his course delivered his opinion of the thing in question. But I am satisfied that in gaining and crosting this halfe voyage into Affricke, I shall in all the lesser opinion & opinion two things: the one of my usual lingour and flowing in all my words (a course that naturally I am given unto) which young men may term at their pleasure, timourness and tinnness; but to long as I have no cause to repent thereof, I pass the Les. For mine hither to the aduices of others have ever at the first sight made a goodlier show, and seemed more honourable: but by experience mine own wats have laped better, and been found in the end more effectual. The other is, of blacking detection and envying at the glory and reputation of the Consul: a man of singular prowess (I must confess) to whom I see to grow from day to day in greatness and honour, From which jealousy and fulpiation, if neither my life passed and the carriage of my left; if notthetmy

A Dictatorship with five Consulships, nor so much glory which I have acquired as well in managing the affairs of war abroad, as of civil policy at home (that a man would think I should rather be girded therewith than despire any more) be able to clear and afford me; yet my years at sea and civil may serve me very well. For what concurrence and emulation can there be between me and him, who is not of equal age with my very sex? When I was Dictator, in the vigour and flower of my strength, in the very course and train of my greatness and brass exploit, no man either in Senate or in the assembly of the people, heard me to refine and deny, That my own General of Cavalry, who could not afford me a good word, but ever railed at me; (a thing that was never heard before) should be made equal with my self in command and government. And yet by good deeds, rather than by fair words, I effected and gained much in the end, that he, who in the judgment of others was matched with me and made myellow, contented within a while himself to be my inferior. Let reason have I then now, after I have gone through all degrees of honors and dignities, to enter into contention & emulation with a young gentleman, of all others at this day most flourishing in the eyes of the world: unless forsooth it be a likely matter that (a man weary not only of managing affairs, but also of this world, and of this life,) should look to have the Province of Afric offered unto me; it was once denied him, Nay verily, I have enough already; as in this glory I am content to live and die, and seek for no more. It was sufficient for me to hinder Annibals from achieving the victory; to the end that by you, who now are gallants in the beat of your strength, he might be vanquished & overcome. Meet it C is then and great reason O P. Cornelius, that you should bear with me and hold me excused, if I, who never in regard of mine own fell yet greater store by the fame and opinion of people, than of the good of the Common-wealth prefer not now your glory before the weal-publick. And yet I will not say, but in case there were no war at all in Italy or the enemy of that quality as by conquering of whom there were no credit & honour to be gotten; then he that would seek to keep you still in Italy, were it never so much for the good of the State might seem to go about to dispirit and frustrate you; (in putting you by the charge of the war,) the very means and matter of your glory and renown. But seeing that Annibal is your object, seeing he is our enemy, who with an entire army holdeth Italy as it were besieged now these fourteen years; will you not O P. Cornelius, hold your self well contented with this honour and reputation. That you being D Conutl, should drive that enemy out of Italy, who hath been the cause of the death of so many brave men of ours, and of so many foils and overthrowes that we have received; that, like as C, Lucullus had the name of finishing the former Puntik war, so you may win the title of ending this other also, Unless that a man would say that Annibal was a warrior and Captain worthy to be preferred before Annibal; or that war of more importance than this or that victory greater and more honorable than this is like to be, in case it happen that we may be conquerers under your away from Drepantum & the mountain of Erus, than chafed and hunted the Carthaginians and Annibal out of Italy? Nay surely even your own self; (howsoever you embrace glory already won than hoped for hereafter) would not take more joy & contentment, and triumph rath Eer for freeing and delivering of Spian than Italy from the wars. Annibal, I twost, as yet is not come to that low ebb not to down the wind, but that he which made choice of another war, may seem well in to doing to fland as much in clear and dread, as in conceit of him, Why then addresst thou not your self to effect this impress, and leave building these Castles in the air, and hope by leaching these reaches and this compacts, & going the longest way about that when they are pass'd over into Africk, Annibal will follow thee thither; and not rather go the next way to work, and fight with Annibal where he is, and make no more ado? Are you willing indeed and defirous to win this honour of dispatching quite the Puntik war? Why, it is the course of nature to defend and make sure your own before you go in hand to allain the dominions of others. Let us have peace first in Italy before we make war in Africk: and let us first rid our selves of fear ever we take occasion to put others in fear; unless we had some greater quarrell, And F if by your conduct and fortunate government, both these may possibly be effected: conquer Annibal here, and then go thither to affall Carthage a God Name, But if the one or the other of these victories must needs be left for new Consuls to achieve: as the former of the twain will be the greater and more memorable, so it will open the way, and give the overture into the other entering upon it. For at this time, over and besides that our treasure, and all the revenues and finances of our state, are not able to maintain and wage two bundry armies both in Italy and in Africk. befoebes. I say: that we want the means to keep two Armados aloft, and have nothing left sufficient wherewith to furnish them with victuals and munition: who teetht not I pray you, how far we engage our selves in peril and danger by this enterprise? P. Licinius shall war in Italy and P. Scipio in Africk. What will ye say if Annibal (which God forbid) & my heart even dreadeth to preface, but that which once hath happned may happen well again, upon the train G of some new victory, fortune to go forward and affall the City of Rom? Where are we then? Shall we have time then to lend for you our Co, out of Africk, as we did for Q. Fulvius, from Campania? And what say you to this befoeies: That the fortune of war is doubltfull & uncertain even in Africk; as well as in other places: Call to mind, and learn bestrites by the examples of your own house and family, by your father and uncle; who within so dates were slain, & their armies defeated even there, where for certain years space they had performed both by sea and land most noble exploits: and highly renowned among foreign nations both the Roman people, and also your own name & family. The time will not serve, if I would do all this day do nothing else but reckon and recount unto you, how many Kings, Emperors & General Captains there have been, who have entered rashly into their enemies countries, and received many joys and overthroweth thereby, as well in their own persons, as in their whole armies. The Athenians, a most prudent & politic State, having left the war at home in their own country, and following the counsel and suggestion of one young man, as hardy & valiant in arms, as noble in birth & parentage as your self (none displeased) sailed into Sicily with a brave and puissant navy; and there in one battell fought at sea, overthrown and ruinad for ever their most flourishing City & Common-wealth.

But as for those examples of Strangers, and stories of times too far past, and over-long ago,

Let even this same Affrick, and M. Attilius serve as a notable example of both fortunes, for our instruction & learning for ever. Now surely, P. Cornel, when you shall once discover Affrick with all your view from the sea, you will think then that your Provinces of Spain were matters of sport in comparison of it. For what semblable proportion is there between them? When you were in your voyage for Spain, you failed in the calm sea peaceably along the coast of Italy and France, and arrived at Emporia friend City and Confederate: and when you had landed your men, you led them in security through all places to the friends and allies of the people of Rome, even as far Tarracon. From thence ye journeyed all the waies by Cities and towns, furnish'd with Roman garrisons. About the river Iberum you found the armies of your father and uncle, which remained upon the lots of their Generals more fierce and fell for the calamity that they had received than before. You meeter there L. Marcius their Captain and Leader, chosen (I must needs say,) I know not how in a hury by the fouldiers themselves for the time but otherwise I assure you, if not their ability of birth and the titles of dignities which he justly deserved had grace him, he was in all feats of arms and martial knowledge, comparable to the very best warriors & noblest Captains.

After this you assaulted Caffaghe without any empeachment, and took your time at your own pleasure, even when there was not one of the three Carthaginian armies to aid & defend their affects. As for all the exploits besides (without offence be it spoken & not to debate any good service there) they are in no respect to be compare with the African war: where we shall find no haven open to entertain our Armado, no Country peaceable, no City confederate, no King friendly, no place at all either to sojourn and rest in, or to march forward and pass through with safety. Which way even you call your eyes nothing but hotly threatening danger and peril.

Do you indeed trust Syphax, or rely upon the Numidians? Well, let it suffice that once ye trall'd them, Rath adventures speed not always best. And oftentimes we see that fraud deceitful and makest way of credit in small things, that in matters of greatest importance, and when the time wereth it may pay home and work a mischief with a witnesse. The enemies overcame not your father and uncle by force of arms before that the Celtibrians our Allies over-ruaht them by falhhood and treachery: neither were your self in so much danger from Mago and Adraubal the chief Captains of your enemies, as from Indibilis and Montonius, your new friends and confederates. Can you repose any confidence in the Numidians? You say that you have experience of their own fouldiers mutiny, and have seen them rise against you: As for Syphax and Massis, as they had rather themselves be the sovereign & most mighty in Affrick, than the Carthaginians should: I say truly they with the Carthaginians to be the highest above all others besides their own selves. Now at this time there is some emulation and heat-burning among them, and all occasions of quarrell when them on to maintain sides and factions, so long as fear of foreign enemy is far enough off. Show them once the Roman forces and forces, let them see an host of strangers once, they will not warrant you altogether then, as it were to quench a common fire. You shall find that the very same Carthaginians will far otherwise stand to the defence of the walls of their Country, their Cities, the Temples of their gods, their Altars and private houses when going to battell they shall have their fearfull wives to bear them company, their small children to go along them in their eye: you shall find them. I say, stick better to it than they did in the quarrell, and defence of Spaine. But what and if the Carthaginians finding themselves strong enough upon the confidence of the generall concord of Affrick, of the fall fidelity of the confederate Kings, of the strength of their owne walls, should intromit themselves, when they shall see Italy deliuerte of your help, and disstruished of their forces, either to make out a fresh army from Affrick and send it into Italy, or else give order and direct it to Mago (who as it is well known for certain, is departed with his navy from the Baleare Islands, and lyeth floating and riding continually upon the Alpine Ligurians,) to join his power with Annibals. It is a clear case, that we shall be in as great trouble, and as much affrighted then as we were of late, when Adraubal mounted over the Alpes, and came down into Italy. Adraubal, I say, whom you (that will with your army compas not only Carthage, but also all Affrick) let go out of your hands, and suffered to pass over into Italy. But you will say, that you have vanquished him, Say you so? I would not for any thing, not only in regard of the love I beare to the Common-wealth, but also of the affection that I carry toward your selfe, that a vanquished man could find the way by you into Italy. Be content & suffer us to attribute all things that have gone well with you or the Common-wealth, during the time of your government, to your wisdom and policy; and contrariwise, whatsoever hath fallen out crost and adverse, to impute and ascribe the fame to nothing else, but to the variable events of war, and to fickle fortune. The under their hands & decreed it was that they two, namely, I. Veturius & Q. Caecilius, should either the better & more valiant that you should have more hath your native country, yes, and all; Italy besides to keep you till at home with them, for brave a captain. o rare a Protector. You amost your own self dissimile the matter, but confide, That wherefover Amphilis, there is the very head, the fort & strength of all this war; forasmuch as you pretend, that the only cause we should / would pass into Africa, is to draw Amphilis thither after you. Well then, be it here or be it there, with Amphilis you must have to deal. Tell me then, whether are you like to be stronger Africa? your fel thee alone, or here where your own forces and the power of your Colleague shall be joined together? Is it possible that even the late example of Livius and Claudius, so treath in memory, should not inform & teach you, that the difference there is, is between your dignities and your fathers. He, as Condi having made a journey into Spain, to the end that he might encounter Amphilis as he came down the Alps, return-ed even of his own province into Italy; and you, when Amphilis, is in Italy, purpose to abandon and leave Italy. And why? for loth not because you judge it good for the common-weal, but because you think it an enterprise that may import you in great honour and glory: like as when you being captain General of the people of Rome, left your province at random and your army at fix and leaven, without warrant of law, without order or act of Senate, hazarded in two bothons the whole fate and safety of the Empire of Rome; which at that time together with the danger of your life, incurred the peril and jeopardy of the main chance. To conclude, for mine own part (my L. of the Senate,) am of this mind, and this is my conceit, that P. Cornelius was not created, created Col. for himself and his own benefit, but for the good of the commonwealth and all; and then the armies were levied and enrolled, for the guard of the City and de-defence of Italy; and not for the C. O G in their proud self-conceit & overweening of themselves.
D. after the manner of absolute KK to transport & lead into what parts of the world they left them-E. selves, When Furius by this oration (premeditated and framed to the time) had through his authority and the long settled and confirmed opinion that men had of his wisdome, drawn unto his side good part of the Senate and especially the ancient, in which of the greater number commended and the grave counsell of the old man, above the silly and youthfull courage of the other gallant: then Scipio by way of answer made these tenorances, and spake in this wise. My loves of the Senate, even Furius himself, in the beginning of his oration, said very well, that his opinion which he was to deliver, might be supposed of destruction and envy, Of which mine, verily I disnot my self tax and accuse man of his abilities and reputation to much; as methinks is not so well clear-ed as is supposed to be the very falsification it tell: and yet not whether it be a default of his speech, scorning or that the thing it self is so pregnant. For in such manner he exed with goodly words, and magnified his own dignities and renowned deeds, and all to quench the jealous and course of envy; so if my tell was to fear the danger of emulation and concurrence of some companion of the baiest degree and condition and not of him, who because he far surpasseth other men (which height and pitch of honor I deny not, but I endow your self to reach unto) would not in any hand, that I should compare with him. So highly hath he advanced himself in regard of his old years in indiciting that he hath gone through all ranks and honours; and so low debating me, and put me down even under the age of his own lion; as though the deere and love of glory, should Ashe no farther then the length of man's life, and the greatest part there of extended not to the memory of posterity and the future time. This I hold for certain, that it is a thing incident to the most magnificent men and of greatest spirit and courage, to have a desire for to match themselves not only with them that live in their dates, but with most famous & excellent persons, that ever were or might be in any age. And hardly for mine own part, Q. Furius, I will not make it good, but frankly beway my mind that way, namely, that I would full tain not only all your praiseworthy acts and commendable virtues; but also (with your good leave to be spoken) if possible I can, even to excell and amount the same. Therefor let us not curry this mind, either you towards me, or I to those that are younger then my self, to be unwilling and think much, that any one even among us, should prove equall to our selves: for in doing we, we should offer wrong and doing not only to them whom we have envied and misnamed, but also prejudice the common weal, & in manner the whole state of all mankind. And thus much G. to yourself. He hath now (my lords) recounted, to what great perils I should enter into by the Africa voyage in such sort, as he would feem notonly to have a careful regard of the commonwealth and the army, but also to pity me and tender my case and fortune, Whence cometh it,thay you should all on a sudden take for care for me? when my father and uncle both were slain, when their armies both twain, were utterly almost defeated and put all to the ford; when Spain was left; when 4 armies of Carthaginians, and 4 Generals, held all in fear by force of armes; when there was a captain sought for to undertake that war, and no man dast be leen to yea and with wildome and counsell to frame them to his own purpose and designs. True it is, O Fabius, I shall have Annibal to bear and to match me; a foulard, I confesse, as good every way as my self, but I will rather draw him after me, than he shall keep me back home. Force him I will to fight in his own country, and Carthage shall be the price of my vidory, rather then the decayed pieces, and half miunt perty castles of the Bruntis. Only provide, O Q. Fabius, that in the mean time whilrne I am at sea in my voyage, whiles I amlanding mine army in Aftrick, WHILES I APPROACH Carthage with a running camp, the Common-wealth take of harm and damage here at home. See to this, I say, and be well advised, that it be not a shame full troopre to lay, that P. Licinius the Consul, a man of singular valour (who because he is the high Priest, and by vertue thereof not to abend himself from the solemn celebration of sacrifices and divine service, was content and willing, that the charge of so distant a province should not befall unto him by calling lots) is not able to perform that, now when Anmibals head defeated, and his heart almost broken, which your selfe was insufficient to effect when Annibals squar-et in, and braved all Italy like a conqueror. But let the cafe, and suppose I say, that by this course which I mean to take, the war be never the sooner brought to an end (yet fairely it were for the honour of the people of Rome, and for the reputation and name which they have among foreign princes and States abroad, that they may see and know, that our hearts serve us not only Italy, but alfo to offend Aftrick. And that it might neither be thought, and believe not spoken and noised abroad in the world, no Roman captain durft adventure that which Annibals head already dared and done: and when as in the former Punke war, when the quarter was for Sicily, our armes and armados to often afflicted Aftrick, now that Italy is in question Aftrick should lie still, and be at rest. Nay, rather let I my be at repose and quiet now at lait, affo long travel and affliction and let Aftrick in her turn be fired and foraged another while. Let the Roman camp be pitched rather under the verry walls and gates of Carthage, then we see once again from our walls the trench and rampier of our enemies, to invest our Ci-try. Let Aftrick be the bet place and feat of the war, let fright and flight, foraging and harrying of countries, revolt and rebellion of allies, and all other inconveniences and enormities that follow war, which have lien heavy upon us these 14 years, turn from us thisther. It shall content and suffice me to have spoken as touching State matters & the commonwealth of the war presente ly in hand; and concerning the provinces and their government now in question and confu-ration. For it would require a long and tedious discursoe and the same impertinence altogether unuseable to you, as if Q. Fabius hath defaced and depraved mine acts in Spain, so likewise should I difgrace him and diminish his glory, and let out my selfe and mine own reputation with goodly and magnificall words. But my LL. I will do neither one nor the other. And if in nothing else, yet at lafte, young man as I am, I will in modelly and government of my towne goe beyond him as old and anciem a personage as he is. Thus have I lived, and thus have I carried my self in all mine actions, that without blasting of mine own prafises, I can foone content my self with that good opinion which you of your selves have conceived and entertained of me.

Seipio had audience given him, with leffe indifferencie, and patience because it was commonly voiced abroad. That if the Senate would not grant him to have the province and emprcme of Af-trick, he would immediately proceed and put it to question before the people. Whereupon Q.
E. Fabius, a man that had beene four times Consul and Censor besides. required the Consul to speak his mind openly a before the Senate, whether he would refer unto the I.L. there assembled, to determine of the provinces, and hold to that which they should let down or prefer the thing unto the people. When Seipio had made answer again and said, That he would do that which might be good and expedient for the service of the Common-wealth; then Fabius replied upon him and said: I demand not this question of you, as ignorant what other you would answer or what you meant to do. For I know full well, that ye pretend no less your self, that you do but found the Senate, and feel rather how they had enclined, then to lend to any advice of theirs in good faith. And in cafe we do not presently grant you the province according unto your desire you have a bill framed already to present unto the body of the people and Commonalty.
And therefore (as he) my masters, ye that are Tribunes, I require your aid and assistance, in that I forbear to speake unto the point and deliver mine opinion: in this regard, because I know that the Col. will not approve and ratifie the fame, howsoever the whole house will so wish me, and allow my sentence. Whereupon arose some brall & debate among them whiles the Col. urged and enforced this point especially, and said, It was against all reacon and equity: that the Tribunes should emprcme their authorith, and not permit every Senator being requested to speake in his turn, for to deliver his mind and opinion. Then the Tribunes made a decree in this matter, if the Col. be content that the Senate shall determine of the Provinces, we will and command that all men reft in that which the Senate that ordain and judge; neither will we suffer the time to be proponuted unto the people: if he be not content nor yeeld thereto, then we will affl him who shall refuse to speake to the matter. Then the Col. requested a dates repair to confer with his Colleague, and to the morrow after he condescended to put all to the cenfure of the Senate. And in this wife were the provinces distributed and appointed: unto one of the Col. Sicily was assigned, and thirty ships of war, with brazen beak heads (even the fame that C. Servilius the year before had the charge of) with commision also to passe over in Aftrick: if the thought it were to the good of the Common-wealth. The other Consil had the government of the Bruntis and the managing of the war against Anmibal, with the power of that army which L. Peturinus and Q. Catilius had cast
...agree between themselves who should remain still in the Britains country to follow the war there, with those two legions which the Conful left: and that whether of them chance to have that province, his government should be protracted and continued for another year. The rest of the Pretors also and Confuls, who were to govern any province, or have the conduct of armies had their commission renewed and sealed again for a longer term. Now it fell to Q. Cæcilius his lot, to make war together with the Conful against Ambivol in the Britains country.

After this, entred the games and pales of Scipio: which were exhibited and fectfulth, with great concourse of people, and exceeding applause and affectionation in all out of the beholders. M. Pompeius Marchus, and Q. Cænhus were sent as Embassadors unto D. Libeth, to carry thither an offring and lare gift of the booty and pillage of Afric. who pretended there a crown of gold weighing two hundred pound: also certain carriages resembing the ipole, which were made of silver, amounting to a thousand pound weight. Scipio when he could not get leave granted to levy fouldiers and take mutters which he greatly forcd not of, obtained thus much yet, that he might have with him in his tr. in voluntary fouldiers: as also receive whatever the Allies would contribute and give towards the building of new ships, he anfe he had passd his word, that the City should not be charged with setting out an armado. And first and foremost, the States of Histaria promised to help the Conful, every one according to their ability. The Carrites came off, and granted to survey corn and all kinds of virtu for the mariners and fallers. the Populonians to provide iron for the Tarquinians to find fall cloths, the Volategorans to send all taulkings and furniture belonging to ships, and all corn. the Arcites to confer 30000 targets, as many morions or head pieces besides jellaints dark plainions, and plies, to the full number of fifty thousand, as many of the one fto of the other. also axes, spades and maccotcks, bilis, fithes, and books, and ficles, meal, troughs and quern mill, as many as would serve to furnish forty long ships or galleys: of which 15000 Modii, and all voyage provision for the Centurions, pety captains, Mariners and One-men by the way. The Periones, the Cimans, the Ruttelians offered itrees for the framming and making of ships, and a great quantity of corn. But for this work, he occupied only the fir hewn out of the publick forest and waits. All the States of Umbria, the Nortines also, the Reatines, Amiterines and the whole country of the Sabines, made promise to help him to fouldiers: the Maris, the pelligni, and Marticines, in great number came of their own free wills, and were enrolled to serve at sea in the navy, The Century, being allies and confederat to the Romains, but not tied to any service, sent a brave company of six hundred men well armed. And when as there wefer out the keels or bottoms of thirty ships, twenty Caravels of five course of oars, and ten oarions, himself in person pilid the carpenters and shipwrights to, and led forward the work that 45 days after the timber was brought out of the wood, the ships were finisled, riged and furnished with all things, and shot into the water. So Study he failed with thirty long ships of war having embarked therein about seven thousand of voluntary servitors. P. Licinius also for his part, came into the Britains country unto the two confederate armies, of which he took unto him and chose that which L. Veturius the Conful had commanded, and suffered Meletius to have the leading fill of those legions, which had been under his conduct before supposing that he should more easily employ them in service because they were acquainted already with his manner of regiment and government. The Pretors likewise went into their landy provinces. And because money was wanting forth to defray the charges of the war, the high Treasurers were commanded to make sale of all that treas of the Campane country, which from the Greek Fosse extendth towards the sea, and there was granted a comission to give notice of those lands: and look what ground forever belonged to any citizen of Capua, it was confiscat to the uc of the people of Rome: and for a reward to him that gave notice, there was aliged the tenth part of the mony, that the land was rated and prized at, Allo C. Servius the City Pretor, had given him in charge to take order that the Campines should dwell where as they were allowed to inhabit by virtue of a decree gramed by the Senat, and to punish those that dwelt elsewhere.

In the same summer Mago the son of Amilcar, being departed from the lefte Bilaser Islands, where he abode the winter feation, and embarked a choen power of young and inly men, sailed over into Italy with a fleet of thirty ships headed with brazen piked beaks, and many hulks of burden: and there he landed his fouldiers, to the number of twelve thousand footmen, and,万个 two thousand horse: and with his fuddon coming surprizd Genua by reason that there lay no garrisons in those parts to guard and defend the sea coasts, From thence he failed along and arrived in the river of the Alpine Ligurians, to see if he could by his coming raise some conception and rebellion. The Inguaui (a people of the Ligurians) fortuned to war at that presente with certain mountanaers the Etruscan. Whereupon Mago having laid np at and bestowed fowe of the prizes and pillage that when he won in Senou a town upon the Alps: and left ten ships all war riding in the river for a sufficient guard, and sent away the reft to Carthage for to keep the coasts at home (because there ran a mighty rumor, that Scipio would pass the seas, and over into Africa) himself after he had concluded a league and amity with the Ingauni (who whole favour he more affected and efteemed then the other) set in hand to affail the mountanaers. Besides, his power increated daily: for that the Frenchmen flockd unto him in all parts, upon noise and voyce of his name. Intelligence hereof was given to the Senat by the letters of Sp. Locutius: who were with their news exceedingly troubled and perplexed, for fear left they had rejoiced in vain...

A want for the death of Africulb, and the defeat of his army two years before; in case there should arise from thence another war as great and dangerous as the other, differing in nothing else but the exchange of the General. And therefore they gave order and direction both to M. Livius the Pro-Consul, to come forward with his army of Volunteers out of Tusculum into Anaronium: and also unto Cn. Servilius the City Prætor, (if the thought requisite and expedient for the Common-wealth) to commit the two legions of Citizens attending about Rome, to whomsoever he pleased, for to be commanded and led forth of the City. So M. Livius Latiunus conducted those legions to Anaronium.

About the same time, certain hulks of the Carthaginians, to the number of fourteen, were boarded and taken about Sardinia by Cn. Oebonius, governor of that province. Cædus wrote, that they were loaded with corn and victuals sent unto Annibal. But Valerius reporteth, that as they were carrying the pillage taken in Misenus and certain prisoners of the Ligurian mountaineers, into Carthage, they were intercepted and surprized by the way. There was no memorable thing that year done in the Britanni country, the petitions reigned as well amongst the Romans as the Carthaginians and they died thereof alike on both sides. Mary the Carthaginian army, besides the plague, were afflicted also with famine. Annibul passed all that summer time near unto the Temple of Juno Lucins, where he built and erected an altar, and dedicated it with a glorious title of his worthy act, engraven in Latin and Greek letters.

The nine and twentieth Book

Caius Lulius bequeathing some part to Scipio out of Sicily into Africulb brought from there a huge booty; and declared unto Scipio the credence and message that he had from Maainafa, who complained of him that he had not yet as painted over with his fleet into Africulb. The war in Spain, in which Indibilis had raised and dispatched himself vain in the field; and Mandonius was delivered by his own men into the Roman bands that demanded him of them. Mago, who was in France and Liguria, out of Africulb sent unto him both a great power of soldiers, and also money to wage aids with a commission and precept to join himself unto Annibal. Scipio crossed the sea from Syracuse into the Bruttii, and recovered the City Locri, after he had discomfited the garrison there, and put to flight Annibal. Peace was concluded with Philip. The goddesse Dame Ieda was brought solemnly to Rome from Pellenus, by occasion of a prophecy found in the books of Sybylla to this effect: That then the Roman army might be driven out of Italy, when Dame Cybele of Ida was brought to Rome. And to the Romans, the Latins delivered by Attalus King of Asia. A thick stone it was, and nothing elsewhorth the Inhabitants called the mother of the god, P. Scipio Naïcias, the son of that Crescent who was killed in Spain, judged by the Senate a right good man, one that was very young, and had not been yet so much as Queen, was he that received her: for it was by the Oracle importuned, that the said godesse should be received by the best vises of the City, and so dedicated. The Romans sent their Embassadors to Rome, to complain of the outrage and cruelty of Q. Plemius the Egerian in that he had unjustly laid upon the money confiscated to Procterus, and unlawfully forced their wives and children, Plemius was brought bound with chains to Rome, and there did in prison. There ran a false rumour of Pub. Scipio (Pro-Consell in Sicily) and spread at far as to the City, that he should send his time there in vain. Whereupon there were sent certain messengers from the Senate to inquire and see whether those reports were true. And Scipio, being cleared from all the amity, by the permission and good leave of the Senate, sailed over into Africulb, Syphax afforded and wedded the daughter of Adrulb the son of Cfigio: and hereupon reconciled the amity which he had contraried with Scipio, Maainafa the King of the Maflowians, whereas he served in the wars in defence of the Carthaginians quelled within Spain, after he had left his father Gala, was without dispose of his kingdom. And when he had desisted from recovery it again by war, he was in certain battles vanquished by Syphax King of the Numidians, and utterly deprived of his royal dignity. So with many hundred horsemen he joyed, as a beneficent person with Scipio, and with him, immediately in the first battle, he flew Hanno the son of Amilag, together with a great number of men, Scipio upon the coming of Adrulb and Syphax, who were almost 100,000; Rome was compelled to break up the siege at Utica: and so he fortified a standing camp for winter harbour. Sciponomy the Consul had a fortunate start against Anniulb in the territory of Croton. The Confoins held a solemn reunion and joining of the City, and numbered the people: in which journey there were affifted in their books 21,000 Citizens. Between the two Confoins M. Livius and Claudius Nero, there fell out a notable discord: for C. Claudius took from Livius (company with him in office) his horse of service: for that he had been sometimes confederate by the people of Rome, and driven into exile. And Livius again did the like by him, because he had borne false witness against him, and not dealt bona fide with him, considering the reconciliation between them, neither Scipio after he was arrived in Sicily, disposed his voluntary soldiers in order, and enrolled them by Centuries. Over and besides them he had about him three hundred lusty tall fellows; for the flower of their age and strength of body, the bravest men of all others; but they will not themselves for what purpose they were reserved: being neither affigned to any cocklours under a Captain, nor so much as armed at all. Then he made choice from out of the whole manhood and youth of Sicily three hundred men of arms, such as for birth and wealth were the very principal and best in the Island, who were to pass over with him into Africa; and he appointed them a day, upon which they should all present themselves in readines, furnished and appointed in the best manner with horse and armor. This warfare to far from home was like to be irksome unto them, and to bring with it much trouble, many difficulties and dangers, as well by sea as land. The consideration and fear hereof mightily disquieted not only the parties themselves, but also their parents and kinsfolk. Now when the day appointed was come, they flewed their horses and armor, Then Scipio made a speech unto them, and said, "That he was given to understand, that certain Sicilian horsemen stood in great fear and dread of this foillidery, as K being a sore and painfull piece of service: In case then (quothe) there be any of you fincerely and disdosed indeed, I had rather you would now presently be known thereunto me: and confess at once, then hereafter to whine and complain, and so to prove lazy lubbers and unprofitable soldiers to the Common-wealth. And therefore utter your minds in plain terms, and I will be content to hear you without offence. Whereupon, when as one of them took a good heart, and said flatly, "That if it lay in his choice freely to do what he would, he was altogether unwilling to serve: then Scipio answered him again in this manner, Forasmuch as his youth, thou haft not dissembled thy heart's grief, but spokken out what thou thinkest, I will soon "depute one in thy turn unto whom thou mayest deliver thy armor, thy horse and other furniture of warfare, and whom thou shalt forthwith have home with thee, there to train, teach, &c. exercise him after thou hast given him thy horse and armor. The young man was glad hereof, and accepted the offer upon that condition: and so he was affigned unto him one of those three hundred abovefaid, whom he kept about himself unarmed. When the rest said that horseman in this manner discharged of his service, and that with the favour and good will of the L. General: every man then began to think for himself, and to make excuses, and took others in their stead. Thus for the three hundred Sicilians were substituted as many Roman horsemen, without any expenses at all of the State. And the Sicilians themselves had the charge of instructing and training them up. For the General had made an Edict and Proclamation, That whoever did not so, should serve himself in person. This proved by report a brave cornt of horsemen above the rest; and in many battels performed right good service to the Common-wealth. After this, he took a survey of the legions or ftoomens: and all those who had born arms longest in the wars he selected forth, especially such as had been employed under the conduct of Marcellus. For those he well knew to have been brought under the best discipline of warfare, and also by reason of the long siege of Syracuse, to be most skilful in affailing of Cities. For now they were no small matters that he had in his head, but he plotted even the very destruction and ruin of great Carthage. After this, he divided his army and placed several forces in sundry townes. The Cities of Sicily he enjoyned to provide corn; he made spare of that which was brought out of Italy; the old ships he newly repaired and rigged, and with them he sent Libyions into Africa for to prey upon the country and fetch in prizes; the new which rid at Panormus he drew up to land, that they might all winter long lie upon dry ground, and be seasoned, because they were made in hale of green timber. When he had prepared all things necessary for war, he came to the City of Syracuse; which as yet was not in good order and well quieted, since the great troubles of the late wars. For the Greeks made claim for their goods granted unto them by the Senat of Rome, which certain of the Italian nation detained and with-held from them by the same violence, wherewith in time of war they had possessioned themselves thereof. He supposing it meet and requisite to maintain above all things, the credit of the State: partly by virtue of an edict and commandement, and partly by a civil course and proclains of law against such as were obitinate and avow'd their wrongs done, he forced them to make restitution to the Syracusians. This act of his pleased not only them but also all the states of Sicily: and therefore they were more willing and forward to help him in the wars.

The same summer there arose in Spain great troubles, raised by the means of Indibles the Lorcgote for no other occasion or reason in the world; but because in regard of the high admiration of Scipio, all other Captains besides whatsoever were but despised, "Him they suppose to be the only General that the Romans had left. Now that all the rest were slain by Anullal, and hereupon it was thought that when the two Scipios were killed they had no other to bend into Spain but him: and afterwards, when the wars grew hot in Italy, he was the only man sent for over to match with Anullal. And over and besides that, the Romans had now in Spain no Captains
A certain at all, but in brendame and there is the old experienced army also was from thence withdrawn. All things are out of frame and in great commotion & none there, but a disordered fort of raw flesh water loudiers. And never they looked to have again the like occasion & opportunity to recover Spain out of their hands. For hitherto they had ever been in subjection to that day, to the Carthaginians or the Romans, and not always to the one or the other, but turns, and other wills to both at once. And like as the Carthaginians have been driven out by the Romans, so may the Romans be expelled by the Spaniards, if they would hold together. So that in the end Spain being freed from all torment war, might be relieved for ever for the ancient customs and rights of the country. With these and such like suggestions and discourses, he solicited and raised not only his own subjects and connexions, but the Auretans also, a neighbour-nation, and other States and Cities that bordered upon his and their confines: so as within few days there assembled together into the territory of the Auretans (according to an Edict published abroad) thirty thousand foot and six thousand horsemen.

The Roman Captain, likewise for this part, L. Locutius, and L. Manlius Acidinus, left by necessity. The first beginning the war might grow to a greater head, joyed their forces together, and march'd through the country of the Auretans, as peaceably as if they had been friends, (not withstanding they were known enemies) came to the very place where they were encamped and pitched themselves within three miles of the enemies. At the first they assailed by way of Embattlement to deal with them, and to persuade them to lay aside all arms and hostility; but they laboured in vain. Afterwards, when as the Spanish horsemen gave charge suddenly upon certain Romans that were foraging, the Romans also sent out from their Stations and Corps de Guare their Cavalry to oppose to the horsemen skirmished, but no memorable act to speak of was effected on the one side or the other. The next morrow by true-firing the enemies all swarmed themselves armed and in order of battle, and based the Romans within a mile of their Camp. The Auretans were marshalled in the main battle: the Legerettes in the right point, and certain other Spanish nations of base and mean account in the left: between both these wings and the battle, of either hand they left certain wide and void places, whereas when the time served they might put forth their horsemen. The Romans having embattled and put themselves in array after their old and usual manner, yet in this one thing followed the examples of the enemies, in leaving out certain open spaces between the legions for the men of arms to pass through. But Locutius supposing that the use of the horse-service would be advantageous to that part which first should send out their Cavalry into the battle of the enemies, that lay to open with spaces between, gave commandment to Sec. Cornelius a Knight Marshal or Tribune to will and charge the Cavalry to let to with their horses, and to enter those open lanes between the enemies battalions. And himself having spied but badly in beginning the fight with footmen so rashly, laid no longer, but until he had brought the thirteenth legion (which was left in the left wing opposite to the Legerettes) out of the rearward into the vanguard, let to succour and strengthen the twelfth legion, which already began to shrink and give ground. After that once the skirmish there was equal and fought on even hand, he advanced forward to L. Manlius, who in the forefront of the battell was borne in encouraging his men, and sending supplies and succours into all parts where he saw needful:

threw onto him, that all was well and whole in the left point and that he had sent out Cornelius, who with his horsemen, would like a tempestuous storm come upon them, and soon overcast and befieged the enemies round about. The word was not to soon spoken, but the Roman horsemen were ridden within the thickest of the enemies, and not only disordered the armies and companies of the footmen, but also at once shut up the waists and passages that the Spaniards could not make out with their horsemen. And therefore the Spaniards leaving to fight on horseback, slight on foot. The Roman Generals seeing the ranks and files of the enemies disarrayed, themselves in fright and fear, and their enmies was up and down every way; fell to exhorting, yes, to entreating of their own Infantry to rechare them with all their force, whereas they were thus troubled and disbanded, and not suffer them to come into order, and re-enforce the battell again. And truly the barbarous people had never been able to abide their violent imprestion, but that Indebit himself their Prince and Lord, together with the men of arms that were now dismounted on foot, made head against the enemys of the footmen in the vanguard. Whereupon ensued a sharp and cruel fight for a good while. At length, when as they fought about their Prince (who fish, although, he were half dead yet stood his ground and afterwards with a javelin was nailed to the earth) were overhelmed with darts, and thin: then they began to flee on all hands: but the greater number were killed in the place, because both the horsemen had no time nor space to recover their horses and mount upon them again and also the Romans pressed to body upon them after they were once discomfited, and never gave over until they had stript the enemies quite out of their Camp. So there died that day thirteen thouand Spaniards, and well near eight hundred were taken prisoners. Of Romans and Allies, not many more than two hundred left their lives behind them and those especially in the left point. The Spaniards, that either were driven out of their Camp or escaped out of the battell, first ran scattered and dispersed over the fields, and afterwards returned every man to his own City where he dwelt.

Then Manlius summoned them to a generall council: where they all bewailed their calamities & miseries, greatly blamed the authors of the war, and agreed in the end to send their embassadors... tadors; to give up their arms, and to yield their bodies. Thefe having excited themselves and laid the whole fault upon Meflers & the reft of the Princes who were the ftirres of the war, & were for the moft part blamed ftain themselves for their labour in the field, yielded up their armour and themfelves, and received this anfwer from the Romans: That they fhould be received to mercy, and their infubftion accepted; if they would deliver alive into their hands. Meflers, and the reft that were the breakers of peace. Otherwise, they threatened to lead their forces into the territories of the Bergettes and Anietans, and fo forward, of the other nations their complices in that rebellion. With this anfwer the Orators departed, and related the fame in the confill asfebled, Where Meflers, and the reft of their Lords were apprehended & delivered to the Romans for to be punifhed and executed accordingly. So the States of Spain obtained peace again: and a double tribute for that year was imposed upon them, and they enjoined to provide corn to serve the army I fix months, besides fouldiers liverys, short coats, and side cackfolds; and they received hostages welnear of thirty Cities. Thus the troubles and rebellions of Spain being begun and ended after this manner, without any great ado within few daies, all the force of the war turned upon Aftyck.

C. Lefius being arrived in the night at Hippo Royal, by the break of the day, led forth with banner displayed in order of battle all his fouldiers and mariners, for to harry and spoil the country. And finding the inhabitants there retchles and careless, and living in incertitude as in time of peace, they did much hurt and annoyed them there. Whereupon the news went in poft to Carthage, let all on a hurry & put them in exceeding great fear. For it was reported, that the Roman Armado was arrived, and that Scipio the General was landed (for the rumour ran before, how he was paffed over already into Sicily,) and became they never descried the flips, nor discovered certainly what K power of men invaded and spoiled the country, they thought the moft and doubted the worst, as fear commonly maketh every thing more than it is. And fo at firit they were only affrighted and terrifyed: but afterwards they grew melancholly and troubled in spirit in their teamps, to think, "That fortune should so much be changed, that they who a little before as noble conquerors had lain encamped with an army before the walls of Rome defeated to fome houfes of enemies, and either by meer force or meer love, held all the States of Italy under their Signory, fhould now themselves see the wheel so turn about, as they were like shortly to behold the wafting and poisling of Aftyck, and the City of Carthage beleiged: a thing that they were never able to endure with that valour and resolution, nor to abide with fuch strength as the Romans had. For the Romans had ever the Commons of Rome: they had alwaies the youth of Latin: ready at L. hand; who until creased more and more the new fry, and daily grew in number to make supply, and to repair & furnish out fo many armies that were defeated. Whereas, their natural people were neither in town nor country fit for service, their aids were waged and hired for money from among the Africans, a nation like to turn upon any accident, & to change with every gale and puff of vain hope, and were besides fable and unfaithful in their promise. For now the Kings already, Syphax, and Maffinna: the one upon conference with Scipio is fecretly alienated from us, in heart, and the other openly revolted in action, and become our moft deadly enemy: fo that there remaineth neither help nor hope for us at all in any place. For neither Mago is able in Gaul to make any commorisons and rebellion nor yet to joyn with Annibal; And as for Annibal himself, he washereft space, and defiaieth daily both in fame and reputation, and also in strength and M forcible means. When their minds being thus diquifed upon themfes and prefent tidings, they were fain to be bewail and lament their woefull fate, the infinant danger recalled them again to confult by what means they might withal and the imminent perils. So they thought good to take matters in all haste both in the City and the countries by, to lend fome to levy and wage the aids of the Africans to fortifie their City, to bring in here of grain, to provide weapons and armor, to rig their navy and to lend it out to Hippo, for to encounter the Roman Armado. Whiles they were devising these courfes, there came at laft a poft with news, that it was Lefius and not Scipio who was set afoot; that there was landed no greater power than for to make rodes into the country for booties only: and as for the main strength of the whole army, it remained still in Sicily: So they had some reipit to breath themselves, & began to address their Embaffies to Syphax, and to other N Princes, for to eftabliih and confirm peace and league between them. They dispatched others also to Philip, who fhould make promife unto him of two hundred talents of silver, in cafe he fould come either into Sicily or Italy. Meflers also were fent as far as into Italy unto their own Generals being there: to will them to raife what troubles they could possibly, for to keep Scipio a work, and hold him back from coming into Aftyck. And unto Mago were fent not only those meffengers aforesaid, but alfo five and twenty long ships of war, fix thouand footmen, eight thouand horfemen even Elephants, and great store of treafure besides for to hire aids, whereby he might advance forward with his forces nearer to Rome, and join with Annibal. Thofe preparations were making, and thofe courfes devifing at Carthage, when as Maffinna upon the brut that went of the arrival of the Roman fleet, began to fear up and roone himself; and accompanied with five few horfemen, came unto Lefius, but in driving fill great booties out of the country, which he found altogether diffurnified of armes, and unprovided of guards and Garrifons for defence. He much complained that Scipio was fo slack in his affairs, and grieved that he had not paffed over ere this time with an army into Aftyck, whiles the Carthaginians were thus affrighted, whiles Syphax was troubled with the wars of the borderers of whom he was thus much perswaded, that if he might have refting time to comphce his own affairs of his mind, he would not continue fast unto the Romans, nor deal in any thing faithfully and truly with them: willing him to follic the Scipios, and to spur him on and importune him not to stand longer at a bay and make delays. And for his own part, notwithstanding he was daintily of his fathers kingdom, yet he would ereready to affit him with such a power of foot and horse as were worth God amercy advising Lelius withal not to make any longer stay in Africa, forasmuch as he believed verily, that there was a fleet already set out from Carthage, with which in the absence of Scipio, he might not with safety enter into conflict and battle. After this communication, M. Maelius was dismissed, and Lelius the next day looted from Hippo, with his ships laden with pillage and prizes: and being returned into Sicily, declared unto Scipio the counsel and credence that he had from M. Maelius.

About the very same time those ships which were sent from Carthage to Mago, coasting along the Albigians and the Ligurians, arrived at Genoa. It fortuned that Mago at that time lay with his fleet in those parts: who upon the words of the messengers, & the commission to raise as great forces as possibly he could immediately held a council of the Frenchmen and Ligurians, where there were great numbers in those coats, "Wherebefore them all he declared how he was sent unto them for to set them at liberty: and how (as they might see themselves) to that effect he was furnished with new aid and succour from home." But what forces, and how great an army was needful for the managing of the war in hand, it lay in them to determine. As for himself, first and foremost he knew well that there were two Roman armies abroad; the one in France, the other in Tuscany: and that S. Lucullus would join with M. Lucilius: and therefore they themselves were to put many a thousand in arms for to make head against two generals & two compleat armies of Romans. The Frenchmen made answer again, That their will was good enough, and they had an exceeding desire to compass and effect the designs intended: but for accomph the Romans had one camp within their confines, and another in Tuscany near adjoyning, in manner within sight: and peradventure they should be seen in the action to the advantage of the Carthagians; in continuance both armies, as well the one as the other would in all manner of hostility invade their territories: and therefore they desired him to define of the Gauls such things wherein they might stand him in head secretly under hand. As for the Ligurians—because the Romans lay far enough often encamped from their lands & cities, they might dispose themselves as they list: and therefore it was good reason that they should put their young & able men in arms, & bear a part in the managing of the war. The Ligurians rejoined not, Only they cravea suffit of two months,for to take the muffins. In the mean time Mago, having sent away the Gauls, closely took up & profit soldiers throughout their country towns for money. And from the States of France, there was sent secretly provision of victuals of all sorts unto him.

Marcus Lelius led his army of volunteers out of Tuscany into France, and having united his forces unto Lucullus his power, was ready to receive and welcome Mago, if haply he removed out of the Ligurians country neger to the City of Aosta: but in case Mago kept himself quiet in a corner under the Alps, he minded also himself there to keep his standing leaguer about Ariminum, for the guard and defence of Italy.

After the return of C. Lelius out of Africa both Scipio was prick'd forward by the insatiances and persuasions of M. Maelius: and also his followers, seeing great prizes brought out of the enemy's land, and every ship fraught therewith: were mightily incendi'd and set on fire with a burning desire to be transported over thither with all speed possible. But as they were plotting about this enterprise of greater importance, they thought also upon a leffer that came between namely the winning again of the City of Locri, which in the general revolt of all Italy, had sided also with the Carthagians. The first hope that they conceived both to affect and effect this enterprise grew upon a very small matter: by occasion that in the Bruttians country, the whole manner of service was performed by way of robbing and roving, rather than by any ordinary course of war. The Numidians first began, and the Britii soon took it up and seconded them: not much because they would keep the Carthagian company; and do as they did; but for that of their own natural inclination they were prone, and ready enough to follow that course. At last the Roman loundiers also, infected as it were by their example, took delight in robberies: and so far forth as they might have leave of their Captains, would make inroads into the territories of their enemies. It fortuned to that when some of them were gone abroad a plundering, certain Locrians were intercepted, and brought away with them to Rhegium. In which number of escaped, were some carpenters and masons, who as it chanced, were hired to work for the Carthagians in the castle of Locri. There were discovered and known by certain great men, and the principal citizens of the Locrians, who hapned then to live as banished persons in Rhegium such as by the contrary faction that banded with Amilcar and had delivered Locri into his hands, were driven out of the City. These men let no quizzing with them (as commonly their manner is). Who having been long out of their own country) of many matters; and among the rest, how all things fared at home; who told them all accordingly; and therewith, put them in some good hope, that if they might be ransomed, let at large, and sent home again, they wou'd betray the castle unto them: for as much as within it they dwell, and the Carthagians put them in trust of all things there. They therefore, as men that were wonderful desirous to return thither, as well for loved of their native country, as for to be revenge of their adversaries. one of hand paid their ransom: and after they had given order how to work the featt, and in what sort; as also agreed upon upon the signs and tokens which they should mark, from on high a far off, they were sent back again. Then the exiled Locrians repaired unto Scipio at Syracuse, with whom also were others of the banished persons of Locri: and there they related unto him the promises of the captives afore-said, and put the Consul in very good hope that the effect would be correspondent to their designment. With them were sent two Tribuns and Marshals, with M. Sergius and P. Matusius, with commission to conduct three thousand Toulidors from Rhegium to Locri. Letters also were dispatched unto Q. Plemius the Vice-pretor, for to be assisting in this action. Who being departed from Rhegium, and bearing with them scaling ladders, proportioned to the height of the Castle wall fore-told unto them, about midnight gave a token by fire to those that were to betray the Castle, from that place which they had agreed upon: who being in readiness also, and looking wildly for them, put down likewise ladders of their own, made for the purpose; and in many places I at once received them that climbed up: so as, before there was any alarm heard they let upon the watch of the Carthaginians, fast asleep as they were, and disturbing no such matter: who first were heard to groan as they lay a dying, but afterwards, to make a noise and keep a running and much ado, upon their sudden starting from sleep, all the whiles that they will not what occasion was. At length upon the discovery of the matter, one man wakened another, and every one called aloud to arms: crying out, that the enemies were within the Castle, and the watchmen plain. And without question, the Romans had been put to the worst and defeated quite, being far fewer in number than the enemies, but that there was an outcry and shout set up by them that were without the turrets: which so long as men knew not from whence it came, put them in great fear: and the tumult besides by night made every small and vain thing much greater than it was. By means whereof, the Carthaginians astounded (as if all places had been full of enemies) abandoned all fight, and betook themselves into the other turrets (for two there were dilatant not far afar.) The Townsmen kept possession of the City as the prize and guardian in the minds, for the winners. But out of the two Castles there were light skirmishes every day. Q. Plemius was Captain of the fort and garrison of the Romans, and Amnius over the Carthaginians: and both parts increased their strength, by aids that they had coming unto them from the places adjoining. Until at last Amnius shewed himself in person: and no doubt the Romans had never been able to hold out, but that the whole multitude of the Locrians were called and gathered with the proud government and the crouser organisation of the Carthaginians, took part with the Romans. When intelligence came to Scipio that the Romans were disstressed in Locri, and that Amnius himself was advancing thither: for fear lest the garrison also should be in some hazard (as having no ready means to retire from thence) himself leaving at Messana his brother L. Scipio for the guard of the place, passed over from thence with his vessels down the water, when he espied the current and the tideway to serve for a laer. Likewise Amnius having sent out a vancary of the river Butras (which is not far from the City Locri) to signify unto his men, that by day light they should give a hot charge with all their might and main upon the Locrians and Romans both, whiles he himself made an assault upon the Town behind, not looking for him, but wholly turned away and amased upon that other tumult. Now when as early in the morning he found the skirmish begun, he was not willing to put himself within the Castle, for fear of pelting with over great a company the place so frighted and so small receipts: and for to scale the walls they had brought no ladders with them. So causing all their carriages and packs to be piled up in one heap together: he presented all his footmen in battle array before the City, to terrify his enemies within: and with the Numidian horsemen he made a bravado under the walls, and rode about the City. Whiles the ladders and other ordnance meere to give an assault, were in preparing and making ready, he approached on horseback nearer to the wall, and for to view on which part above the rest, he might give the assault: and there he was shot with a quarrel discharged from an engine called a Scorpion, which happened to be planted next unto him. And being affrighted at this so dangerous an occurrence, he commanded to find the retreat, and fortified his camp aloud with out the peril and shot of any dart. Now was the Roman fleet from Messana arrived at Locri, and had the day afore them: so as they were all set a land, and entered the City before the sun setting. The morrow after, the Carthaginians began to skirmish out of the Castle: and Amnius being now provided of ladders, and having all things else in readiness needful for the assault, came under the walls: with that, all upon a sudden the Romans set open a gate and falled out upon him, who feared nothing less than any such accident: and thus setting upon them at unawares, flew two hundred of them. Amnius perceiving that the Consul was there, retired with the rest into the camp; and after he had sent a messenger to them that were within the Castle, willing them to shift for themselves, in the night heason he dislodged and departed. They also who were in the fort, after they had set fire on the houses which were in their keeping, of purpose by that tumult to caufe the enemy to make some stay and tarry behind, ran away in manner of a rout and before it was night with good footmanship overtook their own company. Scipio seeing as well this Castle quit by the enemy, as their camp also empty, called the Locrians to a general assembly, and gave them a sharp check, and rebuked them for their revolt. The principal Captains & Authors of that trepulous he put to death: and gave away their goods to the chief heads of the other faction, in reward and consideration of their singular fidelity to the Romans. But as concerning the publickstate of the Locrians, he laid he would neither make nor meddle therewith, either ingiving to them, or taking ought at all from them. But will to them to send their Embassadors to...
A Rome, and look what the Senate would award in equity, that fortune they should abide. This one thing he was well assured of, that how illsoever they had deceived of the people of Rome, yet they should live in better condition under the ignomy of the Romans, provoked to anger as they were, than they had already under the government of Carthaginians, pretending love and amity as they did.

Then himself in person cut over to Messana with those forces that he brought with him, leaving Plemminius his Lieutenants, and that power that won the Cattle, in garrison for the defence of the City, The citizens of Locri had been so profoundly misled, and loquaciously handled by the Carthaginians, after they were revolted from the Romans, that it seemed they could be content to abide any small wrongs, not only patiently but also willingly, and in manner with a glad heart. But to far

Now exceeded Plemminius, Amilcar, the former Captain of the garrison, so far went the Roman garrison, before the Carthaginians in wickedness and avarice, that a man would have thought they had drove together who should pass the other in finitum vice and ungodliness, and not in texts of arms and prowess. For neither Captains nor soldiers forbade to practice upon the poor Townsmen any enormous facts, which were to make the great and mighty men odious unto the poor and meaner persons. They wrought and committed shameful villainies upon their very bodies; with force and with malice, and enraged as mortal enemies one with another. Plemminius had the chief rule and command of all. As for the soldiers, some were under him, such as himself had brought from Rhegium; others were commanded by the Tribunes or Colonels. Now it chanced that one of Plemminius's officers had stolen a silver cup out of a Townsmith's house, and ran away when he had done; and the men out of fury and hate and counseled to come in the way, and to meet with Sergius and Matthias at the two Tribunes or Colonels first in the face, Whereupon the cup was taken from him by the commandment of the Tribunes; and thence a rote first a brand, and some hard words were dealt between: and from them consequent they went to open clamors and loud outcries; until at length they came very near between the soldiers of Plemminius and of the Tribunes; and according as they came still one or other in time to help their own side, both the number and the riot increased at once. In the end, Plemminius his men went away with the blows, and moaned themselves unto Plemminius running to him with open mouth and great indignation, flowing their bloody wounds: and reporting before, what opprobrious words to his what foul and shameful pranks he had plaied afo, with his friends and allies, proceeding of hot and covetousnes; the fame now in his fett and furious rage he multiplied and wrought in divers forts: so as he brought infamy, hatred and obloquy, not only upon himfelf, but also made the world to think hardly, and to speak much blame of the General himfelf.

Now drew the time neer of the folemn election of Magiftrats; when as there came letters to Rome from Pub. Licinius the Conful, the tenor whereof was to this effect: That himfelf and his army were foened with a grievous ficknef; and that he could not pooffibly have ftaid there, but that the violent contagion and influence of the fame malady, if not greater & more grievous, had not affained the enemies. Seeing that therefore himfelf was not able to come unto the election, he was minded, if it might to ftaid with the good liking of the Lords of the Senate, to nominat as Dictator Q. Cecilius Metellus, for to hold the forefaid election. And as for the army of Q. Cecilius, it was for the good of the Common-weal that it fhou'd be caffed and dif discharged, fince that there was no employment of them at this prefent; confidering that Annobal was retir'd already with his forces into his flanding camp, and taken up his winting harbors, and again the pellicence grew fo hot in that league of his, that if they were not dif discharged betimes, there was not one of them like to escape and remain alive. In these points, the LL. of the Senate granted out their commifion unto the Conful, for to do according as himfelf thought to hand either with his own credit and truitt committed unto him, or the benefit of the Common-weal.

At the very fame time there was a certain religious opinion that had pooffled of a fuddain the whole City, by occafion of a certain Prophefye found in the books of Sibylla. When fearch was made into them and they diligently perued, about the raining of ftones, which happen'd fo often X that year, The Prophefye ran in this form: "At what time ever an enemy of a ftrange and for- t' rain country, shall happen to make war upon Italy, he may be chafted out of Italy and veng'd, if the goddes difpleafe Cybele of Ida, were brought to Rome from Peffimus. This Prophefye found by the Decemvirs moved the Senate the more for that, the Embafadors alo who carried the oblation and prefent aforefaid to Delphos, related; That as they themselves facrificed unto Pythius Apollo, all the inward of the beast killed for facrifice, appeared good and fhewed prosperity: and the Oracle besides gave anwser, That there was a far greater victory toward the people of Rome than that was, out of the iopples whereof they brought gifts and offered to the God at this prefent. And for to make up and fully accoranfe their hopes, they alledged withal, how P. Scipio in demanding the Province of Afirick, did prefage (as it were) before-hand in his mind the final end of this war. To the end therefore, that they might with more peffed obtain this honorable victory thus fore-tokened, and offering (as it were) it self, by all lucky prefagings of men and Oracles of the Gods, they thought and devised some mean to transport the faid goddeses to Rome.

The people of Rome in thofe days was well contented with no States of Afia: because the LL. calling to mind, how long ago, upon occafion of a ficknef, and to purchase health unto the people, Elephalus was fend for likewise out of Greece, before it was joyned with the City of Rome in any league or fociety; and confidering withal, that there was fome friendship and amity begun already with King Attalus (in regard of the common war againft Philip) and that he would be ready to do for the people of Rome, whatsoever lay in his power, they reolved to fend unto him an honorable Embafilage to wit, M. Valerius Licinius, who had been twice Conful, and had war'd in Greece; M. Cecilius Metellus, who had been a Procurer, and Servius Sulpicius Galba: likewise an Edile, and two late Quo. Lucullus, C. Tremellus Flaccus, and M. Valerius Falco. For these five, they affign'd five Quinqueremes or Galleys of five ranks of oars, that according to the credit and dignity of the people of Rome, they fhould make a voyage into thofe Lands, with whom they were to win a reputation and Majesty to the Roman name and State, Thefe Embafadors, as they held on their courfe toward Afia, fo soon as they were put on Land at Delphos, repaired directly to the Oracle, for to know what good hope it might afford unto them and the people of Rome, of effecting that buifinef and commifion, about the which they were fend forth. And this anwser by re- port, was returned to them again. That they fhould obtain in their defire, and effectuate their purpofe by the means of Attalus the King: advising them moreover, That when they had con- weighed the faid goddeses down to Rome, they fhou'd take order, that the very beft man of all others in the City, fhould give her lodging and entertainment. But to proceed, to Pergamus they came unto the King. Who having courteoufly received and welcomed the Embafadors, conduced them into Phrygia to Peffimus, and delivered into their hands that sacred and holy Rome, which the inhabitants of the country faid, was the Mother of the Gods, and willed them to carry it to Rome. Then M. Valerius Falco was fend back from the other Embafadors to advertis them at Rome, that the goddes was come, and that they fhould seek out the beft man in all the City, for to receive and lodge her in his house with all devotion that might be.

Now was Q. Cecilius Metellus nominated Dictator by the Conful in the Britains country, againft the folemn election of the Magiftrats. His army was disbanded and cafled and L. Vettorius Philo created major of the horfe, Then the Dictator held the Election. In which were cho'en Confuls, M. Cornelius Cebegeus & P. Sempronius Tarquentius; his abillence, who at that time had the government of Greece. Atter them were elected Pretors T. Claudius Nero M. Martius Radus, L. Servianus Libo, & M. Pompeius Mabo. When the Election was finifhed, the Dictator signed up his place of magiftracy. The Roman Games were thrice renued and fet forth, & the plays Polybius seven times exhibited, The Ediles of the chair were Cn, and L. Cornelius Lentuli both. This Elenus go-
About when the Province of Spain: created he was in his ablence, and abient as he bare that dignity. The Adles of the Commons were T. Claudius Aelia, and M. Junius Pennus. That year M. Marcellus dedicated the Temple of Vesta, near the gate Capena, the seventeenth year after it was vowed by his father at Clastidium in Gallia, during the time of his first Confulship. There died also this year a Blame of Mps, namely, M. Aemilius Regillus.

For the last two years the affairs in Greece had not been well followd, Philip therefore taking the vantage, that the Aiolians were forlorn of the Romans (the only aid upon which they trusted) forced them both to sit for peace, and to contract the same under what conditions and capitulations himself pleased: which if he had not made the better half, all that ever he could to accomplish in good time, P. Sempronius the Vice-Consul, sent to succeed Sulpicius in the government, had utterly deated him whiles he waged war with the Aiolians, considering, that he was ten thousand foot and a thousand horse strong, and had five and thirty tall ships of war, headed with breaen pearls: before a power of no small importance, I allow you, to aid and assist his allies. For the said peace was not to be loon concluded, but news came to the King, that the Romans were arrived at Dyrracchium; that the Parthines and other neighbour nations, upon hope of change and a new world, began to rise and rebel: and that Dimullum was already begeged and assailed: for to that City the Romans bent their power (in stead of aiding the Aiolians unto whom they were sent) upon high displeasure and indignation, that without their advice and consent, yea, and against the tenor of the accord and covenant they had made a peace with the King, Philip upon these advertisements, for fear lest some farther troubles might arise among the nations and states there bordering; took long journeis, and sped him pace toward Aegonnis. Thither Sempronius was retired, after he had sent Lestorius his Lieutenant with part of his forces and thirteen ships into Aegonnis to visit the country, and to see what in those times he stood, yea, and to disturb and break the peace if possibly he could, Philip waited and spoiled the territories and lands of the Apeoloniis, and approaching the City with his whole power, bad battall to Sempronius the Roman General. But after he saw once that he kept himfelf quiet within the City, standing only upon his guard and defense of the walls disturbing at his own strength, as not able to force the City by assault; devious withal to entertain peace with the Romans as well as with the Aiolians, if he could; if not, yet at leastwife to have truce with them: without effecting any more (seeing he could but only rub an old stone, & renew carkned mantle upon fresh contention & quarrel) he returned into his realm.

About the same time, the Epirots weary of long wars, after they had first founded the disposition and mind of the Romans that way, sent their Embassadors unto Philip, to treat about a general and universal peace: affirming, that they had afforded hope of an honorable end and agreement, if his highness would vouchsafe to come a parly with P. Sempronius the Roman General. And sooner they obtained thus much of him, as to pass over into Epirus, for the King himself was not unwilling thereunto. Now there is a City in Epirus, named Phainice: there the King after communication had first with Erophi, Dardai and Philippus, Pretors of the Epirots entered into an interview also with P. Sempronius. At this solemn meeting and conference, Aminander the King of the Athamanis was present, and other Magistrates of the Epirots and Aetamans. And first Philippus the Pretor began to speak and request as well King Philip as the Roman General, to make an end of all wars, and likewise to give the Epirots leave to do the same. P. Sempronius propounded and set down the articles and conditions of peace in this wise, That the Parthis, Dimiullum, Bargonum and Eugenimium, should belong to the Seignior of the Romans, notwithstanding that they had obtained of the Senat by their Orators sent to Rome, to be annexed to the dominion of Philip King of Macedonia. When they were agreed for peace upon those capitulations, there were compiled within the league on the Kings behalf, Praetor King of Bithynia, the Achaeni the Beotians, the Thelatians the Aetamans, and the Epirots: and on the Romans the Iliones, K. Attalus, Plemaria, Nabig the Tyrant of the Lacedemonians, the Eleans the Meffenians, and the Athenians, And hereof were instruments and Indentures ingrosed and sealed, and truce made for two months, until such time as Embassadors were sent to Rome, that the people might by their suffrages approve of the conditions in that form. So all the tribes in general granted the same, because the war now being intended and bent against Africk, they were willing for the present to be discharge of all other troubles.

P. Sempronius having concluded peace, departed unto Rome for to enter his Conuffling. Now when M. Cornelius and P. Sempronius were Conuls (which was the 15 year of the Punic war) the Provinces were affignd to them in this manner, namely, unto Cornelius, Heruria, with the old army: unto Sempronius the Brutii, with the new legions that he was to enrol, And to the Pretors in this wise were the Provinces allotted that M. Marius should be Lord chief justice of the citizens pleas, and L. Scribonius Libo have the juridiction of foreigners, together with the government of Gallia; Item that M. Pomponius Maro should rule Sicily, and T. Claudia Nero fit as L. Deputy in Sardinia, As for P. Scipio, his commission was renewed and continued for one year longer, with the command of that army and Armado which he had conducted before. Likewise P. Licinius had his commission newly fesed for to have the charge of the Brucians country, with the power of two legions, as long as the Conful thought it good for the Common-wealth: and he should remain in the government of that Province. Also M. Licinius & Sp. Luteciis, with the assistance of those two legions which they had defended Gallia against Mago, continued still in their room for another year. Moreover Cn. Otho remained in place, with commision, that when he had delivered up Saroing & the legion there unto T. Claudius, himself should with 40 long ships scour the seas & guard the coasts along the river within those limits, for which the senator had given order, unto M. Pomponius the Pretor in Sicily were appointed the two legions of the Cannian army. And T. Quintinius and C. H. Tabulis Vice-pretors, were to govern as they did the former, the one Tarentum, and the other Capua, and both of them were allowed the old armies. As for the government of Spain, it was put to question before the people, what two Vice-pretors their pleasure should be lent into that Province. And all the Tribuns with one accord gave their grant that the same Pro-consults L. Cor. Lentulus, and L. Manlius Acidinius should sit as Governors in those Provinces as the year before. The Consuls began now to muster and order, as well to enroll new legions for to be sent into the Britanni country, as also to supply and fulfill the number of the other armies according as they were directed by the Senate. And albeit Africa I was not yet openly declared a Province, but dissolved by the LL. of the Senate, (of purpose I believe, that the Carthaginem should have no inking and intelligent other either of behind hand) yet the whole City was in good hope, and made full reckoning that this year the war would be determined and fought out in Africa, and to an end for ever of those troubles. This persuasion of theirs had perplexed their hearts with much superlition: and very forward men were, both to report, and all to believe many prodigies and strange wonders, which daily were blown abroad & divulged more and more; to wit that there were two lions seen, that in the night season between Whitsun it seemed light day: that in Setia there was a burning torch or blazing Star reaching from the East to the West, that in Taracina the gate, and in Aspendus was also the gate that the wall in divers parts were blasted and shaken with lightning; lastly, that in the Temple of Juno Sospita in K Laurovium, there was a noise and a rumbling heard, with a horrible crack. For the expiation and purging of these prodigies, there was a supplication holden for one day: and a novendial solemn fast was also celebrated, because it had rained stones out of the sky. Besides all this, there was some contemplation about the receiving of some ends. For other and besides that M. Furius one of the Embassadors was returned & brought word that this would be very shortly in Italy, there came a new messenger with tidings that she was now already at Taracina. This deliberation (about no small matter, namely, whom they should give judgement to be the bell man simply in the whole City) held the Senate much annoyed: considering that every one for his part was more delirious of true victory, and pre-eminence in this behalf, than of any promotions, honors or dignities whatsoever, awarded unto them by the voice and suffrages either of Senators or Commoners. In conclusion, L. thejudged P. S. Porcius, the fons of C., who was killed in Spain a very young man, and as yet not of full age to be a Quoctor, the very bell man without exception in the whole City. Upon what motives of his familiar vitiates they were indicted to declare him, as I could willingly have delivered unto policy what had been set down in record by the ancient and hift writers of those times! I will not impeach mine own conceits, in speaking of a thing which hath been dead and buried so long time. This P. Claudinius was commanded to go accompanied with all the dames of the City as far as to Oppia, there to meet the Goddess, and then to take her forth of the ships, and being one day on land to declare her unto the foreign ladrams for to be devoutly carried to the City. Now when the ship was arrived at the mouth of the river Tiber, he, according as he was directed went aboard in a pinnace & landed into the sea where he took the Goddess at the Priests hands, and brought her on shore. And the dames which were the noblest and chief of the City among whom C. Quintinius was the Lordly most renowned, received her, This Claudioth, who before time (as it is reported) was of no better name & fame than the should be, now by this religious and devout ministry, was for her chastity and continency recommended better to poityery. These women carried this Goddess charily & daintyly in their hands, and took her by turns, one in course after another. All the City came forth by heaps to meet her: and along the streets as she was conveyed they stood at the doors with men, making sweet perfumes & burning frankincense; yea & praised unto her, that she would willingly enter the City of Rome, and continue propitious & gracious unto it. Thus they transported her into the Temple of Jove, within mount Pala- tine the same day after the Ides of April, which was always after kept as a festival holiday. The people with great frequency brought gifts unto P. Aquillius, which they offered unto the Goddess & consecrated a Lettiums; and those places called Legems came up then & were first inluritioned. Now when the Council were busy and fast about the many of those legions which were in the Provinces there were certain of the Senators began to a sniper & blow into their heads, That the time was now come, no longer to abide those things while having the troubles and dangerous days they made a full & bold proceeding, considering that now at length the good of the Gods, all fear was still, and the dangers oversown. At which words the Lords of the Senate being ingreat expectation & attentive to hear out the rest they went on and said, That those 2 colonies of the Latins, which called Q. Furius and Q. Titus were Consuls related to let out founders, now altho' for six years had interred their service in the wars as esteemed from warfare altogether, and enforced that immunity as an honor & reward for their good deeds; whereas in the meantime other loyal & obedient a lies were by mutiny every year continued, wafted and confounded, in performance of their faithful allegiance and dutiful service to the Empire of Rome. At this speech, the Lords called not to much to mind a thing long foreseen and altho' worn out of remembrance as they were provoked to anger and grew very hot, & therefore would not suffer the Consuls to pass any other matter before, but decreed that they should peremptorily
A peremptorily convert to Rome the Magistrates, and ten principal citizens out of every of the Colonies, to wit, Nepos, Satrium, Ardea, Anx, Anx, Confoli, Sena, Sestus, Circus, Narbon, and Internamns, (for these were the Colonies touch'd in that point above-named) and to lay upon them every one a double levy of footmen, to that number and proportion which they were charg'd with, when they left out mott in the service of the Roman wars, ever since that the enemies were come into Italy; besides one hundred and twenty honomcn a piece. And in case any one of those Colonies were not able to make up that full number of horsemen, then to allow to every man of arms three footmen; Provided always that for foot and horse both, such should be chosen and no other, as were most substantial and of the best beaviour, and bent to what place toere there was need of supply even out of Italy. And if any of them refused this to do, then the Consuls had commission to lay the Magistrates and deputies aforesaid, and not to give them audience in the Senat, (although they should require the same) before they had performed those importunations. Moreover those Colonies were enjoyned to pay every year a tax or tribute, and that there should be rais'd and levied, one Aes in the thousand; of their substance by the month; and be alien'd in those Colonies according to the rate and rule that the Roman Consuls should let down, which they gave order to be the same that was laid upon the people of Rome: and the information thereof to be exhibited and presented at Rome by the warm Seniors of the foresaid colonies, before they went out of their office. By virtue of this Act of the Senate, the Magistrates and chief men of those Colonies were sent for, and compelled to repair to Rome; and when the Consuls demanded of them, those footmen and tribute aforesaid, they began all of them (but some more than others) to recite and gain lay it, yea, and flatly deny, that so many mott could possibly be made, my, hardly were they able, although they should strain themselves to furnish the bare integer number, according to the usual proportion and old precept order: requiring and beseeching them, to give them leave to have reconu to the Senat, and there to make their releas: neither have we (say they) so much offended as thus hardly to be used, nor deferred worldly to be undone. And say, we must needs miscarry and be call away; yet neither our offence, nor the wrath of the people of Rome can force us to find more footmen than we have, But the Cott, restless in their purpose, commanded the Delegates and Committees of those Colonies, to lay still at Rome; and their Magistrates only to repair home and take mutter: for all such as (unlesse the full number of footmen, which was let down unto them were brought to Rome) there was no Consul there would grant them audience in the Senat. Thus when all hope was cut off to have access into the Senat, and to obtain a releas: thes twelve Colonies took a levy and enrolled the full number, Which was no hard matter to be done, considering how their youth was increas'd in that time of long vacation and intermission of warfare. There was likewise another matter (by as long silence forlet and well neer quite forgotten) proposed newly again by M. Volcrinus Lexinius, who said, that it was meet, and good reason, that those private perçons which had crediter forth their moneys to the Common-wealth, when himself and M. Claudius were Consuls, should now at last be satisfied, contented, and paid: neither ought any man to marvel why he (notwithstanding the City were bound for the debt) had a special care and regard to call upon them for to have it discharged: for, besides that the Consul for that year being, when those lones of money were granted, was in some fort properly obliged to fee that credit were kept: him elfe more over was the very man that made the motion of taking up those moneys, in regard that the City chamber was to empty of treasure, and the Commons purify to bare of money, that they were forc'd able to pay the ordinary tribut. This overture made by the Consul, was well taken of the Senati, who willing the Consuls to put up this matter to the house: and so they entered in Act and driecte, that the said debts should be discharged at three payments; whereof the first should be made present by the Consuls then in place: the other twain, by the Consuls that were to succeed in the third and fifth years next ensuing.

But there fell out one new object and occurrence, that drowned all other cares besides, and wholly possetted the heads of the Senate. By occasion of the miracles and calamities of the Locrians, who, e'to before that day, they had no knowledge nor intelligence and now were by the coming of their Embassiators declared and divulged. Neither were the people provoked to choler and anger, so much as the lewd behavior and wicked pranks of Q. Plemantius, as the slackness and negligence or else the plainness and commonness of Scopio, in dealing between them. These embassiators of the Locrians, ten in number, presented themselves before the Consuls sitting in the open Hall called Convitations: and they were in homely weeds and coarse apparel, looking pale and poor on the matter; and carrying withal in their hands as tokens of humble suppliants, certain branches of the Olive, according to the manner of the Greeks, fell down prostrate upon the ground before the Tribunal, with piteous weeping and sorrowful lamentation. The Consuls demanded who they were: and they made answer again, That they were Locrians, who had endured at the hands of Q. Plemantius the Lieutenant and the Roman footmen, such indignities, as the people of Rome would not find in their hearts, that the very Carthaginians themselves should suffer and sustain, beseeching them to do them this favour, as to give them leave to have access to the Lords of the Senate, there to make their mone and complain of their woe and distresses. Being admitted into the Senate and audience given them, then the ancientest man of the company spake in this wise, "Right honorable (my LL.) I know full well (quoth he) how important it would be and available to the due estimate and weight of our complaints and grievances, in case ye were informed..."
informed sufficiently and knew the truth, as well in what fort Locris was first betrayed unto An-

H: me, as also after what order the garrison of Anabou was thence expelled, and the City restored again under your obedience. For, if it may appear that the trepids of our revolt, cannot be im-pented any way unto the publick counsel and content of our City; but contrary-wise, that our return under yourignory and dominion was not only performed with our good will, but also first wrought and compassed by the means of our helping hand and valour: ye have the greater carne to be discontended and displeased with your Lieutenant and fouldiers, for offering us(your good and loyal allies) such abus1e, to cruel wrongs and unworthy indignities. As for the cause of our double revoltment and change, I think it good to defer the speaking thereof to another time, and that for two reasons: the one is, that the matter might be heard in the presence of P.

Septo, who recovered Loci, & was an eye-witness of all that we have done, be it good or bad; I the other is this, that howsoever we be, yet we should not have abidden such calamities in fut as we have supported them, We cannot disfemble (my LL.) not conceal, how all the while that we had the Carthaginian garrison within our City, we suffered many toil outrages and famous villanies both at Ancil,or his hands (the Captain of the garrison) as also from the Nu-midians and Africans; but what are they in comparison of the abus1e & indignities that we ensure at this day? May it please you (my LL.) to give us the hearing of those things with patience, that I shall utter even against my will with grievance. All the world at this day is in fuience & standeth in great doubt, whether to see you or the Carthaginians, the Sovereign Lords of the whole earth. But if they were to weigh and counterpoise the Roman and Carthaginian Empire, by those injuries which have been offered to us of Locris, either from them or your garsions; and which at this day, more than ever before, we still endure: there is none but would rather make choice of them to be their sovereigns than the Romans. And yet consider, pray you, and see how well affected the Locris are towards you: when we were nothing so hardly used as, or ill entreated by the Carthaginians, yet we had recourse unto your Captain General: and now that we are disunited of our garrison, and put to more sorrow than if we were professed enemies, yet we have run no whither with our complaints but unto our selves, Either shall you (my LL.) vouchsafe to have composition of our miserable state, or else we see not what we have left wherein we should pray unto the immortal Gods, for to be good and propagate unto us.

Ple-

minius Lieutenant to the General Serpo, was sent with a strong garrison and power of men, to recover Locris out of the hands of the Carthaginians and with the very same garrison he left L there; but this Lieutenant of yours (for, the extremity of miseries and afflictions wherewith we are driven, maketh us bold and put forth courage in to speak our minds freely finding no all in him of a man, my Lords, but the bare shape and outward apperance of a Roman citizen, unless it be the habit of apparel which he weareth, and the sound of the Latin tongue which he speaketh. A very plague he is & no better, a notorious & ugly beast, like many others, which som-times (if old tales and fables be true) hangeth the narrow tears between us and Sicily, for to destroy all passagers that failed by. Who if he should have been content himself alone to have prafised & wrought upon us your allies, all malicious acts & pranks, of wickedness, of filthy lust, & greedily covetousness we would peradventure in all patience & long suffrance, have filled up that one gulf and pit were it never to deep, & satisfied one gorge never to unsatiable. But now so great a delight & pleasure hath he taken that all lewd & licentious parts all shameful acts and villanies should be commonly practised & in every place committed, that he hath made all your Centinseau very Pleminius, & your fouldiers as bad as himself. All of them can skill now of robbing, roiling, spoiling, beating, wounding, and killing: they are all good at force of dames and ladies of honor, at ravishing and deflowering of young virgins, at abasing (against kind) of young lings, free born and well defended, whom they pull perforce from between the arms, and out of the very bosomen of their parents. Daily is our City assaulted, and taken; daily is it sacked and piled, night and day, there is no place free, but ringeth again, with the piteous flakies and lamentable plaints and cries of women and children, harried and carried away in every place. He that were a stranger to these things, and knew not, might wonder well enough, how either we can possibly hold out in suffering such outrages, or they which are the doers, not yet be satisfied and full of committing so great wrongs and injuries. For neither will my tongue and utterance serve to deliver, nor needful is it and expedient for you to hear every thing in particular, what we have suffered. But in general I will compile and knit up altogether. I will abide by it that there is not one house throughout all Locris, I dare avouch there is no petition either one or other, exempt from the wrongs that he hath done, I say & hard to it, that there is no kind of wickedness, no manner of filthy lust & uncleanness, no untastable avance besides, that he hath not afflit to practi8e upon as many as were capable thereof, & fit subjects to work upon, Hardly can a man de\i8e and think, whether of these two mischiefs incident to a City be more desetiable, either when the enemies force it by assaile in time of war, or when a petulent & cruel tyrant oppre8ee it by force & arms during peace. All calamities we endure before, that Towns won and lost are put unto. And now at this hours, more than ever (my LL.) Pleminius hath perpetrated upon us, our children & our wives, all those execrable villanies, that the most inhuman, cruel & outrageous tyrants can devise to exercite upon those subjects, whom they keep down with oppression & tread under foot, Yet one thing there is (right honorable) whereby both sense of religion imprinented & engrained naturally in our minds, constrains us to make particular complaint by speciality,

"and also our desire is, that ye should have the hearing, yea, and to afoil and discharge your Common-wealth of the Temple of concience, in cause ye think it to meet and requisite, For we have observed and lain with our eyes, with what devotion and ceremomie reverence ye not only honor and worship the Gods of your own, but also receive and entertain those of strangers and foreigners. We have in our City a Chappel of Preferpina, concerning the holiness of which house, I suppose verily, that ye have heard some report and fame, during the war of King Pyrenous, who in his return out of Sicily, passing along the sea side with his fleet by Locri, among other shameful villanies and outrages which he committed against our City in deligent of us, and for our fidelity shewed toward you, pilled also and robbed the treasure of this Preferpina, which to that day had never been touched by any man whatsoever. And when he had so done, he embarked the money, and sent it away by water, but journeyed himself by land. But see what hapned my LL, hereupon! His whole navy the morrow after, was all even toslid, split, & torn a pieces in a most hideous guilt and horrible tempest, save only those ships wherein that sacred treasure was belowed, which were cast upon our coast & driven thence, Whereupon this King, as proud & fierce a Prince as he was, being taught by that great and harmful loss, & to believe that there were Gods in heaven that ruled all-mad diligent search for all the said monies, and caused the same to be brought back again, and laid up in the treasry of Preferpina. And yet for all that, never sped he for in any thing that he went about, from that day forward. Hunted he was and chased clean out of Italy, and coming by chance one night, & entering unadvisedly the City of Argos, he died of a sudden, and did honored death, and not withstanding your Lieutenant, your Colonels, and knight Marius had heard of this and a thousand more inch instances & examples which were recounted unto you, (not for to amplify and let out with the highest the great religion and holiness of the place; but as we and our ancestors have had right evident proof, and that full oftentimes to show the manifeft power and piuliane of that goddes) yet were they so hardly as to lay their theeveth and sacrilegious hands upon those treasures, that were violent and not to be touched; and so by that cursed prize and booty have polluted themselves, their houses, and your soldiers. Whole service take heed my LL, as ye tender your selves and your credit, how ye employ either in Italy or in Africa, in any of your affairs and wars there; before ye purge and expiate this foul and heinous fault: for fear lest they make amends, and pay for this detestable forfeit, not only which their own blood, but also with some publick loss & calamity of the whole State. And even already my LL, the ire and displeasure of the goddes hath been well felt upon your Captains and soldiers both; & at this present day continueth fill, Sunday times they have been together by the sea, and filled one against another with banners displayed, Perminus the Captain bare up one side, and two Marhalls or military Tribuns another. Nevertought they more fiercely & sharply with the Carthaginians in the field than amongst themselves in furies at the sword point. And through their furious rage they had given Aemul, good opportunity and vantage to regain Locri into his own hands; but that Sego, whom we sent for, came in the mean time upon him. But peradventure some will say, this madness and fury haneth and remorseth the soldiers only, who are tainted with the foresaid sacrilege, and no power at all of the goddes hath been shewed in punishing the leaders and captains themselves. Nay I wot, in them it hath most evidently appeared, The Tribuns have been beaten with rods by the Lieutenant & the Lieutenant again, being laid for by the said Tribuns, and caught in a train, hath not only been mangled all his body over, but when they had cut off his nose, and crot his ears, was left for dead in the place. And afterwars, when the Lieutenant was recovered and cured of his hurts, he first imprisoned the Tribuns, then scourged them; & after he had marryed them, & put them to all exorbitant tortures that might be devilled against bondslaves, he put them to death & when they were dead, would not suffer them to be entered. Thus ye see how the goddes hath punished and taken vengeance of them that have pill'd and robbed her Temple: & never will give over to torment and harry them with all manner of furies and hellish hands, before the sacred money be again belowed in the chiefs & colors of her treasury. Our ancestors long ago, tu time of grievous and cruel war between them and the Crotonians, because the Temple standeth without the City, were desirous to remove that treasure and money from thence, into the City. But in the night there was a voice heard from out of the shrine, that they should hold their hands off; for that the goddes herself knew well enough how to defend her own Temple. And became upon this warning they made it a matter of concience, & were afraid to touch the treasure from thence, they would needs call a strong wall about the said Temple: & when it was brought up to a good height from the ground, behold, suddainly at once all the work came tumbling down. But both now, and oftentimes besides, hath this goddes either guarded her seat & chappel, or else if it hath been any way violated, the hath been grievously revenged by some fearful example of them that have feeming to offer violence to the same. Now for the wrongs that we acharge, she is not alone neither is there any other but your selves (my Lords,) to right us, and revenge our quarrel. You are they whom we the unto unto your protection only in all humble manner, we have recourse, And all one is to us, whether ye inflict Locri to be under that Lieutenant and that garison or yeld us unto Aemul in his anger, and to the Carthaginians, for to wreak their teen upon us & our threats. Neither require we, that you should credit and believe our complaint of him that is not now in place without liberty of his answer, & pleading for himself. Let him come hardly; let him be at the hearing himself, and spare not, let him in Gods name clear and acquit himself of the can. If when all is done and said it can be proved, that he hath left un-the mischiefs against us, that one man can devise to do unto another, we will be content to endure all those miseries once again (if it were possible) which we have suffered already, yea & to hold and declare him guilty of all offences done both to God and man.

When the Embassadors had laid abroad those matters, and Q. Fabius demanded of them whether they had complained unto P. Scipio, and uttered these their griefs before him, they made answer and said, That they had sent Embassadors unto him, but he was busy in making preparations for the wars, and was either too far already into Affrick, or upon his voyage ready to take the seas within few days: and they had seen by good experience, in how great favour the

Lieutenant, Pleniunus, stood with his general: and namely, they were not ignorant how Scipio after he had heard the matter between the Tribuns and him, committed them to prison: but as for the Lieutenant, who was as guilty as the other, if not more, him he let there fill in his full authority. Now after that the Embassadors were willing to go forth of the Temple where the Senat sate, the chief LL., of the Senat began with biting words to inveigh bitterly against Scipio as well as Pleniunus. But above all others, Q. Fabius bidden at him and said, That he was born even to corrupt and mar all military discipline. Thus (quoth he) in Spenall we have lost more by mutiny of our own foulouders, than by the wars with our enemies: for why? after a strange and foreign manner, and according to the guile of Kings, one while he cocked his foulouders and suffered them to have their will and head too much; otherwhiles he would be overharp and cruel to them. After which rough words, he came upon them both thus with heavy and harsh a sentence, namely, That Pleniunus the Lieutenant by his consent should be had away bound in chains to Rome, and there clapt up in prison, until his case were heard, and judicially determined: and in case those challenges were true, that the Locrians have commended against him, he should be put to death in prison, and his goods be confiscate and forfeited to the chamber of the City. As for P. Scipio, that he premeditated to depart out of his province without communion and direction from the Senat, he should be called home: and the Tribuns of the Com-muns dealt withal, to prefer a bill unto the people for his deprivation, and to put him besides his place of government. As touching the Locrians, his opinion was, That the Senat should give them their dispatch, and return them this answer: First, as touching the wrongs that they complained of, it was not the will and pleasure neither of the Senat nor of the people of Rome that they were done: who wished with all their hearts they had been undone: Item, that they I acknowledged them to be good men, to be their friends and allies, and fo would accept of them and call them. As to their children, their wives and other goods taken from them whatsoever, their mind was that they should be restored again: Item, that enquiry should be made what sums of money were taken out of the treasury of Propontis, and that two-fold restitution should be made and laid up there in head of it: Item, that there should be a solemn magistary for critics celebrated for amends and expiation of that sin: but so, as the college first of the Priests and Bishops should be consulted with, and their advice taken in that behalf, (considering the sacred treasure was dishonored, laid open and violated) namely, what manner of expiations and clemency were to be used, to what Gods, and with what bounties they should sacrifice: Finally:

that all the foulouders which were at Locri should be transported over into Sicily: and in their rooms four cohorts of allies from out of the Latin Nation should be brought to lye in garrison there. But every Senator could not be asked his opinion and sentence that day, by reason of their difference and disagreement of minds so highly incensed: some in favour, other in disavour of Scipio. For besides the freed part of Pleniunus, and the calamity & oppression of the Locrians, they began to speak against the apparel of the General himself. "How he went not like a foulounder and a warrior, no, nor so much as like a Roman: walking up and down, and squaring it out in the schools and open places of exercise with his mantle and cloak and in his flippers and pantofles, after the Greek fashion: And that he was over bookish, and his mind too much upon reading:

and took delight to be in the fencing school and wrestling-place and all his men and guard about him as idly and wantonly given as he, took joy in the pleasures & delightful fete of Syria casts. As for Carthage and Annibal, they were quite forgot and his whole army through loofels and liberty was fulfilled and clean loth, like to that of late at Sacco in Spain, and all one with them at this time in Locri, more to be feared of their friends than their enemies. And albeit these matters thus reported, were either true, or mingled with some truths, and therefore founded all very probable; yet the opinion of M. Metellus prevailed: who in all other things gave his attenunto Maximus; only as touching Scipio, he var ed from him. "For I cannot see any reason (quoth

he) how this can Rand that whom erewhile the whole City chose at those young years of his,

to be the only Captain for to recover Spain, of whom they made special choice to be their Comit after that he had gotten Spain from the enemies, to end at once the Punic war; and in whom they repoved great hope, that he was the man to draw Annibal out of Italy, and to subdue all Affrick: he now shoud all of a sudden be called for home out of his Province, as a person almost condemned, without pleading and hearing of his case, as if he were another Pleniunus: considering that even those new and cruel parts which the Locrians complained of were by their own words and confession not committed whiles he was present in place; nether could he be charged and accused directly for ought else but only for his sufferance and conferyency, in that upon a tender and respective indulgence of his Lieutenant, he was too remiss,

A and forbore to punish him with rigor. His advice therefore and opinion was that M. Pompeius the Pretor, unto whose lot the government of Sicily was fallen, should within three days next and immediately emit his journey into his province and that the Comitia, shou'd elect s. Commissioners or Delegates out of the Senate, such as they thought good of, and send them with the Pretor likewise two Tribunes of the Commons, and one Adiector, that the Pretor with the assent of these persons, should sit upon a commission to inquire and know the truth: and in case they could find that those things where with the Locrians found themselves so much grieved, were done either by commandment and direction from Seppo, or with their will and consent; then to charge him to depart out of the province: But in case that P. Servilius were already passed over into Africa, then the forenamed Tribunes of the Commons, and the Edile, joyning unto them two of the Delegates above said, (as he the Pretor deemed most meet) should fall into Africa, and the Tribunes and Edile bring with them Seppo on that occasion; and the two Commissioners have the charge and government of the army until such time as a new L. General succeeded and came in place. But if M. Pompeius and the ten Delegates abode still, found that neither by the direction, nor with the will of P. Seppo their commons were committed, then P. Servilius should remain still with the army, and go forward with the war, as he intended. Then this decree of the Senate was one passed, and an act made thereof; they were in hand with the Tribunes either to agree between themselves, or else to call lots, which two of them should go with the Pretor and the Delegates. And then the college of the bishops were consulted with, about the expiation and making satisfaction for those things which in the temple called Prozoropa in Locri were either handed polluted, or carried forth from thence. The Tribunes of the commons that went along with the Pretor and the Commissioners, were M. Claudius Marcellus & M. Clemens Albinus, who also had an Edile of the Commons to assist them, whom they might command, if Seppo should not obey the Pretor, whether he were in Sicily, or gone over into Africa, to apprehend and arrest his body; and by virtue of their consistent and inviolable authority to bring him home with them. And first they resolved to go to Locri before they went to Messana. But concerning Pleminius, the report goeth to two ways, Some say that when he was advertised what was intended and deviled against him at Rome, he purposed to go to Naples into banishment, and charged by the way to light upon one of the Delegates above said, and so by him was perforce brought back to Rhegium. Others affirm, that Seppo himself sent out one of his Lieutenants, accompanied with 30 of the most noble Knights or Gentlemen that he had about him, with a warrant to commit Q. Pleminius and with him the principal Authors of the sedition, and to lay them fall in iron. But certain it is that they all, were it by the commandment of Seppo before, or then by warrant from the Pretor, were put in ward and safe custody with the Rhegins, The Pretor and the Delegates being come to Locri, first and formost, according to their commission, had a principal care of Religion. For all the holy money which they found by diligent search in the custody either of Pleminius, or of the officers together with that which they themselves had brought with them from Rome, they bestowed again in the privy vaults where the treasure was kept: and besides, they made a solemn purgatory facrice for the Sacrilege. After this, the Pretor assembled the officers together, and commanded them to carry their Engines out of the City: where himself encamped upon the plain and proclaimed no noisilier, as he would answer at his uttermost peril, should either tarry behind, or bring forth any thing with him but his command. Then he gave the Locrians leave, that every man should lay hold upon that which he knew to be his own: and if sought were not forth coming, and to be seen, to challenge and put in his claim for it. And above all things, his pleasure was, that all bodies of free persons whatsoever, should without delay be restored unto them, and if any made default of restitution he should adjudge the same and be grievously punished. Then he assembled the Locrians to an audience, and pronounced before them all, That the people and Senat of Rome granted unto them their ancient liberty, and their own laws; giving notice unto them, that whoever had any thing to say against Pleminius, or any other person by way of accusation, he should follow him to Rhegium, and there give attendance. Also if they were desirous to make a publick and open complaint of Seppo, namely, That the false commissions at Locri most impiously and wickedly, against both God and man, passed either under his warrant, or with his leave and liking, then they should send Embassadors to Messana, where he together with his Council and assistants would give them audience of all matters and determine accordingly. The Locrians yielded great thanks to the Pretors and to the Delegates or Commissioners: as also to the Senat and people of Rome: and said, They would go to accuse Pleminius. As for Seppo, although he let little to heart the injuries and wrongs done unto their City: yet he was a man whole friendship they desired rather to embrace than to entertain in enmity. And this they knew auctedly, that so many lound pranks, and so horrible parts there laid, were neither by the direction nor yet with the consent and toleration of P. Seppo but his only fault was that either he trusted Pleminius overmuch, or credited them too little. And some men (say they) be of this nature: that they will have a careful regard for to prevent in, and an earnest desire that no offence be committed, rather than courage and heat to a panic: and correct faults when they are once done and pass. Hereupon both the Pretors and also the Commissioners with him thought themselves well eased of no small burden and charge of making farther inquiry and setting upon the case of Seppo: But Pleminius and two and thirty persons more with him, they condemned and sent bound in chains to Rome. They themselves went also in perfon to Scipio, to be eye-witnesses and to make report at Rome of their own knowledge, as touching the manner of apparel, the idle life of the General, and the loose, dissolute, and corrupt military discipline of his soldiers; so rife and common in many mens mouths, Against their coming to Spathes, Scipio was provided of deeds to approve his innocency, and not of words to excite his folly. H Recap that all his forces there to meet, and for his armado to be in readiness, as if he were that day to give battle both by Land and Sea to the Carthaginians. The very same day that they arrived thither, they were friendly received and courteously entertained by Scipio. The morrow after, he shewed them all his forces, as well for Land as Sea service, not only furnished, well appointed and in readines, but the one forti, namely the land soldiers, running and charging one another at turne; and the Sea servitors likewise within the haven, representing a naval combat with their ships. Then he led the Pretor and the other commissioners all about, to see the arsenal and armory, the store houses the garrisons of corn and all other provision and furniture for the war. At the view and sight whereof, they were striken with such exceeding admiration, both of every thing in particular, and of all in general, that they were fully persuaded, that either by the conduct of that Captain and valour of that army, the Carthaginians might be overcome and conquered, or by none other in the world: yea, and they wished him in the name of God, without more ado to pass over into Africa, and with all speed possible to make the people of Rome to enjoy the effect of that hope which they conceived that very day, on which all the Centurions nominated and declared him with one voice the former Consil of the twain: and with fo joyous hearts they took their leave and departed from thence, as if they were to bring tidings to Rome of a glorious victory; and not to make relation and report of a magnific and stately preparation for war. Plutarch and all they that were likewise attaint and guilty, after they came to Rome, were immediately clapt up and laid in prison. At the first time when they were brought out before the people by the Tribuns, they could find no grace, no favour nor mercy among them, their minds were to forfhall and pondeled aforesaid, with the consideration of the woful miseries and calamities of the poor Locrians. But afterwards, being produced oftener into them, as the hatred conceived against him, began to wear and decay, to mens anger grew to affawge and soften: besides the pitions plighted and deformed hew of Plutarch there present, and the remembrance withal, of Scipio now absent, gat him some favour with the people. Yet he died in prison, before his cause was judically tried, and definite sentence of him passed, ClaudiusLicinius reported in this third book of the Roman stories, that this Plutarch in the time of the games which Africarius second time Conil exhibited at Rome, according to a vow by him made, went about (by the help of some whom he had corrupted and waged for money) to set the City on fire in divers places thereby to have opportunity to break prison and make an escape; but when his wicked purpose was once disloked and brought to light, he was condemned and awarded by an act of Senate to the dungeon Vatianum. But as for Scipio, there were no words made of him, neither come he in question any where else but in the Senate: where all with one accord, bath commissi oners and Tribuns by extolling and magnifying with glorious words, the navy, the army and the Captain, brought it to about, that the Senate thought good and were agreed, that with all convenient speed Scipio should over into Africa, and have liberty granted out of those armies which were in Sicily, to make choice of those whom he would himself transport over with him into Africa, and whom he would leave behind for the guard and defence of the Province.

While these things passed thus among the Romans: the Carthaginians also having spent all the winter time in much impudence and continual fear, hearkning to all news, and enquiring fearfully of every messenger, and keeping watch upon all their promontories and high hills by the Sea side befirled themselves likewise, and procured the society and alliance of K. Syphax, a matter of no small importance for the safeguard and defence of Africa, in hope and confidence of whose affinities and friendship especially, they were per meer; that Scipio intended to fail over into Africa. Now there had been already between Aemilius the fon of Gisco and the King, not only familiar acquaintance by way of kind welcoming and reciprocal hospitality, since the time (as hath been said before) that Scipio and Aemilius had determined to meet at one time together in the Kings house, when they came out of Spains; but also some treaty was already begun of alliance and affinity, and a motion made, that the King should espouse and wed the daughter of Aemilius. For the affarance of this matter, and the appointment of a certain day for the solemnizing of the marriage (for now the Damocles was ready for an husband, and marriageable) Aemilius took a journey, and being the King burning in love (as these Numidians of all other barbarous nations are most given that way, and exceeding amorous) he sent for the maiden from Carthage, and hasted the wedding. And among other congratulations that passed between to the end, that besides the private affinities, there should be also a public league, there was an alliance concluded between the people of Carthage and the King, by giving and taking their faithful promise irreconcilable and obliging themselves by a solemn oath one to the other to observe it as well offensive as defensive, and to have the same enemies, and the same friends for ever. But Aemilius remembering both the friendship began between Scipio and the King, and also how fickle and variable the natures of the Barbarians are, and fearing it Scipio should pass over into Africa that this bond of wedlock would not be strong enough to hold the King in; took the time whiles this Numidian Prince was enamoured with his fresh love, induced him what with reasons, and what with the fair words and allurements of his young espouse, to send Embassadors into Italy to Scipio, for to advise him not to pass.
The nine and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

A pass over into Africk, nor to rely upon any confidence of him, nor yet to build upon his former promises. For himself was not only linked in matrimonio with a Citizen of Carthage, the daughter of that Acti. whom he law entertained as a guest in his house, but also joined in a public:

league with the people of Carthage. And first he exhorted him that the Romans would war with the Carthaginians far from Africk, as hitherto they had done; for fear lest he should of necessity be forced to have an hand, and intermediate in their quarrels; and so while he desired to avoid the danger and holibity of one part or other, be driven at length to hide all one way giving him more plainly to understand, that if Scipio would not forbear Afric, but needs come with an army against Carthage, then must he necessarily fight in defence of the land of Africk, wherein himself was born, and for the native country, for he and his house of his own wife. With this

b commination and direction were certain Orators sent unto Scipio, who met with him at Syracuse, and there delivered their messages. Scipio, albeit he was disappointed greatly of his ground-work that he had laid for his wars in Africk, and put besides his good hopes: gave the Embassadours letters into Africk unto the King, and sent them back again in all hall, before the thing were published and come abroad, in which letters he requitted him earnestly to be advised and bethink himself that he brake not the rights either of friendship & hospitality begun with him of the league and society entered with the people of Rome: nor violated justice and full promise made by giving right hands; nor yet beguile and abuse the gods, the witnesses and judges of all covenants and agreements made. But forasmuch as the coming of those Numidians could not be concealed (for they went all about the City, and were daily convervet in the Generall his lodging: and if it should have been kept secret wherabout they came, it was to be doubted lest the truth the more it was uttered and dissembled, the more it would beget forth and come abroad: and to the army was to hand in fear, that they were set to war at once both with the king and Carthaginians, Scipio therefore buzzed aforehand in men heads, false devised matters, and to withdraw them from the understanding of the truth indeed. He assembled all his tidlers together, and laid unto them that now it was no longer staying and trifling out the time: bearing them in hand, that the Kings, his allies and confederats, imparted him to set over into Africk with all convenient speed; that Magna still beforetime himself in perion came to Latus, grieving and complaining that the time ran thus on in delays and doing nothing; & Syrah now sent his Embassadours, making much D and wondering what the cause should be of so long temporizing: and requiring that either the army without more ado, should be set over at once: or else if their minds and purposes were changed, to certify him to much, that he likewise might provide for himself and his kingdom. And therefore did them to wit and understand, that he intended (now that he was sufficiently provided and furnished of all things: and considering that the imperious might abide no farther delay,) to conduct his armado to Lilybaenum, to wait the first good day of wind and weather, to take the <=s for a bon voyage, and with Gods grace and favour to set sail for Africk. His letters he dispatched to Marcus Pomponus to this effect; that if he thought so good, he should repair to Lilybaenum, to the end they might commune and consult together, what leagues especially, and what number of fouldiers he should transport over with him into Africk. In like manner, he sent a letter the maritime and seas coasts, to lay all the carriicks and ships of burden, and to bring them a- E way at once to Lilybaenum. Now when all the ships and serviceable men in Sicily were assembled to Lilybaenum, so neither the City was able to receive the multitude of fouldiers, nor the haven contain the number of the vessels; so earnestly minded they were all, and so hotly set upon their voyage into Africk, that they feemed as if they were conducted not to fight a war, but to enjoy the allured rewards of a victory. But especially above all others, the fouldiers remaining of the Carthian army were verily persuaded, that under this captain or else none, by valiantly quitting themselves in the service of the Common-weal, they should be able to end and finish their ignominious and shameful fouldiers. And Scipio himself made no base account of those kind of fouldiers, as knowing full well that the defeat received at Cannae, was not occasioned by their cowardice: neither were there throughout the Roman army any fouldiers so ancient and of so long con-fiusance, or so well experienced not only in many and tandy foughten fields, but also in the assailing of towns and Cities. And these Legions of Cannae were the last and last in order. Now when he had once resolved and given out, that he would transport them over with him into Afric, then he took a particular view of them, man by man. And having called out those, and left them behind, whom he supposed meanest and unfruitful, he sublirmed in their place those whom he had brought with him out of Italy: and so fully he supplied and made up his number of those Legions, that either of them had six thousand and two hundred foot, and three hundred men of arms. He chose also out of the same army of Cannae, both hornemen and footmen, of the allies and confederats of the Latine nation. What power of fouldiers in the whole were set over into Africk, writers differ not a little in the number. In some authors 1 find, that they G were ten thousand foot, and two thousand and two hundred horse: in others, fifteen thousand footmen, and fifteen hundred hornemen. In some records again, they were more by one halfe and better, namely, that of horn and foot there were embroidered five and thirty thousand. And others there be that have set down no number at all, amongst whom, as in a matter so doubtfull and uncertain, I would my self be counted for one. But Catius for his part, as he forbeareth to put down any number at all, so he seemed to imply an infinite multitude of them, in that he faith, that with a cry and shout that the fouldiers set up, the very fouldiers of the air fell down to the ground: and he that had seen the multitude of them when they went a shipboard, would have said there had not been a man left behind either in Italy or in Sicily. Well how many or how few they were, Scipio himself took the charge to see the foudlers embarked in good order, and without any tumult. As for the seamen, and mariners, who were forced before to shipboard, C. Lælius the Admiral of the navy, kept them still land quiet within their ships, M. Pomponius the Prior had commission for to furnish the armado with corn and victuals: who made provision of food and sustenance for 45 days: of which there was of baked meats and other viands already dressed, as much as would suffice for 15 days. Now when they were all embarked, he sent about to all the ships, certain pinions or cock-boats, and commanded all the pilots and masters of every ship, with two foudlers apace, to come into market place, there to receive their charge. When they were all met and assembled together, first be enquired of them whether they had provided and taken into their vessels fresh water sufficient both for man and beast, to hold out to many days as their corn would serve? and when answer was made that they had water in their ships to last five and forty days: then he charged and commanded the foudlers to keep silence and be quiet during their navigation, and without any strife and contention to be obedient unto the mariners, and willing to help in any minillery and service whatsoever, laying, that himself and L. Scipio would keep on the right wing, with twenty strong ships with brazen head heads, and C. Lælius the Admiral with M. Porcius the Treasurer on the left, with as many of the same, to wait over and guard the bulks and ships of burden: willing and requiring that there should be light in all their vessels, namely, that every brazen headed ship should have one; each Carthick tain: and the Admiral ship, wherein the General was, three lights, for a special mark, to be discerned from the rest in K the night. And to be commanded the Pilots to fleer and direct their course for Emporia. [The territory hereabout is most fertile and fruitfull, whereby the whole country aboundeth in plenty of all things: the barbarous pealants (as commonly it faileth out in baset and plentiful lands) are cowards, and snapt for war, and it was thought they might be surprized and plundered before any succour could come from Carthage.] When these directions were given, they were commanded to retire to their ships, and the next morrow at the signals, with the help of the gods to weigh anchor, hoist up sail and away. Many Roman Armadoes had aforetime fet out of Sicily, and the very same port: but never any voyage all the time of that war, no, nor during the former, made to goody a show, and was so much looked on. And no marvel, for most of their other fleets were sent out only to rob and to fetch in booties and prizes. And yet if a man would examine navies by the number and greatness of ships, there had been aforetime two Confuls together, who went over with a power of two complete armies: in every of those fleets therewere were wellner as many war ships with brazen head heads, as bulks Scarrickes in those that Scipio transported over. For besides fifty long ships of war, he bad not all four hundred ships of burden and passage to transport over his army with. But if we would compare both was together, the second seemed unto the Romans more sharp and cruel then the former: both because it was fought within Italy, and also by reason of the great overthrows of so many armies, together with the life and death of their General captains. Moreover great expectation there was of Scipio the Commander and General of this voyage, a man much renowned and talked of, both in regard of his own noble acts of cavalry, and also of a special and singular fortune that followed him in all his exploits; where: M: by he grew every day more glorious than other: which caused all mens hearts to be set upon him: besides his very revolution and mind that he carried, to pass in Africa, which all the while of that war entred not into the head of any Captaine before him: in that he gave it out abroad. That he meant to go over, with intent to draw and fetch Armado out of Italy, and to divert and translate the war into Africa, and there to finish and make an end of it. There came running unto the haven to see the setting out of his Armado, the whole multitude, not only of the inhabitants of Lilybaeum, but also the train of all the Embarriages out of Sicily, which were come together for to accompany Scipio, and to do him honour, and also attended upon the Prelor of the province M. Pomponius. Over and besides, those legions also which were left behind in Sicily, went forward to bear their fellow soldiers company. So that not the least N. was a goodly prospect unto the beholders upon the land, but also the strand to overpassed all about with numbers of people, made a brave and pleasant show unto these passengers, that were in the ships. When day light once appeared, Scipio from out of the Admiral(after silence commanded by voice of the elier) praised in this wise:"Ye gods and goddeses all, that haunt and inhabit seas and lands both, I beseech and pray you to vouchsafe, that all that ever hath been done already, is now intended, or shall hereafter be enterprised, during my conduct and government, may peace well, and turn to the good of my self, the people and community of Rome, our allies, and especially those of the Latin nation: who by land, by sea, by rivers, follow the direction, command, government, and fortune of my self, and of the people of Rome, and that in all our actions ye would be good, gracious, favourable, and helpful unto us, and advance all our proceedings: that ye would grant us the victoty over our enemies: and after we have subdued them, to continue safe and found: and adorned with their goodly spoils, laden with their rich pilage, to return home all together with glorious triumph, & give us the hand and opportunity to be revanged of our foes and mortal enemies: and design me and the people of Rome that power and strength, to execute upon the City of the Carthaginians those fearful examples of cruelty, which the people of Carthage intended to practise and bring upon our City and

"and lake. After these prayers thus pronounced, he took the raw inwards and pertaince of the beat killed for sacrifice (as the maner is) and flung them into the sea: and with that by found of trumpet, gave the signal of departure.

Now were they under sail: having a good great gale of a forewind, they soon loft the fight of land. In the afternoon, there began to fall a thick mist: by reason whereof the ships could hardly avoid running one upon another. But when they were once in the main and deep sea, the wind became more mild: and all the night following, the same dark mist continued still. After the sun was once up brake and dipttered, and then the wind again grew big and high, by which time they might discover land. And not long after, the pilot said unto Scipio, that they were not full too leagues from Africk: and that he saw well and discerned the cape or point of Mercator:

B and if his will and pleasure were thither to direct their course, presently the whole armado should be in the rode. Scipio to soon as he was within view of land, after he had made his prayers unto the gods, to belle this first discovery of Africk to his own good and the benefit of the common-wealth gave commandment to fall still, and to put with the shore and ride at anchor in some bay beneath. So they made way with the same wind. But about that very time as the day before, they were milled again, and lost the fight of land. And as the fog increased, the wind fell: the night also that came upon them besides made all things more doubtful. Whereupon they cast anchor, for fear that the ships should hit one against another, or run aground. When day light arose, the same wind was up again, but the foggy mist eattred; and then they might see plainly all the coast of Africk.

Scipio then demanded what prophomitory it was that he saw next; and hearing that the name of it was *Caiute, from whence they had much ado to recover their direct course again; and finally when the ships were at hand to sink under the water, then the fooulders fying like men at point to suffer shipwrack, without fence and commandment of their General and without their armor, in great fear made shift with boats to recover the shore.

The Romans thus being landed, pinched their tents among the hills next adjoining. By which time the terror and fearfull fright of this their arrivall was not entred only into the Maritime coasts and territories bounding upon the sea, but first upon the discovery of the fleet, and after wards by reason of the rumor and tumult of the army, as it came afofe; but also spread forward as far as to the good towns and very Cities. For not only the high wises were all filled and overspred with multitudes of men, women and children, who went by heasptogther one with another; but also the country peasants and there whole heeds of castels as a man would have said that had seen it how all Africk was like to be abandoned at once on a luddain: in such fort, as they put the Cities indeed in greater fear & perplexity then they were themselves, and especially Cartaghs above all others: where there was no leffe trouble and hurtfully, then if it had been surprized and forced by the enemy. For since that time that M. Attilus Regulaz, and L. Mumins were Coff, for the space almost of fifty years, they had not once so much as seen an army of Romans, but only certain fleets of rovers and men of war, who had landed at times, and made some rodes into the lands lying upon the sea side: and when they had harried some prises, such as came next hand, they were never retared again to the ships, before the alarme could be given to rale the country. The greater therefore now was both the flight and fright within the City. And to speake a truth, good cause they had; by reason that there was neither at home in readiness an army of puiffance to encounter the enemy, nor a captain of valour to conduct and lead an army. Afterwhal was the hon of Gisgo, for nobility and high parentage, for honour and renown, for wealth and riches, and beate for the new affinity then contracted with King, was of all others the personage by many degrees, yea, and the only man of the whole State. And him they remembered very well to have been fooled, discontented and beaten out of the field in Spain, by the self-same Scipio in divers and sundry battels. Also they made accord, they were no more able to match the Captains man for man, than to compare and see their tumulatory power railed in bail, with the land and experienced army of the Romans. Therefore they gave the alarme presently, as if Scipio were ready to assault Cartaghs out of hand: the gates with all speed were shut and made sure: the walls manned with fooulders: the corps de garde fet up: watch and ward kept: and all the night following the Sentinels duly relieved and maintaine. The next day, 500 light horse were sent out as espials and vancouriers to discover and leare the quarters to the sea side: and withall to impeach them that were in baraking and coming land: who chanced to light on the Romans corps de garde.

For Scipio had sent away the fleet already to Visso, and before he was gone up into the land far from the sea, he had encampd upon the next hills thereby, placed guards of horsemen in convenient places, and purposing: certain foragers into the fields and villages for safebooties. These having entered skirmish with the Carthaginian cornet and horsemen, flew a few of them in the very conflict, but most of them as they fled and were followed in chace, amongst whom was Hannas also the provolt marshall, a noble young gentlemann, Scipio not onlye waited the country all about, but also was a City of the Africans that stood nearest, and was of sufficient wealth: whereas besides H other spoil, which was plentifully embarked in the ships of burden and sent into Sicily, there were taken prisoners eight thousand poles of free and bond one with another. But the greatest joy and contentment that the Romans took in this new entrance and beginning of their warlike affairs, was for the coming of Masanissa; whom some report to have presented himself with 200 horse, and no more: but the most do write that he came with 2000. But for as much as this Masanissa was of all other Kings for his time the greatest Prince and most PLENTIFUL, and withall he that freed the Romans in bell read and helped their state, none like unto him: me thinkst it were worth their labor, and would quit all the paines, to digresse a little out of the way, for to shew and declare in what variety of alternative fortune he was tossed, both in the loose and also in the recovery of the inheritance of his fathers kingdom.

This Masanissa, whiles he was employed during the wars of Spain, in the defence and quarr-ell of the Carthaginians; his father, whose name was Gala, hanged to his neck, and then the kingdom fell by accident, according to the custom and manner of the Numidians unto Defules, the late Kings brother, a man of great years and very aged. And not long after, when Defules also was departed his life, Capusa the elder of his two sons, (for the other was a very child) succeeded in his fathers kingdom. But for as much as he the foresaid Capusa maintained his royal state and throne, more by reason of the authority and reputation that he carried among his friends and favorites, than by power and strength: there stole up in arms one named Messenius (who also was descended of royal blood, but of a house that was ever of the adverse and contrary side) and contended in much variety of fortune about the crown, with those who then swayed the sceptre. This Messenius having gathered a power of his tenants, followers, and peasants of the country (with whom he carried a great stroke and was highly esteemed, by reason of the hatred that they bare unto the Kings race) encamped openly and showed himself in action, yea, and forced the King to come into the field, and to trie the title of the crown in a set battell by dint of sword. In which conflict, Capusa, together with many of his peers and nobles were slain, and the whole nation and regnony of the Malifians, was reduced under the rule and obedience of Messenius. Howbeit he forbore to be called King: and contenting himself with the mean name of Tutor or Proctor, gave the Kings title to the child Lacumax, who only remained alive of the Kings issue and line. He took to wife a noble dame and lady of Carthage. Annexed his nearest by his litter who had lately been wedded unto King Defules, hoping thereby to enter into league and alliance with the Carthaginians: and besides, for to renew the ancient familiarity and amity with Syphax, he sent Embassadors unto him of purpose. Thus made he himself strong enough against Masanissa.

Majanis, like wise for his part, being advertized of his uncles death, and also how his cousin german was deceased, crossed the seas out of Spain over to Mauritania, at what time as Eoc-chor was King of the Moors. At whose bands by humble suit and importunate prayers in most lowly manner, he obtained a power of 4000 Moors to accompany him in the journey, for otherwise to employ them in war he might not. And after he had dispatched a messenger afore-hand to those that were his fathers friends and well-willers to himself, by that time that he was come with them to the confines of his realm, there met him almost 5000 Numidians. Having therefore lent back again the Moors from thence unto the King, according to covenant, albeit there was assembled together a smaller number of people then he hoped and looked for, and not sufficient that he dunn adventure upon to great an enterprise; and supposing withall, that by entering into some action, and by travel and endeavouer, he should gather strength still to perform some great exploit, he encountered at Thebus the young king Lacumax, as he journeyed unto Syphax. And when the Kings company in great fear fled into the town, Masanissa both at the first alighted on the said town, and also of the Kings train received some that yielded themselves, and flew otherfrome that made resistance in their own defence. But the greatest part with the child himself the young Prince, got away in that tumult and escaped unto Syphax, upon whom at first they intended their journey. The fame of this small thing, so happily achieved in the first beginning and entrance of his affairs, caused all the Numidians to revolt and side with Masanissa. So as there flopped him from all those parts of the country, and out of the villages, the oldFOUNDERS of King Gala, and incited the young Prince and let him on to recover his fathers kingdom, Now in number of Founders, Messenius was a good deal superior: for both himself and the same army fill entire, with which he had vanquished Capusa, besides had some others that after the slaughter of the King, he had received up on their yielding: and also young Lacumax the infant, had brought great aids from Syphax to that Messenius was fifteen thousand foot, and ten thousand horse strong. With whom Masanissa, albeit he were nothing to PLENTIFUL either in foot or horse, fought a battell; yet attained he the victory through the approved valour of the old Founders, and his own politic wisdom, being a captain well experienced and exercised both in the Roman and Punick wars. The young Prince together with his tutor and protector, and some small number of Malifians, fled and escaped into the territories of the Carthaginians. Thus Masanissa having recovered his fathers kingdom, and foreseeing that there remained still behind a far greater bickerment and encounter with Syphax, &c taking it to be the best course and policy for him, to be reconciled and made friends with his cousin german; addressed certain messengers both unto the child, for to put him in good hope and assurance, that if he would submit and yield himselfe under the protection of A of Mafaniis, he should live in as honourable place and degree with him, as Defalco sometime had done with his father Gala: and alo to Mafaniis to give their word and promise unto him, not only for impunity of all trespasses, but also for faithfull restitution of all things that were his. By which means he perwaded both of them to take part with him: who made choice of a mean estate at home in their own country, rather than to live in exile: nor withstanding the Carthaginians laboured all that ever they could to the contrary.

A Abram tampered at that time when these occurrences fell out, to make his abode with Syphax: who finding the Numidian King Syphax resolved upon this point, and fully perwaded, That it mattered not, nor imported himself much, whether Lacum or Mafaniis were King of the Maflifians, replied unto him and said, that he was foone deceived if he thought that Mafaniis E would keep himself within those terms, that either his father Gala or his uncle Defalco held them contented: For, no, no, (quoth he) there is much more to do now in him and far greater signes of hasty mind and forward wit and spirit appear in him, then ever thew in any of his house and line before him. Full often hath he in Spain made good proofe of rare valour and singular prowess, as well unto his friends as his enemies. And let both Syphax and the Carthaginians look well about them as they can, for unless they put out this sparkke of fire betimes, and even at the first beginning, it will be their chance to be caught therewith, when it shall burne forth: and able they shall not be to help the matter and quench the rage thereof. Many, as yet his strength is small and slender, his forces frail, tender, and feeble, and not well united together to maintain his statute, unlaced as he is in his Kingdome. Thus he importuned him still by reasons and persuasions, untill at length he reduced him to lead forth an army into the confines of the Maflifians and there in that estate, about the title whereof he had oftentimes not only contended by plea and words with Gala, but also by arms and dint of sword, to encump himself in his rightfull and unlikened inheritance: with this direction, that if any came against him to war him off the ground, then to trie his intree by sword: which was the only way to take and molest for the purpose: but in case for fear of him they quit the possession quiedy, then to advance forward into the heart of the kingdome: for either the Maflifians would without battell render themselves under subjection, or else in a pitched field not able to stand against him. Upon these figgitations Syphax was incited and pricked on; in more much as he made war upon Mafaniis, and in the first battell discomfited and put to flight the Maflifians. And Mafaniis with some few Born men fled out the field and elcape unto a mountain which the inhabitants call Balbus. Certain who families and households with their sleds and tents, together with their cattle (which is all their riches) went after and followed the King. But all the multitude of the Maflifians besides, did homage unto Syphax and came under his obedience. This mountain aforefaid, which these exiles that fled their country were possessed of, was plentiful of grasse well watered: and being so good for pasture to feed their cattle, it yielded sufficient maintenance and food abundant, for the people that used to live upon flesh and milk, From hence they began at first to steal out by night and make rotes; but afterwaids in open day light to rob and spoil all the country about: but above all others to burn and fire the territory of the Carthaginians: both because there were more prizes to be had from thence, then from the Numidians: and for that it was more safe robbing and harrying there.

D, Without danger. This they practised so long, so licentiously and in such forecast manner, that now they would carry their booties to the seaside, and make markets & sale thereof to the merchants: and for this purpose divers ships arrived thither to trafficke: yeas, and other whiles there were many of the Carthaginians cut off and came thence home, and more of them were either slain or taken prisoners then oftentimes in open war and left battels. The Carthaginians bewailed and complained of these matters unto Syphax, and spurred him forward (disposed well enough as he was of himself to revenge) for to pursue the reluces of the war, in his own person. But forasmuch as it was not thought to stand with the roiall Majestie of a King, to chase and hunte a rabble of vagant theves about the mountains; therefore Boccharr one of the Kings Captains, a right hardy and valorous man, was chosen to do the feast, and to performe that service. Who had the conduct of four thousand foot, and two thousand horre: and was promising besides, great gifts and mighty rewards, in case he brought away the head of Mafaniis: but if he could take him prisoner alive, that were alone indeed, and a peculiar piece of work, of inestimable joy beyond all measure. He waiting his time when the enemies were stragling restlessly abroad, came upon them at surprizes and charged them, and having trippled from the guard of the armed footmen, a huge number both of people and cattle, he forced Mafaniis himself with some few horsemen to take the top of the mountain. From whence after he had rent away unto the King(as if the war had now been at point of an end) not only a great booty of people and cattle, the which he had taken, but also part of his forces, as being much greater in proportion, then for to dispatch the remains of a war, accompanied with no more then five hundred foot, and two hundred horse, he pursued Mafaniis being come down from the hill tops, and there having beaten and flappd the pallasies at both ends, enclosed him within the freight and narrow valley. Where there was committed a great execution and slaughter of the Maflifians, but Mafaniis with fifty horsemens and not above, got away through the unknown and hidden cranks of the mountain, and escaped the hands of the pursuers. Howbeit, Bocchar traced him still, and followed him at heels so narrowly, that neer to the City Clupea he overtook him in the plains, where he so freightly environed him about, that he killed all his company every one, save one hundred horsemen, With whom in that tumult he let slip as it were out of his hands Masaniella also himself fore him wounded and lost him clean. As he fled, he had still in his eie certain corners of horsemens dipters all over the plain, and some of them crosting the waies overwaite to meet the enemy at every turn, and to intercept him. But he and the four horsemens with him fled forwards still, and took the great river before them: for their fear and fright was greater then to make any stay at the bank side, but to put their horses to it, and plunge in: where they were carried with the current of the stream and born to a side: two of them in the sight of the enemies were swallowed up of the deep trenches: himsell also was supposed to have perished with them, but he and the other two horsemens besides caught hold of certain twigs of oilers that grew under the banks on the farther side. So Gisco bar made an end of farther pursuit, as neither daring to take the river, nor beleiving that he had any enemy for to chaile. And thus returned he to the King with false news, that Masaniella was drowned. And divers polls and curriers were sent out to Carthage to report their exceeding joyful tidings. This rumour and fame of Masaniella his death being noised all over Africa and Africa, brought diversly in the minds of men. But Masaniella keeping himself close in a secret cave, whilst he cured his hurt with certain herbs, lived for some days by the foraging and robbing of the other two horsemens. So soon as the wound was once healed up and skinned over, and that he thought himself able to abide the fitting and flacking of his horse, with exceeding courage & boldnesse he let forward again to claim and recover his kingdom. And having in the way as he past gotten together unto him not above forty horse, by that time he was come among the Mafilians, and gave out openly who he was, he prevailed so much with them, that as well in regard of their ancient favour and love toward him, as also for the unexpected joy that they saw him alive and K found, whom they verily beleived to have been dead; within few days there were gathered and assembled unto him 6000 foot, and 4000 horse. So as not only he was restored again, and put in full possession of his fathers Kingdome, but also walked and spoile the confederations nations of the Carthaginians, yea, and the frontiers and confines of the Mafily, which belongeth to the Kingdome and dominion of Syphax. Having thus provoked Syphax to war, he set him down and encamped between the Cities of Carthage and Hippo, upon the ridge of certain hills, places of advantage and commodious in all respects. Then Syphax supposing it a greater piece of work, and of more importance then to be managed by his captains, lent part of his forces under the conduct of this son, the young Prince named Vermina, and gave order unto him to wheel about with his power, and whilst the enemy was amased upon himself one way, to charge upon him behind another way. So Vermina let forth, and took his way by night, because he was to give the charge closely, and in secret. But Syphax, who was to shew himself with banner display, and to bid the enemy bastell, marched openly by day light, and advanced forward. And when the time (as he thought) was come, wherein they were sent about to fetch a compas, might reach to the place appointed, himself also trailing as well in the multitude of the men, as in the ambush laid before at the enemies back, let his bastell in array; directly upon the side of the hill, which with gentle and excessive stitheth, and leadeth towards the enemy. Masaniella likewise arranged his men, preparing most of all in the plot of ground, which served much better for his advantage to fight. The bastell was sharp and cruell, and for a long time double. Whiles the site of the place, and valeur of the foundiers much helped Masaniella; and the number again on the other side, which much exceeded all measure, and made too great odds, availed Syphax. This multitude divided into two battalions, whilst the one was opposed afoot the enemy, and the other compassed about their tail and back part, gave the victory cleare unto Syphax: insomuch, as the enemy thus enclosed before and behind, had no way in the world to escape. Whereupon all the footmen and horsemens both were either killed or taken prisoners. Only two hundred horsemens or very near so many, which were gathered in a ring together about Masaniella, he commanded to cast themselves by troops and squadrions into three severall companies, and so to pierce and break thorough him, and after his fleeing and hastening, he appointed them a certain place before, where they should rally and meet together again after their scattered flight. Himself in person, at one side which he had proposed to himself before, made means to pass through the very pikes and darts of the enemies, and escaped. Two of those N quadrifus carried still behind, the one for fear yeilded to the enemy, the other flicking to it, and making more reftinance, was overcharged with shot of arrows and darts. But Masaniella winded in and out, and to and fro, deluded Vermina, who presed hard upon him, and followed him left at heels: and after he had wearied him out at length in tedious travail and desperate purpuse, caused him to passe over the chasse. Whiles he himself with seventy horse get away as far as to the lees of Syphax, where he set up his tent, and quieted his confidence, in that he had to often right valiantly fought to recover the inheritance of his fathers Kingdome; and led his life between the * Palme Emporia and the nation of the Carthamans, until the seassage of the Roman navy, and C. Lattius into Africa. Their perversions induce me to think and beleive, that Masaniella came afterwards also unto Sepia with a small power of horsemens, rather then with any great aid. So for that multitude was beholding the face of a Prince, established in his Kingdome, but this small number becemed the mean condition and forture of a poor exile and banished man.

Now to return again unto our story. The Carthaginians having loft the corner of horsemens forefoeing, together with their captains, and raise another power of horse by taking new mutliers, made Hasae the son of Amilce commander over them. And first by messengers andletters
A missive they sent for after what and Syphax one after another, and at last also even by Emis for Africwoman. As for Asdrubal, they required him to forsake his native country, befit in manner round about: Syphax they beheld and requested to provide for the safety and hence of Carthage and all Afric.

At that time Scipio was encamped near Vraca, within a mile of the City: for he was removed from the first place, where some few days he kept a standing camp close to the fleet. Hanno having received a power of Cavalry, nothing sufficient and strong enough to charge upon the enemy, nor much as to guard and defend the country from Wanting and spoiling, hurt before all other things ever about and devised, how he might augment his number of horsemen by a new levy and enrolment. But their rejections none of other nations, yet he levied and waged the Numidian es-

B specially, the best horsemen simply in all Afric. Now had he gathered together upon four thousand horse, when he surprised a City named Salera, almost fifteen miles from the Roman camp. And when word was brought to Scipio, that he prepared a Cavalry took up their summer standing harbour within a town; Thales (quoth he) I paie not, if they were more then they are, so long as they have but one to be their leader. And thinking with himself that the more slowly the enemies went to work, the less he was to slack his business, he sent Masanissa before with the horsemen, and gave command to ride in and down before the gates, to brave the enemy, and to train him forth to fight with this direction, that when their whole multitude was filled forth, and the skirmish made for hot, that he might not well endure the charge, be should give ground and retreat by little and little, for he would himself come in due time to the battle. And if they no longer, still when he thought Masanissa was gone before, had time enough to train the enemies forth, he followed after in person with the Romn horsemen, &c. long closer under the hills (which stood fitly for the purpose, opposite between him and the enemy) about every turning of the way. Masanissa for the purpose according to the direction given him, one while right courageously galloped before the gates, as one that would brave and terrify the enemy, another while, as he had been affrighted himself, gave back; and by this counterfeit shew of fearful flight, he made the enemies more bold and venemous, and drove them on to pursue him rashly. But as yet they were not all gone forth, and their equipment was diversely troubled, and had much ado with them, while he was in force and compell some that had taken their load of wine, and were heavy-headed and sleepily withal, to arm themselves and to bridge their horses, and to stay others from running out of the gates at once controllably, without order or array, and without their colours. Masanissa caught up thole, and cut them short, that a part from their company at the first setting out, rode venimously forward, and took no heed to themselves: but anon when more of them rushed forth at once out of the gate, the skirmish was maintained with equal valour on both sides and at last, when the horsemen were abroad and joyed in battell, Masanissa was not possibly able to hold out any longer. Howbeit he fled not outright, but as he gave back feitily, he received them as they violently charged upon him: so long, until he had trained them to those hits, under which the Roman Cavalry lashed to. Then role the horsemen from out of their ambull, themselves in heart, and their horses fresh; and environed Hanno and the Africans, who with fighting and following were tried and overpowered: Masanissa likewise turned his horses huddingly, and made head in, and returned to battle streeth: so there were environed, intercepted, and killed in the place together with Hanno himself the General, fell upon a thousand, and, even as many as were in the vanguard, and could not well retire themselves backward. The rest slighted with the death of their leader, fled with bridge on horse neck, which for the space of three miles the conquerors followed in caitie upon the ipur, and either flew and took prisoners two thousand horsemen of them besides. Amongst whom there were, as it is for certain known, no fewer than two hundred natural Carthaginians, men of stonn, and divers of them of good mark, both in regard of wealth and riches, as also of birth and noble parentage.

It fortunate that the very same day when this hapned, the ships which had transported over the broad in to unto Scipio returned back charged with provision of victual, as if they had prestaged & foreseen their arrival, that they were come for a new pillage and fresh prizes. But all writers do not accord, that two Carthaginian captains of one name were slain in two battels of the Cavalry: for fear (as I verily take it) left by telling one thing twice, they might seem to deceive and abuse the reader. Ctesar Caesar and Valerius report that Hanno was taken prisoner, Then Scipio bore-flowed rich gifts upon the captains and horsemen according to their good service, and as they every one desired; but above all the rest, he highly rewarded Masanissa. And when he had placed a strong garrison in Salera, himself with the rest of his army made rodes: and not only walled and spoiled the lands and villages all the way as he went, but also forced and won certain to Cities and borough towns: and so having filled all places far and near with the terror of war & holiness, he returned to the camp, the seventh day after he let forth bringing with him great numbers of people, much more of cattel and prizes of all sorts; and so dispatched away the ships a second time and laden with spoils of the enemies. After this he set aside all light expeditions, small rodes and lacage of the country towns, and bear his whole power and all his forces against Vraca: intending it he had once won it, to farte himself there, and to make his feast from thence forward, and a fine place of defence in. All his other exploits that he meant to perform. Thither at one time were slaves and victuals brought from the armado, to that part of the City where the gos behath upon the walls: like wise the landsouldiers advanced from the hill that overlooketh the town, and joyneith in manner hard to the very walls. As for artillery and engines of battery H and assault, some they had brought with them, and others were sent out of Sicily with the viufts: and daily new were made in the common Armony and Arcenall, where there were of purpore artificers continually kept at work for the framing of such fabricks and pieces of battery. The men of Vitera belet thus round about on every side with so great preparation and ordainace of war, repelled their whole hope and confidence in the Carthaginians; and the Carthaginians relied themselves upon Africbal, in case he should sollicite Syphax for to set to his helping hand: But all things went but slowly forward, and they betiffirred themselves not so quickly, as they should have done, who wanted so much aid as they did. And Africbal when he had with all the means and the best shift that he could make, gathered together thirty thousand foot and three thousand horse, yet durst he not approach the enemy, before the coming of Syphax to join with him. At length came Syphax with fifty thousand foot, and ten thousand horse: and immediately departing from Carthage, encamped not far from Vitera and the Roman camp. Who arrivd arrival was so important, and wrougb this effect, that Scipio after forty days absence (during which time he had invaded Vitera and tried all manner but in vain) was compell'd to remove his siege & dislodge, without doing any good at all. For now the winter approched, and he fortiied his standing leaguer for winter harbour upon a promontory, which joyns to the continent by a thin and narrow ridg of a bank, lieth out a good way and beareth into the sea. And with one and the self-same trench and rampier, he empaile both his army, and allo the ships that lay up in the dock. The legions were quartered and lodged in the midst of the said cape: the ships that were drawn up land, and likewise the sailers and mariners, kept the strand on the north side of the hill; the horsemen took up the vail towards the south, upon the hanging and side thereof, shooting to the other shore. And these were the acts achieved in Africk unlill the end of Autumn.

Besides the provision of corn gathered from all parts out of the countries pilled and wafted round about, and other store of viufts brought out of Sicily and Italy, Con. Olausino the Vice-pretor arrived with a mighty deal of grain out of Sardania, lent from T. Claudius the Pretor, who had the government of that land: so as not only the old garners already made were replenish'd, but also those that were newly built. Only there wanted apparel for the army. Whereupon Olausino had in commisssion to break with the Pretor about that matter, namely, what liversies might be provided out of that province, and lent for the supply of that defect. Which busines was not slackly followed, but with all diligence performed: in such fort, as in short space there were lent over 2000 side horsemens coats, and 2000 short caskfocks and jackets.

During the time of this summer wherein those occurrences pasted in Africk, P. Sempronius the Consul who governed the Province of the Etrusci, skirmish'd suddainly in a disordered manner with Annibal upon the very way, within the territory of Croton: where the fight was maintained rather by squadrons and companies one to one, then by any set body of a ranged battell. The Romans were discomfited: and having lost in this conflict (which might more truly be called a tumultous scuffling than a full fight) upon 2000 of the Confuls army, they retired in great halt and fear into their camp. Yet durst not the enemies make an assault upon them within their hold. But the Conful dislodged from thence in the dead time of the next night, and having dispatched a courier before unto P. Licinius the Vice-consul, for to come forward with his legions, he join'd his M power unto them. So they returned again unto Annibal, being now two Generals, and two entire armies. And without any fray, to battell they went: whiles the Conful on the one side stood upon this his power redoubled and reenforced: & Annibal on the other side took heart for his fresh victory aforehand. Sempronius advanced with his legions into the vanguard: P. Licinius with his, kept the rearward. The Conful at the very first shock and beginning of the conflict, vowed a chappell to Fortuna under the name of Primigenia, in case he might have the honour of that day, and vanquish his enemies. And surely his vow was heard, and he obtained his desire: for the Carthaginians was discomfited and put to flight, and more than four thousand armed men slain, three hundred of whom aLFet prisoners, forty horse of service got alive, and 11 disembowelled, and carried away. Annibal dismayed and daunted at this adverse and unlucky battell, with drew his forces to Croton.

At the same time M. Cornelius the Conful, in another side of Italy held in awe, Hetruria not so much by force of arms, as by rigorous procets of law and severaneous: for all that country in manner was turned to Mage, and by his means and favor hoped for a change, and were altogether set upon novelties & an alteration of the late. The examinations and judicial trials of these matters the Conful followed by virtue of commision from the Senat, and not upon his own motive and seeking: and went through therewith, setting aside all parasitism, nothing respective of favour or dilipence. In such fort, that many of the nobility of Tuscany (such as either had repaired themselves in person, or had lent their agents unto Mage, for to treat with him about the revolt and rebellion of the States wherein they lived) were as little, as many as made personal apparence, condemned: but afterwards, such as had guilty confessions, went into voluntary exile: and being condemned in their absence, instead of their bodies which were gone out of the way, they yeilded and left behind them their goods only, which might be forseen and confiscate as pawns to pay for the punishment of their pernions.

Whilesthe Consul was thus employed in divers places one from the other, the Centors in the A mean time at Rome, M. Livivus & C. Claudius held a new choice and review of Senators: and Q. Fabius was once again chosen the principal Senator and President of the Senate. Seven in number of this number were noted with igno my and disgrace, but not one of all those had fitten in the ivory chair and born office of state. They looked narrowly and most faithfully to the Publican's that the charge of the City-buildings to see them keep wind-right and water-right, and in sufficient reparations. They publicly gave order for a paved caule to be made, from the bealls market unto the temple of Vesta, and all about the shops and celladoes in the five places, Also the church * Magna Mater. The great mother of the gods, they c. used to be built in the mount Palantine. They instituted also a new tax and impost out of the provision of salt. And whereas both at Rome and throughout all Italy, salt was sold at a * Sextant by the Modus, they let and termed this commo-

B dignity, to be served out of the same price still in Rome; but in the market towns and fairs, they enhanced the price higher, and in Sunday places they rated it at divers prices. This tax was devised as all men verily believed, by the one of the Centors, for anger, and an old grudge that he bare un- to the people; because he had been in times past unjustly judged and condemned by them, and therefore in the payment and price of it they supposed that those tribes were inoff pinched and charged who were the means of the hard doom that palled against him. Hereupon it came that this Livius was surmamed Senator. The cence and numbering of the Citizens was finished the year before, because the Centors had sent about into all provinces, that the full number should be taken of all Roman Citizens who were without in the armies, and pretenment made accordingly. So there were registred in all, with those about two hundred and seven and fifty thousand persons. And C. Claudius Nero was that performed and accomplished this numbering and asseffment, After this there was a Cenct or taxation taken of the twelve Colonies, thing then brought up and never before. And according to the relation of the Centors they were entered into the fabulio book at Rome: that it might appear upon record in the publick inscriptions and writings, what number of able men for war they could make, and what every man was worth in money and goods. Then they began to take a survey of the gentleman and knights at Rome. And it fortuned so, that both Centors had houses of the City provision and charges. And when the cattle came to cite thole of the tribe Polilia, where the name of M. Livius was enrolled, & made some lay to call the Centor for himself by name: C. Calla (quothe Nero) for M. Livius. The Breviary of L. Florus upon the thirtieth Book.

In Afick, Scipio by the help of Matania in sundry battles vanquished the Carthaginians, together with the afore-aid Syphax King of the Numidians, and Altdubal. He won and sacked two of the enemies, where in there perished by fire and sword, to the number of 40000 men. By the means of C. Lucius he took Syphax alive. Matania when he had taken prisoner queen Sophonisba, the wife of Syphax and daughter of Altdubal, by and by fell in love with her, and by marriage took her to wife: but being chastised and rebuked therefore by Scipio, he sent her to a camp of scorn: which she drank, and thereof died. By manifold victories of Scipio it came to pass, that the Carthaginians driven to despair, were glad to call Annibal em of Italy, to save the main chance, and defend their whole state: Who, in the 16 year of the wars, departed out of Italy, failed over into Afick, and affayed by nim of convenience, to make peace with Scipio. And when they could not agree about the conditions & capitulations thereof, he fought, & was overthrown in the plain field. The Carthaginians at their feast frequently had peace granted, and when Gisco dissuaded that peace, Annibal plucked him back with his hand, & so after some excuse made of his rate almost in that behalf, himself spake for peace. Mago who had fought with the Romans in the country of the Insubrians, was grievously wounded, & being sent for home in so Afick by certain ambassadors, in the way died of his hurts, Matania was fully restored to his kingdom. Scipio being returned to the City of Rome, had the glory of a most honorable and noble triumph: whom, Q. Terentius Capito, a senator, followed, with a cap [of freedom] upon his head. Scipio was surnamed Africannus: but doubtfull it is, whether he came by that title through the fame manner of his soldiers before, or the general applause and affectation of the people. But this is certain, that he was the first general that ever was intituled in his title, with the surname of a nation by himself conquering.

When Cn. Servilius Capito, and C. Servilius Geminus (Coff. in that year, which by computation was the 16 of the 2 Punick war) propounded unto the Senate, concerning the affairs of the State, the managing of the wars, and the government of the provinces; the L.L. ordained and gave order, that the Coff. should either agree between themselves, or else call lots whether of them should go into the Brittan land against Annibals: and whether should take upon him the charge of the province of Hetruria and the Ligurians: with commission for him, whose hap it was to rule the province of Britui, to receive the army from P. Sempronius the Confid: and the said P. Sempronius (for he also was Vice-coinel was to continue in place of government one year longer) to succeed in the room of P. Licinius, who was to return home to Rome. This P. Sempronius among other commendable parts (wherein no Citizen in his time was counted more sufficiently furnished than himself) was taken also for a brave warrior and man at arms. For being richly endued with all those good blessings that either nature or fortune can afford unto a man, he was both noble in birth, and wealthy in substance. In beautiful personage he excelled, for strength of body he far surpassed. Of tongue and speech he was thought most eloquent, whether he were to plead a cause at the bar, or occasion offered either in Senate house or before the assembly of the people to perswade or dissuade, to give counsel one way or other. In the Pontificall canons and laws, he was singularly well learned and skillful. Besides all those praise-worthy qualities (I say) his Confidship had given him experience also in military affairs, and made him a worthy louldeir. The same order that was taken for the Brittan provin
Avin, was also decreed for Heorvia and the Ligurians. M. Cornelius was commanded to put over and deliver up his army to the new Consul: and himself to continue still in government, and to rule the province of France with the strength of those legions which L, Servilius the Preesor had under his charge before. After this the Consuls cast lots for their provinces. Unto Cepio he fell to Brundisium, unto Servilius Geminius, Heorvia. Then the Pretors provinces also were put to the choice of lottery. And P. Sextius his lot was to have the jurisdiction of the city of Rome: P. Lentulus to rule Sardeia: P. Villius to govern Sicily: and Quintus Varro to have the charge of Armacharus with two legions, which were commanded by Sp. Lucercius. And Lucercius had his commission revived again for a longer time, to the end, that he might rescide the town Genna, which by Maga the Carthaginian had been raised and detroyed. As for P. Scopo, his commission government was not limited by any expresse time, but only with the end of the war, and to continue until those wars in Africa were fully determined. A decree also professed, that there should be a solemn procession and supplication held to this effect, and in these terms, that whereas he had sailed over into the province of Africa, this voyage and expedition of his might turn to the satety and good of the people of Rome, of himself, and his army. In Sicely were enrolled three thousand foot_soldiers. And for as much as the whole strength and manhood of that province had been shipped over into Africa: for fear lest some Armada should cut out of Africa, it was thought expedient to guard all the seas coasts of Sicily, with a fler of 40 sail. And Villius had with him into Sicily 13 ships, newly built; the rest of the old ships in Sicely were repaired. For Admiral of this armada was appointed M. Pomponius the Pretor of the former year, whose government had been protracted, and he embarked the new foot_soldiers brought out of Italy. The like number of ships the L. of the Senate assigned unto Cn. Otho the Pretor of the former year, with the same commission of government, to defend the coasts of Sardinia. And Lentulus was commanded to allow unto the Pretor 2000 foot_soldiers for to man and furnish those ships. Moreover, the sea coasts of Italy, because it was uncertain to what parts the Carthaginians would make out theft navy (and like it was, that where they should epy any place weak and disconsolated of sufficient strength and garrisons, thither they would direct and bend their forces) were committed to M. Martius the Pretor of the former year, that he should cure the seas, and keep that side, with as many ships as the other. And for to furnish, that face of his, the Consuls by order from the Senate enrolled three thousand foot_soldiers, and referred two legions besides, against all donstil threats of war. Whatever. As for the two provinces of Spain, together with the Greeks there, and the whole government, they were appointed to the old General, L. Lentulus, and L. Munius Academius. So the Roman wars for that year were maintained with 40 legions in all & with a hundred and fifty ships of war. Then the Pretors were commanded to take their journey into their several provinces. But the Consuls were charged before they departed from the City, to exhibit those great Games, which T. Manlius Tolosanus the Dictator had vowed against the 5 years end, if to be the Commonweal remained in the same good and fortunate estate, during that time.

There now entred into mens minds new doubts and strange incertitudes of confidence, by reason divers prodigious sights and tokens reported out of many places. For beleived it was that certain ravens not only perched and roosted with their bills, but also eat and devoured the gold in the Capitol. At Aetium the mice and rats gnawed a crown of gold. Aboue Cappadocia, a huge number of locusts (Out from whence they came, no man knew for certain) overflown all the grounds, and filled the fields. At Reate there was a brave colt foaled with five feet. At Angroma were seen in the element, at the first divs fire-light shooting and flaming here and there; and afterwards a mighty blazing comet burning. At Pharsa a certain arch compassed the sun with a thin caite like a line; and afterwards a greater circle of the sun encloes the said randle from without-within. In the territory of Arcps, the earth in a plain champain field fell and sunk down and made an exceeding great chink. As one of the Consuls killed the first beast for sacrifice, the liver thereof was found beastly. These monstrous tokens were expat and purged with sacrifices of the biggest sort: and the colledge of the Priests and Bishops shewed unto what gods the sacrifice should be made: These things once done and performed, the Consuls and Pretors went forth into their provinces: yet so, as all of them had a speciall regard of Africa, as if it had been their own province fallen unto every one of them by lot; either because they law that therein related and comforted the whole life of all affairs, and the main estate of the war: or else because they办实事e gratified and currie favour with Scopo, whom now the whole City made controll; and chiefly respected. And therefore not only out of Sardinia siss before laid, but also out of Sicily and Spain there was transported thither reinment and corn: yes, and armours also out of Sicily, and all kind of victuals, for the maintenance of the army. And albeit it was winter season, yet Scopo flaked no affairs and works of war: which being many, amused his mind at once on every side, and kept him continually occupied. For since he believed and encamped he lay oppost to Armila; and even within his sight, the Carthaginians were with their ships abate, and put to sea: and a navy they had rigged, furnish'd and trimm'd, for to intercept all victuals that came: and their cares he forgot not to win: in the love of Syphax, he happy now he had his fill of love-delights with his fresh wife, since he had the plentiful fruition thereof, as much as heart could desire: But Syphax rather receord conditions of peace between the Romans and the Carthaginians, to way, that the Romans should depart out of Africa, and the Carthaginians out of Italia: than seem'd to give any hope, that he would revolt from the Carthaginians, in case the war cont-continued still. And for mine own part, I would rather believe that these matters were treated up on by entercourse of messengers, as most writers do report, than that Syphax himself in person, as Annia Valerius recorded, came into the Roman camp to a parle and conference thereabout. At the first the Roman General, would scarcely lend his ear to hear those overtures; but afterwards, to the end that there might be some coloursable and probable cause for his people to refor unto the camp of the enemies, he seemed not so freight-laced, nor to deny the same articles so stiffly, but pretended some hope, that by often debating thereof to and fro between them, they should at length grow to some good point and final agreement. The wittering harbours of the Carthaginians were in a manner all of wood, but built of slender stuff gathered out of the fields at a venture hand over head, where they could meet withall. The Numidians for the most part lay in cabbins and threds, wasted and wound with reeds especially, and covered and tharched with mats of ledge I and such like, here and there scattering without all order; in such fort, as some of them taking up their lodging at their own pleasure, without direction and commandment of any officer, quartered without the trench and campfire. Scipio advertised thereof, conceived good hope to find some opportunity one time or other to fire the camp of the enemies. Upon a certain day therefore, he went in train of those Commissioners whom he addressed unto Syphax, in stead of pages and drudges, and dignified in lives and bondmens weeds, the bravest loundiers of a band, (men of approved valor, willsome and discretion) who whiles the commissioners were bustie in conference, should range about the camp, some one way, some another; to eipie and mark all the passages and wires in and out; the fire and form generally of the whole leaguer, and particularly of ever-part; where the Carthaginians quartered; where the Numidians lodged; what distance there K was between Afrabul his tents, and the Kings pavilions; to observe allo and learn withall, the order & the manner of their lantinels, their ward and watches, whether by night or by day they lay at more vantage to be surprized by an ambush. And according as there were divers meetings & conferences, and so of purpose some were sent one time, some at another; to the end that more & more still should have the spiall and full knowledge of all things in the enemies camp. Now when as often that this matter was treated of, the greater hope of peace both Syphax had and the Carthaginians likewise by his means; the Delegates or Commissioners aforesaid of the Romans, said that they were expressly forbidden by their General to return without a full and resolute answer. And therefore they willed him to make short work at once, and to bethink himself what to do, either to stand upon his own determinate purpose (if he were resolved) or else to confult with Afrabul L and the Carthaginians, and determine accordingly. For now high time it is, say they either to conclude peace, or to proffecute war fresly, and to go through with it lustily. Thus while Syphax confulted with Afrabul, and Afrabul with the Carthaginians, both the epials had sufficent time to view and iee all, and Scipio allo good leasure to provide necessaries for his purpose. Moreover, by this motive and hope of peace, as well the Carthaginians as the Numidians, began (as commonly in such cases it falteth out) to be negligent and slack in forecast, and to provide that in the mean while they came by no harme and detriment from the enemy. At length an answer was returned and some clauses put in, without all reason and caution, to much inconvenience, by occasion that the Romans seemed too fastin and deificous of a peace. Which fell out very sily for Scipio while only desirous was to pick some just quarell for to break the truce and abstinence of war: and so the next day (for in the mean time he said he would confer with his Council) be answered the Kings messenger in this wise; that besides himself alone, who laboured all in vain and could do no good, there was none liked of the peace: and therefore he willed him to report unto the King his master, that there was no other hope for Syphax to have peace with the Romans, unless he renounced and call off quite the friendship of the Carthaginians. And thus he ended the truce, that with free conscience being discharge of his promise in that behalf, he might go forward in his deigments, and bring his enterprize to his defined issue. So having put his ships to sea (for now the prime of spring was come) he embarked in them his artillery, his ordnance and en-gins of battery, as if he meant to assault Via on the sea side. And sent out two thousand cultoiers, to poffesse themselves of the hill that overlooked Via, which he had held and kept before N both to withdraw the minds of the enemies from that which he secretly designed and intended, & amuse them upon the care and regard of another thing; and also to prevent mischief, that whiles himself should go against Syphax and Afrabul, they might not fly forth of the City, and affill his camp, left with a small guard to defend it. Having made this way, and laid this ground aforehand, he assembled his council, where he commanded as well the foresaid ships to lay forth and utter what they had seen and found, as also Mafanissa, who was acquainted with all the manner and fa-thions of the enemies: and then at last he declared and shewed unto them, what himself intended to execute the next night. Then he gave commandment to the Tribunes or Ko. Marshals, that fo soon as the council was taken, and the court dismissed in the Generals pavilion, at the first found of trumpets immediately they should bring their legions out of the camp. Thus according to his O edict, the enemys began a little before sun-setting to set forth. About the first watch they put the fouliders in array ready for to march, and by midight (for they were to journey seven miles) they went a fair and took pace, approaching the enemies camp. There Scipio gave unto Lelius a part of the forces together with Mafanissa and his band of Numidians, with direction to invade the camp of Syphax, and to let fire thereupon Then calling them by themselves both apart one from the other, Lelius I men and Mafanissa, he earnestly besought them of all love to make up and recom-

A recompense by careful indultric and deviso trust providence and forecast, which the darknes of the night disappointed them of. For as formed, he meant to let upon Afurabal and the Carthaginian camp; but begin he would not, before he low the fire amongst the lings tents. And it was not long after it began: for as soon as the fire caught hold of the next pavilions whereupon it was cast, and by it took all that were near, and so forward to those that joined unto them, it spread into all places of the camp. And verily into a great fright they were all put, as they could not perhaps, but needs must in a night fire. The fire, which was ran all over in a short time. Howbeit they thought it some fire by mischance only, and not the hand of the enemy, by occasion and means of war; and therefore unarmed as they were, and lightly appointed without weapons, they ran forth by heaps to quench the fire; and light fall upon their armed enemies, the Numidians especially; who by Mafonifia that was well acquainted with the manner of the Kings camp, were bestowed in convenient places, at the ends of every avenue and palle. Many in their very beds and couches, between sleeping and waking, were confused with the flame; many running headlong in this their hally flight one upon another, were in the lightness of the gates, stoned under foot, or else thultz and crushed to death. The Sinetica and witch of the Carthaginians, elipt at first the fire shining and flameing out; after whom others awakened and roused out of their nells by this nightly tumult and alarm, might behold and plainly see the flames; but they likewise were deceived as the other, and beleved verily that the fire began of itself by some misfortune, no man will how. The confused noise and cry alto, which was heard whiles they were a killing, flying and wounding, would not suffer them to know the truth indeed, whether the same arose upon their allright and fuddan fear by night, or otherwife. And therefore every man asked as he was, and fulpiecting no prudence of all the enemy, at all the gates as they flood next did what he could to bring with him such instruments and means as were to put out the fire; and happened unaware upon the army of the Romans. Now after they were all miserabled and put to the sword to the last man, not only upon an ordinary hatred between enemies, but also because there might not escape so much as one to carry newes unto the rest: Scipio immediately entered the gates, being not warded, but altogether neglected, and he was never calld as much as fearfull. They tell a flinging of fire upon the lightings and sheds that flood next, as to the flame brake out and theved at him as if it had been dispersed in many places: but afterwards catching and preying from one tent to another as they joyned cloie together, they were all scone on a fire, and burnt every liick down to the ground. Men and cattell both, finged and forcered at the first, as they ran in piteous and fastfull fort away; but afterwards as they tumbled one upon another, by heaps, those burned, and choppd up all the walls and avenues of the gates. And those who escaped the fire, helupon the edge of the sword. Thus in one day were 2 camps clean consumed. Howbeit, both the Generals, and of many thousands of armed men, only 2000 foot and 500 horse armed by half; and many of them either wounded or else finged and half rofted with the fire, got away and escaped. There either were slain or burnt to ashes upon 40000 men; taken prisners there were above 8000: among whom there happened to be many gentlemen of the Carthaginians, and 11 Senators. Of enimys were taken 178. Of Numidian hosics for service more than 2700: Six Elephants got alive, eight perffed either with fire or swords and a mighty deal of armor Eme to me to thier hands; all which the L General Scipio confeolated to Vivaus, and set on fire. Afurabal with some few Africans that fled with him, rid away upon the sea to the next City: and thither got all, who remained alive, following the tracks of their captain, and therefore fastened themselves. But, fowards left that City should be yielded to Scipio, he quit the place and departed. Apon the Romans were received within the same at the gares standing open for them: and bee the willing of themselves they rendred the town, there was no kind of hostility or violence offered unto them. But two other Cities one after another were forced and put to the rampack. All that pillage, as alto was one few of the fire in the two camps, was freely given to the boilers, Syphax encompassed and fortified himself in a strong hold, almost eight miles off. But Asurabal made halt to Carthage, for fear left upon the fuddan fright occasioned by this freth F and late overthrow, things should go backward, and the Senat revolve upon some unmanly and unworthy course. Thither at the first arrivd such fearfull news, that all men thought verily that Scipio would give over Viva and forthwith lay siege unto Carthage: whereupon there Sufetec (who are the Conils as it were, of the City) caled the Senat: where three opinions were delivered amongst them. The first advised to dispatch Embassadors to Scipio to treat for peace: the second, to send for Asurabal home to the defence of his own country, against so dangerous and deadly a war; the third gave counsel, by example of the Romans conftancy and resolution in their adverfity, to repair the army and gather new forces, and to request Syphax not to abandone and give over the quarrell. This opinion, because Asurabal was in place (and all those that fided with the Barchine house and faction, evermore inclined to war) prevailed and took effect. Hereupon they began to take measures in town and country: Orators were addrefted to Syphax, who of himself with all his might and main, was bured to levy freth forces, and preparing for new war. For his wife now, not as aforesie, by inticing words, flattering speeches, and pleasant-allurements, that might serve the turn to win and move the heart of an amorous lover, but by way of prayer and pitifull compassion, had prevailed so much with him already; yet and with plentiful tears befought him, not to betray her natural father and native country; for not suffer Carthage to be burnt with flaming fire, like as the camps were consumed already. Fff
The Embassadors also brought with them new hopes besides, which were presented into them in as happy a time as might be; who reported, that they were about to meet with 4000 Carthaginians brave and able young men, about the City named Olba, which had been lawyers and hired in Spain by their Commissioners, of purpose to take up new foldiers: and that Aframabal himself in person would be present with a power of no small importance. Syphax not only entertained these Orators with gracious speeches and courteous answers, but also showed them a great number of Numidians, gathered out of the country towns; some few days before he had furnished with armour and horses; promising besides, that he would assemble all the young and able men for service throughout his whole realm. For well he knew, that the late lofe and defeat hapned by occasion of fire, and not by fight: and never in war is a man to be reputed inferior, before he be vanquished by mere forces in ranged battell. In this wise answered he the Embassadors. And after some few days Aframabal and Syphax once again joyned their forces together: so as in all, their whole amounted to the number well near of 3000 armed men.

Now when Scipio was wholly set upon the assault of Viesa, and at the point to bend his ordinance and artillery against the walls, as thinking verily that the war was already done with Syphax and the Carthagians; the fame of the war renewed by them aloof, averted him from his purpose, and causd him to give over that enterprise for a time. So leaving behind him certain small guards, as well by water as land, only for a sign and shew of force; himself with all the strength of his army, set forwards to meete the enemy. At the hill he made him down and encamp'd upon an hill, four miles (or very near) distant from the Kings camp. The next day after, he descended with his cavalry, down into the great Plains or Downs (for so they call them) lying near the same hill; and spent that whole day in viewing the standing forces of the enemies before their camp, and playing upon them with shrewdnes.

And so for two days together next ensuing, they passed the time in divers tumultuous executions between the one part and the other, without doing any great exploit worth the remembrance. On the fourth day, they entered on both sides into the field, and embattalred themselves. Scipio marshalled his men in this wise. Behind the Principes in a vanguard, he placed the most enemijs of his Hailati, or Spears; and the Tairi he posted in the rearward, for to second them. The Italian horsemen he set in the right point: the Numidian horse and Massanissa branched in the left. Syphax and Aframabal put their Numidian horse opposite to the Italians, and the Carthagians to adfront Massanissa. In their main battall were planted the Celtiberians, to make head against the enemys of the Roman Legions. Thus ordered and arranged, they encountered one another, and joyned battell. At the first onset, both wings at once, as well the Numidians as the Carthagians, were put back and forced to give ground: for neither the Numidians (being for the most part country people and rusticall) were able to receive the Roman horsemen, nor the Carthagians (raw and untrained foldiers) sufficient to hold out with Massanissa, who (besides all other things) for his late and fresh victors, was so terrible, as there was no dealing with him. So the battell of the Celtiberians, (asked and furnished of both parts) stood still; for neither saw they any likelyhood to escape and save themselves or flight, considering they knew not the count of the country; nor hope to obtain pardon at Scipio his hand, against whom, (deserving so well of them and their nation) they were come into Africa with a power of wagg'd mercenary foldiers. So being environed on every side with the enemies, they fell one upon another; and obstinately dyed to the last man. But whiles all the enemies were wholly employed about them, Syphax and Aframabal gained themselves time some time to get away & escape. The victors (stirred rather with continual killing than long fighting) were overtaken with the night. The morrow after, Scipio sent unto Libius and Massanissa, with all the Roman and Numidian foldiers, and the nimblest and appointed footmen, after Syphax and Aframabal to follow the chace. Himself with the strength and body of that army, pursued all the cities the enemies that were within the feignory of the Carth. gymans, whom he partly forced by a small guard, partly taking them by surprise, and when he had once brought under his subjection (and that with speed) all the other States there bordering, then at once he would come to assault Carthage. Therefore they fell to repair and make up the breaches of their walls, and to fortifie them with strong bulwarks: and every man did his part to bring out of the country all kind of provision, against the time they should abide a long and tedious siege. Few words or none at all of peace, but much talk of sending Embassadors to call some Annibal. The greatest part were of mind & gave advice, to make out the armeado which was ready rigged, for to intercept the Romans victuals, and to imprisone and assualte the Romans fleet, riding before Viesa retchethly without fear, and disturbing nothing for peradventure they might also force the naval camp, left with a small guard for the defence thereof. And to this counsell the most inclin'd; yet they thought it good to send Embassadors to Annibal. For supposse that their navy should speed well, and have the happiest success that they could with, this only good would come thereof, that Viesa thereby might be in some fort saved of the firenit siege whereunto it was mov'd: as for the defence of Carthage it fell, they neither had any other Generals besides Annibal, nor army left but only his. Whereupon the next day after, the flaps were shot into the water, and set alight, and withall the Embassadors took theirs way towards Italy. All things were huddled up and done in halt; such was their fortune that pricked them forward, and gave them no further time. And look if any one man flacked his business ever so little; he was reputed to betray the whole state, and the safety of all.

Seipso now marching with an army, laden with the spoil and pillage of many Cities; feint the prisoners away, and all the prizes besides, unto the old camp before Prica, and wholly let upon the conquest of Carthage, he surprized Times, a City abandoned of her guard left for defence; intast from Carthage almost twelve miles. The place, both by mans hand was strongly fenced, and by nature fiercely leasted: and as it might be easily seen from Carthage, so it yielded a goodly prospect to Carthage, and also to the sea all about Carthage. From thence the Romans (as they were hard at work in fortifying themselves with a trench and rampier) discovered the enemies fleet, failing from Carthage towards Prica. Laying therefore their work aside, they founded the remove, and presently in all haste advanced their ensigns, to prevent that their own ships which stood close to the shore, went wholly to the siege, and nought fitted and furnished for a sea-light, might nor be surprized and boarded. For how possibly could ships heavily charged, carrying artillery, ordnance and engines of battery, be ever able to withstand an Armdo nimly appointed, rigged and trimmed for the purpose with all ship furniture meet for battell, and manned besides with armed fouldiers? How might our ships (I say) withstand the enemy, which either are converted to the use of merchant-ships of burden; or else in no uncertain to the walls, that they serve in stead of a platform and bank, or else of bridges to enter upon the City? Seipso therefore, after he was at further come, and had belotted his wars ships with brazen beaks behind in the rearward near to land, which (as the manner is in fight as sex) might guard and defend the retreat: opposed the Hulks and Caricks in a four-fold rank and course, in theft of a wall afront the enemy. And because that in the tumult of the light, those ranges might not be broken and disordered, he laid the masts and sail-yards over-croffe, reserving from ship to ship; and with strong cables he linked and famed them all in one together, and lid boards and planks over them, that men might passe every way from one ship to another. But under those very bridges, he left certain spaces between, from whence the light pinnaces and frigots might make out to charge and recharge the enemy, and retire themselves thither again in safety. Having thus in halt (according as the time would give him leave) set their matters in order; there were to the number almout of a thousand elect and choice fouldiers put aboard into those ships of burden, to make head in the forefront, & withstand the violence of the enemies. And furnished they were with offensive weapons: but mislive especialy to shoot and fling from them: and such force thereof had they gathered, as might serve for the assail upon them was never too long. Thus appointed and prepared, they waited the coming of the enemies. The Carthaginians, who if they had made good speed, might have surprized them unawares, and found all poll-mell and out of order whilsts they were troubled, frightened, and to seek what to do upon that sudden occurrence! fearing still as men out of heart and dismayed, and by so many foes by land, and thereupon designing themselves even at the sea also; where (no doubt) they were the better and more potently; and having trifled out all the live-long day, and failed but slowly; about the sun-fleet arrived in the haven, which the Africans call Rafeiness. And the next morning by fan-rising, they put forth into the open seas, and ranged their ships in order, as against a fet naval battell; supposing that the Romans would make out and receive them. When they had laid thus a long time, and perceived the enemies not to flit or once to fet forward, then at last they charged upon the foreward hulks and ships of burden. The service was nothing like a sea-fight, but resembling for all the world the ships that are to assist the walls of some Town. For the hulks were a good deal taller and flood aloft over the enemies. And the Carthaginians out of their war ships armed and breasted with brazen beaks let slip many a dart in vain, as lancing them from beneath faintly, against the higher places; whereas the shot from above out of the Caricks, was levelled with more strength and by reason of their own poifolight aloft with greater force. The light pinnaces for sipal, and the other small banks, which made fallies from under the bridges aforesaid, framed of planks upon masts and sail-yards, at the first were encountered, overcharged and hidden only with the violence and greatness of those war ships; but after wards they were some trouble to the defendants of their own side; for that being intermingled amongst the enemies ships, their own fellows were forced oftentimes to stay their hands, and neither shoot arrow, nor lance dart, for fear of missing their enemies, and lighting amongst their own part. At the last, the enemies from out of the Carthaginian ships, began to call out certain loggeters, with iron hooks at the end (which the fouldiers usually call Harpagones) [Grapples] for to take hold upon the Roman ships. Which when the Romans were not able to cut in funder, no more than the very chains where they hung, and whereby they were lilling, then ye might have seen (as any one of their enemies war-ships and galleys rowed back, and towed after it a Roman Carick hanging by the grapple end) the boards and ropes cut atander, by which it was tied and fastned unto others, or else another range and course of more ships together, to follow after the tail of the other. By this device especially were all the bridges torn and rent in pieces, and fearely had the defendants any time and space to tenter and passe into the second rank of ships behind. Thus there were about the Caricks of the Romans drawn away to Carthage, hanging at the poops of their galleys. Their gladness and rejoicing hereat was much greater than the thing itself came to, and the more the fame time, that Lelion and Mafaniifa were come within 15 diies into Numidia; the Maflylians rendered Mafaniifa the ancient reioin belonging to him by inheritance from his father, and received him with joy, as their King whom they had long time defired. Sy-phus seeing his captains and garrifions diftrecfed and displaced, kept himfelf within the ancient limits of his own Kingdom, but was not like to be long at ceft and quiet. For his wives father on the one fide, and his wife again on the other, fet him on, and pricked him forward continually to make arms againft the Romansand fo doted he on her in exceflive love, that needs he must yeld to her, there was no remedv. Besides, fo mighty he was in numbers of men and horse, that the puiffance of a Kingdom flourishing fo many years together, offering and prefenting it elf daily to the eje, had been enough to have made a Prince proud, that was not fo barbarous and un-civil as he, and had some better rule and mastery of his affections then himself had. When he had assembled together as many as were able for fervice, he furnished them with horses, and with armor, as well offensive as defensive. The Cavalry he forfed and divided into fmall troops and corntis, the infantry into the cohorts and fquadrons, according as he had learned long fince of the Roman eminations. And thus having failed an army, equal for number to the former, but flanding altogether in manner, of new and untrained foldiores, he put himfelf on his journey againft the enemies. And after he had encamped near unto them, at the beginning some few light horfemen advanced forward from the corps d' guard, in epiffal, fo near as they might with fafety, but being fet back from thence with arrows & javelins, they retired unto their companies. After this they began on both fides to make out one againft another, and to maintrain light skirmishes; and when of any part they had taken the field, they would again for anger return in greater number which is the wonted manner to kindle a battle between horfemen: for whiles the Winners hope flill of better, and the looper chafes for having the worfe, the company ever encreafeth on both fides. And thus now, after some few had cufjled and blown the coals, at length the whole armie of either part, came forth into the field eager of fight, and to strike a fett battel. So long as the horse lefive, the Maflylians were fo many, as there were hardly any dealing with them, Syphus sent them out in fuch great troops: but after that the Roman footmen once had (uddainly ented between the cornets of their horfemen, which gave way as they came, and had gotten more footing, and made head, and to frightened the enemy charging fofree upon the fupr as he did then, the Barbarians began to ride their horfes more eafily, and within a while gently to fland flill; and in the end, not only to give ground to the footmen, but also to retreat from the horfemen, who now were the more bold and hardly, being flanked with a guard of footmen.

And now by this time the standards of the legions advanced forward, and approac hed near hand. But when the Maflyli were fo far from receiving and enduring their first charge, that they might not abide the very fight too much, as of their enigns and armor, fo mightily wroght with them either the remembrance of former overthrows already paifed, or the present fear of imminent danger. Where Syphus, whiles he rode bravely in the face of the enemies troops and squadrons, if happily for very fane, or for the peril of his own peron, he might fay his men from running away, had his horfe under him fore wounded, and being call off his back to the earth, as over-preffed with the number, taken prisoner, and brought alive unto Lelion, for to referc unto Mafaniifa above all others a goodly fiew and joyfull light to behold. Now was Carthago the head

City of all the Kingdom of Syphus; and thither after the fight, betook themselves a mighty multitude of people. The laughter in this battel was lefts in proportion, then the victory, because the horfemen only mainained the confed. Not above five thoufand were flain, and not halve fo many taken prisoners. And when they had made an affalt upon the camp whither the frighted multitude after the lofe of their King, had retired, Mafaniifa came unto Lelion and laid, that for the prefent there could be nothing more pleasing and hononourable unto him, then upon his victory to visit and fee his fathers Kingdom, which he had recovered and won again after fo long a time. But as in adversity, to likewise in prosperitv (as he) tracht of time and delays are never good. In cafe therfore Lelion would permit him and his horfemen, together with conquered Syphus to go before unto the City Carthaga, he would forpipe them a fuddain, finding all out of frame and to seek by reason of this to fuddain and unexpected fear: and Lelion with his footmen might travel fair and foltly, and come after with cafe journeys. Lelion yielded hereunto. Whereupon, being gone afore unto Carthaga, he commanded the principal Citizens of Carthaga to be called forth unto a parle,

But all the whites that they were ignorant of the Kings unhappy fall, and as long as Mafaniifa uttered nothing of that which was hapned, he might not prevail either with threats or faire O words and persuafions untill he prefented the King before them a bound prisoner. Then atfo heavy an obiect and miferable fpectacle, they lift up a pitiful cry, and made great lamentation.

And partly for fear they abandoned the defence of the wall, and partly by a general content to court the Conqueror, and to feek for grace and favour at his hands, they let the gates open.

Then Mafaniifa, after he had bettowed about the gates, and in convenient places of the wall, certain strong guards, to keep that no man should fair and make an escape, he rode a gallop to the royal

A royal palace, for to be pochtefled of it. As he entered within the fore-gates thereof, even in the very entrance of the porch, Sophonisba the wife of Syphax, and daughter of Africbus the Carthaginian, met him on the way: and elping in the midst of the armed train, Masanis, full gorgeously dight, as well in his brave armor, as in other goodly array and ornaments, imagining him to be the King (as he was indeed) fell down prostrate at his feet, and spake in this wise: "True it is (quoth she) of Masanis, that the Gods above, together with your own vertue and fidelity have given you full power and puiflanee, to doe with us according to your pleasure: but if it be lawful for me a poor prisoner and captive woman, to open my mouth and make an humble speech unto my Lord, and in whose only hands lieth my life and death; if I may be so bold to touch your knees, and that victorious right hand of yours; I would befeech and pray you for the honour of the royal majesty of a Prince, wherein we all our selves were interested; in the love and name of the Numidian nation, which now is common to you and Syphax, by the domestical gods, protectors of this regall house and princely place, who vouchsafe to receive you into it as this present with better prelates and more fortunate tokens, then lately they sent Syphax out of it; to design me a lowly suppliant this favour, and grant me this petition, as to determine your will of me your captive whatsoever pleaise you & not to suffer me to fall into the proud hands and humble disposition of any Roman. If there were nothing else but this, that I was sometime wife and Queen to Syphax, yet would I rather trie the counteine and humanity of a Numidian, and one born in Africk as well as my self then of a stranger and alien. But what hard measure a Carthaginian lady, and the daughter of Africbus, may feare to a Roman mans hand, you see and know full well. Wherefore once again I requent and intreat your highness upon my knees, to regard my life: and if there be no way else to save and keep me from the will and appetite of the Romans, to put me to death on our hand. For beauty the departed and was incomparable; for years lofty, and in the very belt of her age. And therefore when as now she held him by the hand, and requented his protection and honourable word, only for this, that she might not be delivered and betrayed to a Roman, placing & letting her words to well, and couching them so cunningly, that they founded reason to speech for to win love, then prays to crave patience of this victorious Prince! he enclined presently not only to mercy and compassion, but also as all the kind of these Numidians are full of love, and have no stay of their wanton lust! A conqueror other wise though he were, yielded himself prisoner to the love of his captive:

And after he had given her this right hand for assurance to perform her requent, he went into the palace. This done, he began to call about with himself how he might make good his promise unto Sophonisba: but finding no means else to comparse and bring it about, he borrowed foolish, rath, and shameless counsel of blind love. He made no more ado, but commanded in all haste to prepare that very day for the solemnization and marriage with Sophonisba, because he would give neither Lusius, nor Syphax himself, any liberty at all to proceed against her as a prisoner, after the were once the wedded wife of Masanis. The wedding was no sooner done, but behold Lusius came, a guest unites for and nothing welcome; who for little dissembled how much he disliked the thing, that he was once about to have plucked her from the bride-bed, and sent her away even with Syphax and other prisoners to Scipio. But overcame with the earnest prayers of Masanis, who brought and imported him to refer the matter over to Scipio, for to arbitrate and decide unto whither of the two Kings Sophonisba should be awarded, for to mend their state, and better their fortune: he sent away Syphax alone with the rest of the prisoners, and by the help of Masanis, wan and recovered the other Cities in Numidia, which were held by the garrisons of the King. When news came into the camp that they were bringing Syphax thither, all the multitude went forth as it were to behold a triumph. Himself went bound before all the rest, and a number of Numidian noblemen and gentlemen followed after. Then every man to forth and amplifie this victorie, magnified what he could the greatness of King Syphax, and the glorious renown of the nation, in these terms: That he was the King, unto whose majesty the two most mighty and puifiant states of the world, to wit, the Romans and the Carthaginians attributed so much, that Scipio the General of the one, for to seek his annity, left the province of Spain and the army there, and with two Caravals or Gallies ruled with five banks of oars, sailed over into Africk; and Africbus the great commander of the Carthaginians, not only repaired himself in person unto him into his Kingdom, but also gave him his daughter in marriage: so as at one time he had in his power the two grand captains, of Carthaginians and Romans both. And like as both these nations killed sacrifices unto the immortal gods, and cried thereby their grace and favour, so of both parties at one time was his friendship bought for, and detined. And as for his power and puiftanee, it was to great, that he expelled Masanis out of his own Realm, and drove him unto this narrow point, that the least means he had to preserve his life, was either the running rumour of his death, in the lurking holes of the wild woods, wherein he was glad to live by rapine and health, after the guise of savage beafts. The King thus talked of in every mans mouth that liode about him, was brought at length into the Praetorium or Generals pavilion, and there presented unto Scipio. And Scipio verily was much moved in mind to consider the former State and fortune of the man, compared now with his present condition: and to remember withal and call to mind the hospital intertineint, the giving interchangeably of the right hand, and the covenant between them made both in publick and private. In these regards likewise Syphax took heart, and spake more frankly unto the conquerour. For when Scipio demanded of him
What he meant, and for what intent he not only renounced alliance with the Romans, but also began himself first to make war upon them: he made answer again and confounded, That he had indeed done amiss, and paid the fool. As for his taking arms against the people of Rome, that was not the beginning of his folly, but rather the very end of his frantick follies: for when he was, and never else but then, that he went besides himselfe and was bereft of his wits; then he abandoned out of his mind and clean forgot, as well private enmity by a hospitalitie entertainment, as all publick alliance by solemn covenants; when as he received into his house a Cardensinian lady for his wife: then his royal court and palace was set on fire & burned with those mutuall torches. That furious fiend it was (quoth he) and pestilent damne, that by all kind of pleasan alterings, and flattering enticements possest my mind, drew away and alienated my heart, and never relented the, until with her own hands the laid upon my body impious and ungodly armes against my ownse guelft and loving friend. And yet as desperatet and as wofull as my case is, so are my miseries and calamities, this one thing doth me good and enjoyeth my heart, that I see the fame pellissferous fury, that fiend of hell, and lim of the Devil, gotten into the house and family of him who is the most deadly and mortal enemey that I have in all world. Neither turely will Mafaniffa deman himselfe more wisely, soberely and constantly then Syphax: nay, considering his youthfull years, he will be apt to be mis-led by love, and more subiect to the temptations of a woman. Certainly in this action of expouing her, he hath showed more folly a great deal, and want of government. When he had uttered these words not only upon a spightfull hatred against anenemy, but also upon some new pricks of jealouie rising in his heart, seeing her whom he loved, in the possession of his concurrent, Seipio was driven into no small dumps, and with no well what to make of. And as he began to be ambigous of Mafaniffa for this marriage, fo, to speak a truth, the circumstances thereof hammered in his head, and made him conceive hardly of him; for feare that another day by the tuggestions of the same woman, he would play false, and trea-

It is not clear how the rest of the text relates to the previous content. It seems to be a collection of words and phrases out of context.

"Great care was now taken by the Romans to prevent a like defease; and the enemey was sufficiently apprized. While Livius continued to prosecute the war, the Romans continued to gain advantages and to extend their possessions."
A With fetching many deep sighs and sobs, so as he might only be overheard by them that flood about his tent, as the last he gave one grievous groan above the rest, and with that called for one of his truly grooms, who had under his hand the keeping (as the manner was of Kings and Princes) of a special poyson, against all doubtful chances that might happen. Which he commanded him to temper in a goblet of wine, and to carry it to Sophonisba, and withal to tell her thus much from him.

That Masania would have been most willing to perform his plighted oath and first promise, which an husband ought unto his wedded wife. But since the imperial powers, and those that were mightier than himself, had bereft him of that patience and liberty, he was ready and able yet to accomplish a second bequest, namely, that the should not come aside into the hands of the Romans: and therefore he advised her, that in remembrance of her rather noble warrior and Commander, of her native country, of two Kings to whom she had been married, she would provide for her self, and save her own honour. This credence and message, together with the poyson, the servant when he was come unto Sophonisba, delivered unto her. Whereat,

C he accept (quoth she) this marriage present, and welcome be it to me, if this be the best token that a husband could find to lend unto his wife. Yet thus much signifie unto him from me again, that better content I would have to die, if my marriage bed had not flood fo no more to my grave. She spake not the word foolishly, but she did the deed as resolutely for the took the cup in hand, and shewed no sign at all of fear, she roundely drank it off. When tidings hereof came unto Scipio, for fear lett the hot, humorous, and passionate young Prince, might do him self some mischief, he presently sent for him. One while he gave him good & comfortable words: another while he gently rebuked him, in that he would seeme to make amends for one folly with another, and to play a more cruel and tragical part then there was need. The next day after, to the end that he might withdraw his way from this present fit of troublesome fancies, he mounted up into his Tribunal seat, and assembled an audience. There first, he openly stiled Masania by the name of King, and honored him with fingular praises and commendations : which done, he gave him a golden crown, a fair cup like wife of gold, a chair of state and scepter, both of ivory, a rich long robe imbrodered of divers colours, and a coat wrought with needle work, representing the Date tree. These honourable presents wanted no words to set them out. For as (quoth he) there is nothing among the Romans more flately and magnifically than triumph, so that they ride in triumph, have no ornaments more rich and sumptuous then this, which the people of Rome esteem.

D With Masania only of all strangers and aliens to be worthy of. After this he gave Lelius also his due and deserved praises, and bello wed upon him coronet of gold. Other men likewise according to the service which they had done, were rewarded with lunny gifts. The King having these honours done unto him, was quieted and contented in mind, and conceived some allure, now that Syphax was displaced & rid out of the way; shortly to compass and enjoy the whole kingdom of Numidia. Then Scipio having sent C. Lelius with Syphax and other captives unto Rome, accompanied also with the Embassadors of Masania, returned himself with his power again to Africa. And there what fortifications and works he had begun afore, now he finished perfectly and brought to an end. The Carthaginians who were filled with a kind of joy that was not only short, but also in manner vain and foolish, grounded upon their late alsauf of the Armado, which (considering their present state) was pursuant enough; after they heard that Syphax was taken prisoner, in whom they had repose more hope (well nigh) then in Aemus and their own army, were mightily affrighted and daunted, and would give no more ear to any that perverted war, but lent as assorats to sue for peace, thirty of their principal ancients: and they amongst them were (as one would say) their very counsellor of state, and had the greatest power and authority to way and overrule the whole body of the Senat. Who being entered into the Roman camp and the General his lodging and pavilion, fell down prostrat (after the manner and guise as I take it, of the country * from whence they were first descended) like those that worship & adore the gods. And to this their humble reverence, their language was fubtile and correspondent; not excelling themselves and their fault, but transferring the beginning and occasion thereof, upon Aemus and his favourites about him, and ended him and bare him up in his fullfow pride and insolent ambition craving pardon for their City of Carthago, which twice already had been subversted and overthrown by the insconsiderat folly of her own citizens: yet once again you would gladly be saved and fland upright by the means and goodness of their enemies: for so much as they knew well, that the people of Rome fought not the letter extermination and destruction of whom they had vanquished by force of armes, but only the sovereigny and rule over them: promising falty and honour to them ready to serve in all loyalty, & to perform whatsoever it should please them to impose and lay upon them. Syphax made them this answer again, and said, that as he came into Africa upon hope to return home with conquest and not with peace, so that hope of his by the prospect GTeens and happy success of his w is iniberto, was much bettered and augmented. Howbeit although he aspired himself of the absolute victory, as if he had it fast enough in his hand, yet a good accord he would not refuse: that all nations of the world might know, that the people of Rome can both begin wars rightfully, and also end the same as justly. My will therefore (quoth he) and pleasure is, that the conditions of peace shall be thefe. Inprimis, that the Carthaginians shall restore and deliver back all the prisoners that they have taken in the wars: with all the tegenates and fugitives that have fled to their side from us. Item, that they remove their forces forces out of Italy and France. Item, that they bear to meddle in Spain. Item, that they abandon and quit all the hands between Italy and Africa. Item, to yeeld up all their ships of war taving only twenty. Item, that they deliver unto the Romans, of wheast 500000 Modii, and of barley 300000. [Now what was the sum of money that he required or demanded of them, it is not certainly agreed upon. In some writers I find 5000 talents in others, five thousand pound weight only of silver: and there be that have set down, that they laid upon them a double pay of all the talliers.] Upon these conditions (faith he) whether ye will like of peace or no, ye shall have three days repit and liberty to consult and confer. If you will accept them in these terms, make a truce with me for the present, and lend your Embassadors unto Rome to the Senat there. Thus the Carthaginians, when they had agreed together, and concluded to refuse no articles and conditions of peace whatsoever, were dismisst. But in truth they fought for nothing else but delays and tract of time until Annibal was failed over into Africa. So they addressed certain Embassadors unto Scipio to enter a truce; others they dispatched to Rome to treat for a peace: who brought them with them some few captives, repatriates and fugitives, to the end they might obtain their fute more easily. But Lelius with Siphax and other captives (the principal nobles and gentlement of the Numidians) was many days before arrived at Rome, and had declared unto the LL. of the Senat all things in order as touching their good speed and success in Africa, to the great contentment and joy of all men for the present, and with exceeding hope for the hope to come. Then the LL. after consullation had, gave order that the King should be lent to Alba, there to lie in ward and safe custody, and that Lelius should be kept still at Rome, until the Carthaginian Embassadors came. A solemn procession for four days was decreed. And P. Aelius the Pretor, after he had dismisst the Senat, called presently an assembly of the people, and together with C. Lelius went into the Rostra for pulpit orations. Where the people hearing that the Carthaginian army was defeated, that the King of great name and renown was overcome and taken prisoner; that all Numidia was overrun from one end to the other with a noble and singular conquest; they could no longer contain their joy in silence, but in thouns and acclamations and other tokens (full full in the assembly of a multitude) express and signify their exceeding gladness and contentment of heart. Whereupon the Pretor immediately made proclamation, that the Church-wardens and sextons should set open all the holy temples and chapells throughout the City, and give the people liberty and leave all the day long, devoutly to go about the gods, reverently to salute them, and heartily to render thanksgiving for this achieved victory.

The next day following, he admitted the Embassadors of Masami, into the Senat house, and gave them audience. Who first and foremost rejoiced in the behalf of the Senat, for the prosperous and happy successe of P. Scipio in Africa: than they gave thanks, that he not only had entitled Masami their lord and master by the bare name of King, but also invested him a King in-deep by restoring him to his fathers Kingdome. Wherein if please the LL. of the Senat, he might reign, now that Siphax was removed and gone, without fear and trouble at all. Also for that he solemnly in the open assemby praised him in most honourable terms, and adorned him richly with right lately and precious gifts. For to deterve which favors and honors done unto him, as he had indescouraged already, so would be henceforth not fail to do his best. Then they made a petition that the Senat would confirm and ratifie by their act and decree, his royal hyle and title of a King, with other benefits and favours received of Scipio. And this moreover particularly Masami would requellt (if he might be so bold, and that it flood with the pleasure of the Senat) that they would enlargse and set at liberty all the Numidians captives that lay in prison in Rome: for this would be a thing whereby he should acquire much honour and reputation, and gain great love and favour amongst his people and countreymen at home. To these points the Embassadors received this answer. Concerning the prosperous affairs of the wars in Africa, they liked well, and confirmed his act in giving Masami the name of King: and therein he had done well and jutty and according to good reason. And whatsoever he had paased elle to the honour of Masami, the LL approved and commended the same. Then they decreed certain presents that the Embassadors should carry unto the King: to wit, two purple voidlers cafcocks, each of them with a clasp of gold; and as many rich coates emboraded and belted with purple. Also two couriers barbed and trapped, with their rich esparrions: two complete armors for horse, with their cuirases: likewise pavilions, with all their military furniture, in as full and ample manner as a Consul is allowed. These presents (I say) had the Pretor direction to lend unto the King. As for the Em-assadors themselves, there was beftowed upon them no less then 5000 Asces a piece; and upon their followers in the train, each of them 3000 Asces. Also a double suit of apparel for either of the Embassadors, and one single suit to every one throughout their train; as also to those Numid-ians, who being set at large out of prizon, were to be delivered again to the King. Over and beside, there was appointed for the Embassadors, lodging of free-coft; gardenage and walking places of pleasure; allowance for their table, and all provision elle whatsoever, at the Cities expenses.

In that summer when these decrees past at Rome, and those affairs were achieved in Af-crica, P. Quinctius Flamin Pector, and M. Cornelius Vice-consul, fought a great battell with Magi the Carthaginian, in the territory of the Infulrians, within the province of France. In the vanguard

vanguard were placed the legions of the Pretor. Cornelius kept the legions in the rearward, and himself in person rode to the standards in the forefront. And before both wings, the Pretor and Vice-conull encouraged all that ever they could, the fouldiers for to advance the enigens, and give a charge upon the enemy. But seeing he could not prevail nor do any good, therfore Quinius to Cornelius: you see how the light lakeneth and waxeth cooler, and the enemies that were timorous, are hardned and heartned by this resisstance beyond their hope and expectation; yes, and it is to be feared, that they will turn to be hard alo, and make head against us. We must needs raise up a storm of Cavalry, if we would disorder them, and put them out of array. And therefore either do main ain fight either in the front, whiles I bring the men of arms into the battell, or else will I fight here in the vanguard, whiles you send out the horsemens of four legions upon the enemies. And when the Vice-conull was willing to accept of whether service the Pretor would, then Quinius the Pretor, with his son aforesaid Marcus, a luty young gallant, went to the horsemens, commanded them to mount on horseback, and suddenly all at once lent them against the enemy. The tumult and noisewith which the horsemens made was awered & redoubled by the shout that the footmen put up. And verily the enemies battell had not been able to have kept their ground, but that Mago at the first thiring of the Cavalry, made out the Elephants forth with into the battell, whom he had in readiness for such purpole. At the uncoch braying, the strong smell, and biverse light of which beats, the horses were frighted: and so the aid of horse-fight proved vain. And as the Roman Cavalry interlaced among the Infantry was more strong and to cible, where they had the ache both of lance point alouf, and of swords edge close at hand: to when they were transported and carried far off with their panting and fearfull horses, the Numidians horsemens had the more room to shoot their darts against them with better advantage. Besides this disorder, the twelfth legion of footmen (wherof a great part was beaten down and slain, more for thane then upon any strenght and value, kept their place still; but never had been able to have held out any longer, but that the thirteenth legion drawn forth of the rearward into the vanguard, reinforced the battell that was in hazard and lay a bleeding: and Mago withall for his part, came in with the Frenchmen out of the rearward, and opposed them against this fresh legion: but when they were once discemted and put back (which required no great nor long fight) the Hatti or Javeliniers of the eleventh legion gathered round together and charged upon the Elephants, which now also began to break the ranks of the footmen. But when they had lanced their Javelins against them, standing thick together in multitudes (and lightly there was not one of them bit amisse but did his errand) they forced them all to turn back upon their own battell: so four of them were sore wounded and fell down dead. Then the vanguard of the enemies began somewhat to give ground; and withall, the whole strenght of the Roman footmen seeing the Elephants turn rail, came forward at once for to encreast the disordered tumult, and put them in greater fear. But lo long as Mago stood stoutly to it, and standing in the forefront of the enigens, the ranks and files as they went back softly, and retired by little and little, still maintaing fight as before in good order: but after that they saw him shot through the thigh and fallen, and therewith carried him out the battell for dead, incontinently they were all defeated and put to flight. There were slain of enemies about five thousand, and of military enigns eighteen won and carried away. The Romans likewise bought not this victory without loffe of blood. For of the Pretors army were left two thousand and three hundred, and the greater part of them by far were of the welth legion. Whereof two Tribunes Military or Colonels also left their lives, M. Cestus and M. Mamia. Likewise of the thirteenth legion, which came last to the conflict, Ca. Helvius Colonell, in reining the fight was slain, and eighteen men of arms besides, most brave and excellent horsemens, with Centurions who were by the Elephants troden down, trampled under foot, and to perished. And no doubt the battell had continued longer, but that by occasion of the General his hurt, the victory was given away and yeilded Mago in the dead time of the next night dislodged and departed; and stretching out his journey so far as possible for his wound he might, he marched away until they came to the sea side, unto the Ingains in Liguria: where the Embassadors sent from Carthage (who a few daies before were arrived in the French galle) were paired unto him, commanding him with all speed possible to fall unto Africa, for as much as his brother Asandra likewise (unto whom also there were Embassadors gone with the like message and commission) would do the same. For the State of Carthage now was not in case, nor upon terms to defend and keep in obedience by force of arms France and Italy, but to ease home, Mago not only moved with the commandement of the Senat, and the danger of his countrye, but fearing also left the enemy following the train of his victory, would preuie and set upon him, if he made long lay: and doubting left the Ligurians likewise, seeing Italy abandoned by the Carthaginians, would revolt and turn unto tholo, under whose obedience they were like shortly to be reduced: albeit he had no hope that his hurt should have lefe taking at sea by faling, then on land by travelling, or to find things there more handseme and ready for the cure, embarked his army and departed. But before he was well gotten beyond the point and, lands end of Sardinia, he died of his wound before said. Certain ships also of the Carthaginians, being fastened a-funder in the deep sea, were by the Roman Armado, that kept about the coast of Sardinia surprized and boarded. There were the Acts performed both by sea and land, on the side of Italy which lieth along the Alpi.
The thirtieth Book of T. Livius

Ch. Servilius the Consul having performed no worthy and memorable exploit, either in his province Hetruria, or in France(for thither he went alo in the end) but only that he redeemed his father Ch. Servilius and his uncle C. Lucullus, from servitude and bondage, now sixteen years after they had been taken prisoners by the Boii before the village Tantum, returned to Rome, with his father going on the one side, and his uncle on the other: a man famous rather for his private deeds, then renowned for any publick and honourable act worthy of remembrance. And a bill was preferred unto the people, that it should not be imputed for a treachery unto C. Servilius, that while his own father (who had fitten upon the ivory chair of elate) was living (and that unknown to him) he had been both Tribune and Adile alo of the Commons against the laws in that behalf provided. This act being passed and granted, he returned again into his province. Unto Cn. Servilius the Consul who was in the Britanian country, there revolved Confinia, Ufugum, Verge, Bediat, Hetrucolum, Sphauum, Argentumus, Dampetia, and many other pieces of small accompl, upon occasion that they saw the Carthaginians war to wax cold and feeble. The same Consul fought a battell with Annibal in the territory of Corcon: the manner of which fight is darkly and obscurely reported. For Valerius Ancius faith, there were slain five thousand of the enemies: a thing of such consequence, that either it was meer impudence to forge it, or great negligence to overflit it. But the truth is, from that time forward nothing was done by Annibal in Italy, for to him alo there came from Carthage Embassadors to call him home into Africa, even about the same time that the others did unto Magus. And as it is reported of him, all the whiles that he gave audience to the Embassadors, he gnashed and grinned his teeth, he kept a fighing and groaning, yes, and hardly could forbear to flied tears. After they bad delivered their Meffage according to their commission, Yes, many, qud he, now they go no more about the bu fh with me by covert means and under-hand to send for me home, but openly are seen in the action: who all this while in offering no supplies either of men or money to be transported over unto me, fought to draw and hate me from hence. Well then, It is not the people of Rome to often by me defeated and put to flight, that hath by armes overcome Annibal, but it is the Senate of Carthage, with their backbiting and malicious envy. Neither will P. Scipio rejoice so much, and beare himself proud upon this disgrace of my return, as Hanno will: who with the ruine and subversion of Carthage, hath overthrown our house and family, when by no other means he could effect it. Now Annibal whole mind tore-gave him that such a thing would fall out, had prepared shipping store-hand. And therefore after he had sent away the multitude of fouldiers that were of small or no service, into the towns of the Britanian country, under a colour and thew of garrisons for defence, which towns were but few, and the same rather held in by awe and fear, then abiding in obedience for love and loyalty, he took with him the whole strength and flour of his armes, and croffed over into Africa. But before he went to sea, many of the Italian nation, who refusing to follow him into Africa, had taken for sanctuary the chappell of Isus Lacustris, which never to that day had been violated and broken; notwithstanding the liberty of the place, he cruelly massacred in the very temple. Seldom by report had ever any man been known to leave his native foile and country, and depart into exile with more heavy heart, then Annibal did when he went out of his enemies land. Oftentimes he looked back to the coastes of Italy, blaming both God and man, yes, cursing himself and his owne life, for that he led not straightwaies upon his fresh victory at Cannae, his fouldiers embraced as they were with blood directly even to Rome. Scipio (quoth he) had the heart to go to Carthage, when he was Consul, had never seen in Italy the Carthaginian enemie: and myself, having lain at Thrasympous and Cannae ten thousand armed men, have fitten still about Carthinum, Comes, and Nola, wearing and decaying in strength every day more then other. In this manner he blamed himself, and complained of his hard hap and cuttied fortune: and so he was pulled out of the possession of Italy that he held so long.

News came to Rome about one and the same time, that both Magus and Annibal were departed and onward on their journey: The joy of which twofold gratulation was the leffe in two regards, both for that their own captains seemed to have either little courage or small force to stay them behind, and imphech them for going, considering they had express order from the Senat to do, as also because they at Rome were penive and doubtfull, what would be the issue and end of all, seeing the whole weight of the war to bear and rest upon the shoulders of one only Captain and army.

And much about this time came the Saguntines Embassadors, bringing with them certain Carthaginians prisoners, who were taken with fums of money upon them, and had failed into Spain for to levy and wage men for aid. The mony they laid down in the very port-bull or entrance of the Senat-house, amounting to 250 pound weight of gold, and 800 pound weight of silver. The men they receivd and clapt them up fait in prison, the silver and gold both, they delivered again to the Embassadors, with many thanks, over and besides they gave them rewards and ships to return again into Spain. Then the grave and ancient Senators began to reason and discourse in this wise: That men naturally have leffe fende of good things then of bad: and feel not to foon their own weak as their wre. We remember say they, what fear, what fright and terror we were put in, when Annibal passed over into Italy. Lord, what losses, what lamentable misfortunes hapned thereupon! The enemies camp was discovered and seen from the walls of the City; what vowings, what praying was there then, both of all and some! How often in assemblies and counsels were men seen to stretch out their hands to heaven, & to utter these words & cry aloud; When A When will that day come? and will it never be, that we shall see Italy again clear of enemies, obtain peace, and flourish once more, enjoying happy peace? Now that length, even at 16 years, and not before, the gods have vouchsafed us this blessing; and no man finds a word, nor maketh a motion of thanksgiving to their divine majesty therefore. And truly, if men know not how to accept with joy and thankfulness a benefit when it first cometh, they will be far short, and will much more to remember the same when once it is past. Hereupon they cried out and called aloud with one voice from all parts of the Senate-honour to P. Attius the Pretor, for to propose the matter to the court there assembled and a decree was granted, that for five days there should be solemn proclamations and supplications in every church and chappell before the shrines of the gods and godesses and greater benefits killed for sacrefce to the number of 100.

B Now when Attius and the Embassadors of M. Scipio had their dispatch and were dismissed, tidings were brought of the Carthaginian Embassadors coming to the Senat to sue for peace, were seen at Patrols, and thence from thence they would travel by land unto Rome. Whereupon it was thought good unto the Senat, that Attius should be tenter again and called back, that the might be present, and at the hearing of the treating of peace. Q. Fulvius Gillo a Lieutenant of Scipio had the conducting of the Carthaginian Embassadors to Rome: who being forbidden to set foot within the City, were lodged without the in great ball named Villa Publica, and had audience given them of the Senat, assembled in the temple of Bellona. Who made in manner the very same speech that they had before unto Scipio, clearing the whole State and their publick counsell, and laying all the truth and blame upon Annibal for making war: laying, that he had no warrant, commission, and commandment from the Senat to pass over the Alps, nor to much as over Iterum, and that of his own head he took arms; and warred not upon the Romans only, but also upon the Sagginius. In consideration whereof, he that would esteem all things aright, and weigh the truth indeed, must needs judge, that for any thing done by the Senat and people of Carthage, the ancient league made with the people of Rome, hath continued to this day found and entire. And foregoing the had they in commiission to sue for, and request, but that they might maintain and remain full in that accord & league which was last concluded and contracted with Latinati the Continent. Now when the Pretor, according to an ancient custom of their forefathers, had given liberty to whomsoever that would for to put interrogatories unto the Embassadors; and the elder ones, such as had been present at the making of the capitulations and covenants concerning the said peace, and demanded of them, some one thing, and some another; and the Embassadors answered again, that by occasion of their young age (for they were all in manner but young men,) they remembered nothing: the whole court from all parts thereof cried out and said, that this was but a fraudulent and treacherous Carthaginian trick, to chuse and lend such for to sue for the old peace which they themselves could not not remember. And when the Embassadors were voided out of the Senat house, and the opinions of the LL demanded, M. Livius was of this mind, that Qu. Servilius the Consul, who was the new of the twain, should be sent for, that the treaty of peace might in his presence be concluded upon. For since that there could not lightly a weightier matter then it was, come afore to be determined of, he thought it good not with the honor and reputation of the people of Rome, that such a matter should be debated of without the pergonal presence of both, or at the least wife one of the Consuls. Qu. Metellus (who three years before had been Consul and Dictator) spake to the cause in this manner. For as much as P. Scipio by defeating and putting to the sword whole armies, by wounding and spoiling the territories of the enemies, had driven them to this exigent, that in humble fort they came to crave peace: and considering that no man living was better able to judge with what mind and intent they feared for this peace then himself, who warred ever before the gates of Carthage; therefore no man's advice was to be heard, but only his, either to accept of the said peace in quillet, or to reject it. M. Valerius Lestius, who had been twice Consul, agreed, that they were spies and not Embassadors, who now were come; and that it were a good deed to command them to avant, and be packing out of the confines of Italy; & to lend with them certain men of purpose to guard them to their lands; & yes, & to write unto Scipio to go forward with his wars & not to slack one jot. Lutias & Fulvius added moreover and laid, that Scipio laid this especially for his ground, to hope there might be peace, in case Annibal and Mago were not called out of Italy: As for the Carthagians, they would make remissant of any thing whatsoever, so long as they expected those leaders and their armies; but afterwards without remembrance of covenants, were they never to fetch and new, yes, and without respect of all the gods, they would (no doubt) maintain and continue the wars. In these regards they entreated the rather to Lestius, and approved his opinion. So the Embassadors were sent away without any peace obtained, or certain answer returned unto them.

Much about that time, Qu. Servilius the Consul, who made full reckoning that he should have the honour of bringing Italy into quietness made purport after Annibal, as if he had been curcurled & driven out by him; and felt failure over into Sicily, and then into Africa. Which being commonly noise, and burnt and dead at Rome, at the first the LL of the Senat thought good, that the Pretor should write unto the Consuls to this effect, that the Senat judged it meet and right for him to return into Italy. But afterwards upon the Pretor's his words, saying that the Consul would set on by his letters, P. Sulpius wrote of purport Dictator, who by virtue of that more sovereign rule and authority, called the Consul precipitously home into Italy. And the Then, he together with M. Servilius the General of the horse, spent in large expenses and visiting the Cities of Italy which in time of war had shrank off their allegiance, and in taking due knowledge of all their states and reasons severally.

During the time of the truce, there set forth all out of Sardinia from Lentulus the Pretor, an hundred galleys laden with victuals, together with a convoy and guard of twenty galleys of war, and sailed over into Africa safe, both from the danger of the enemy, and also from the peril of tempest by sea. But Cn. Oblavius as he was in his voyage from Sicily, with a fleet of two hundred galleys and thirty strong galleys, had not the like good success. For as he sailed (well near) within the kenning of Africa, first he was calmed; then the wind turning south, troubled and disordered his ships, and, first entered them over the sea one from another. Himself with his galleys of war, brought against the wind and the current, and with excessive toil and labour of the oarsmen, I doubled the point of the Cape of Apollo & there in the bay rode at anchor; but the galleys for the most part fell with the land, Eginorum (which shubber upon the foreland, and being in the very mouth of that creek from the sea wherein Carthage standeth) at least ten leagues from the City; and some were driven by wind to a place called the Hotawaters, over against the City. All this helped within the fight of Carthage. And therefore out of all parts of the City, was great turning to the market-place. The magistrates assembled the Senate; the people at the entry and porch of the Council house, called upon the Senators and cried out, that they should not let slip to great a booty out of their cities and hands. Some alleged against them, the fidelity of treating of peace; others also objected the faithful promise of truce (the term thereof was not yet expired.) But at last, when both Senates and people were intermingled all in manner together, agreed it was by a general consent, that Afrubal with a fleet of fifty galleys should sail over to Eginorum; and so from thence rally and gather together the Roman ships dispersed along the coasts and the havens. And the galleys (abandoned of their mariners that were fled, first from the land Eginorum, and afterwards from the Hotawaters) was taken and towed as it were at the tails of their own ships to Carthage. As yet the Emissaries were not returned from Rome, neither knew they what the resolution of the Roman Senate was concerning war or peace, nor the day of the truce determined. Scipio asking the wrong and indignity to be more hainous, in that the hope of peace and the assurance of truce should be violat by them first, who fought both for the one and the other; presently dispatched an embassage to Carthage M. Bebitus, L. Servilius, and L. Fabius, who being by the concourse and running together of the people, near to a third turn and midnight; and foreseeing their return like to be a dangerous, created of the magistrates (who saved them from violence) to send certain ships to waste them. So they were allowed two galleys called Triremes, which having conducted them until they were arrived at the river Bagrada, where they were within right of the Roman camp, returned back again to Carthage. Now the Carthaginian Armado lay in the road before Vito. From thence there made out three galleys of four ranks of oars; whether it were upon some secret direction from Carthage so to do, or that Afrubal the Admiral of the fleet, upon his own head adventured to foul an action (the date having no hand therein, and therefore not to be blamed) and employing the Roman Galley of five banks of oars past the point of the cape, suddenly assailed her from the main sea. But neither could they invest and strike her with their best heads, making to good way, and shifting to well by reason of her swiftness; neither could the armed galleys out of their lower vessels board her being so tall a ship over them. And right valiantly the defended her self as long as shot lasted; which when it once failed, and she had no other means to help herself but only the nearness of the land and number of galleys who from the camp were run to the shore, with the loss only of the ship all the passengers escaped safe to land.

Thus the truce being double broken with one wickedness coming in the neck of another, Lentulus and Fulvius came in the very nick from Rome, together with the Carthaginian Emissaries: unto whom Scipio, having given his word, that though the Carthaginians had not only broken the faith and assurance given of the truce, but also the law of arms, in abusing and evil treating the persons of the Emissaries, yet himself would do nothing to them unworthy either the order of N people of Rome, or uniting his own manner and countem, dismiss all the Emissaries, and made preparation for war.

When Afrubal now approached the land of Africa, one of the mariners was commanded to climb up to the top of the mast to discover the coast, and to see what part they were directed to, and when he made answer and said, that the prow made head upon a place called, the Rima fasciolorum; he disliked the men and preface of that place, and commanded the pilot to pause by, and leave it; and to put his ship within the bay of Leptis, and there set his army a shore. And there were the affairs of Africa for that year. The acts ensuing, reach to that year, wherein M. Servilius Geminus, who then was General of the horse, and Claudius Nero were made Consuls. But in the end of that former year, when the Emissaries of the confederat Cities of Greece made complaints, that their territories were wasted by the Kings garrisons: and when they sent their Emissaries into Macedonia, for to demand satisfaction and restitution, they could not be admitted unto the King, nor have audience: and moreover, they gave intelligence, that there were one thousand armed galleys transported over into Spain, under the conduct of Sepeut to aid the Carthaginians: and certain annates of money likewise sent with them; the Senate gave order that Emissaries should be addressed unto the King; to give him to understand, the
A that the L,L, of the Senat took all this to be done against the tenure and form of the league. So there were sent C. Terentius Varro, Cn. Maelius, and M. Aurelius, and three galliés of five course of oars they allowed.

This was a year of special note, for a great fire—fire, whereby the publick cliff was burnt to ashes down to the ground: also for much abundance of rain and many floods, and exceeding cheapness of victual. For besides that all Italy was open by reason of a general peace throughout, M. Valerius Falco, and M. Fabius Butco, Ediles of the chair-divided the great torce of corn that was lent out of Spain, among the people, freed by fire, and left the price at "font Ales the M. Valerius Falco, the same year Q. Fabius Maximus departed this life, a man of great years and exceeding old, if that be true which some writers report, that he was Augur 42 years. But certain it is that he was a man worthy of so great and honourable a surname, yea, and if it had begun first in himself. He surpassed the dignities of his father, he was equal in honor to his grand-father: Rutilius his grand-father. I must needs say, had more titles of victories, and of greater battles: but the enemy of his, Annibald, may counter-visit them all, as many as they were. Howbeit, this man was counted more wary and advised, than hardy and forward: and as a man may well doubt whether by natural disposition he loved to take leisure in all his actions, or that it was a policy of his agreeable to the wars properly then in hand: so verily nothing is more certain than this, that as the Poet Eumenes faith:

This only man by wise delay, Refus'd our base folly to decay.

C His son Q. Fabius Maximus was invested or installed Augur in his place, and for Bishop in his room (for two ascendental dignities he had) Ser. Sulpicius Galba was chosen. The Roman pluies were exhibited in one day, and the Plebeian Games thrice wholly remued by the Ediles M. Sentius Sabinius, and Cn. Servius Flaccus. They both, were made Pretors; and with them C. Livius Senarius, and C. Aurelius Cotta. The solemn election of the Magistrates for that year, whether Cn. Servilinus the Conull held, or (because of important business in Tiferny, about the examinations of the confiscates there of certain great men, by commissiön from the Senat, which might keep him there) P. Sulpicius the Dictator by him nominated: it is uncertain, by reason of the variety and difference of writers in that behalf.

In the beginning of the yeare next following, M. Servilinus and T. Claudius, after they had assembled the Senat in the Capitol, moved concerning the Provinces. And for as much as both of them desired Affric, they were willing the Affric and Italy, should be put to the choice of a Lottery. But by the especiall travall of Q. Metellus, the Province of Affric was neither granted nor denied to either of them. And the Conuls were commanded to deal with the Tribuns of the Commons, that if they thought it good, they would prefer a bill unto the people, to know whom they would have to war in Affric. So all the tribes in general gave their voices with P. Scipio. Nevertheless, the Conuls (for to the Senat he had decreed before) call lots for the Province of Affric. Thus Affric betell unto T. Claudius, namely, that he should fall over therwith an armado of fifty ships, all gallies of five ranks of oars, and be joyned in equal commiisión with Scipio. And M. Servilinus had Hibernia allotted unto him. In the same Province Cn. Servilinus also was to continue in government, in sill he pleaed the Senat to lay the Conull in the City. Of Pretors, M. Servilinus by lot had the rule of Gaulis, with order: that P. Quintinius Verulam should make over unto him the Province and two legions. And C. Livius took the charge of the Britis with the two legions, which the year before were commanded by P. Sempronius the Vice-Consul. Cn. Servilinus was appointed to govern Sicily, and to receive of P. Villius Tappulus the Pretor of the former year, that the Province and two legions. And ordered it was, that Villius as Proprétor, should keep in obedience and defend the coast of Sicily with twenty ships of war, and a thousand soldiers; and that from thence M. Pomponius should in the twenty ships behind embark one thousand and five hundred loundiers; and transport them over to Rome. Unto C. Aurelius Cotta was the civil jurisdiction of the City alligned. All the rest continued still in their government, and had their commiéeions newly signed, according as they had either provinces or armies under their hand. And with fifteen legions and no more, was the State of Rome that year maintained. Now to the end they might begin all enterprizes in the name of the Gods and proceed therein with their grace and favour, order was given, that the Conuls before they went out to war, should set forth those games and pluies, and sacrifice those greater bealls which M. Claudius Marcellus, and T. Quintinius were Conuls, promisè by solemn vow, in case the Common-wealth continued for five years following, in the same good estate as then it was. So the games were exhibited in the great Circue of shew-place four days together, and the sacrifices plainly accordingly, as they were vowed to the Gods.

But all this while, as mens hope to their fear also increated daily more and more, whiles they could not certainly resolve with themselves, whether they had more cause to rejoice, that Anni-bald after sixteen years had abandoned Italy, and left the pollution thereof out of the people of Rome; or to be afraid, for that he had passed over into Affric with the safety of his army. For why? the place was only changed, and the danger all one. And surely Q. Fabius late deceased, no vain Prophet of so great a peril and hazard, was wont to foretell, and this was over his long. That Anni-bald would be a more dangerous enemy at home in his own country, than he had been abroad in a forrein Land. And Scipio shoul'd find, that he had to deal neither with

* Three pamphlets.

English,
"Syphax (King of a rude, untaught, and barbarous country, who was wont to lead armies of tall stature, grooves, and little better than water-bearers and camp-slaves to keep one place, and not remove) nor with Aemilius his father in law, a Captain of all others most light of foot, and readiest to run away, nor yet with cumulatious armies taken up in halt and raised indiately, constituting of a rabble of rutulous cloaths and peafants armed by the hals; but with Aemilius, born in manner within the camp, yea, and in the royal pavilion of his father; a most valiant Captain, bred and brought up amongst aged men; who long ago was no sooner a child, but he was a fouldier, and before he came to the prime and flower of youth, became a General; who growing to be old in a continual course and train of victories, hath filled Spain and France from the one side to the other and Italy from the Alps to the narrow seas, with the marks and memorable monuments of worthy and noble exploits; and leadeth still an army of as long standing and continuance in warfare as himself, harden'd and beare to endure all those things which hardly one would believe, men could abide and suffer, embroiled and bathed a thousand times in the blood of Romans, and carrying with him the spoils not of common fouldiers only, but also of most brave Romans themselves, Scipio should be sure to encounter and meet in battall those who with their own hands had slain Preitors, and killed Consuls of Rome; all bedight and goodly to be seen in mural and vallare coronets, for their good service in falling of walls, and mounting over rampes, those I say who at their pleasure have ranged through the won camps and forced Cities of the Romans. Neither at this day have the Magistrates of the people of Rome so many bundels of rods, with axes born before them, as Аemilius hath taken from the Roman Generals whom he hath slain, & can if he list shew and carry before him, Caffing and toffeing these doubts and fears in their minds, they themselves encreased their own care, and doubled their dread in this point also, that whereas they were wont for certain years to make war in fight of home, in divers and sundry places of Italy, with a lingering kind of hope, without regarding any issue thereof like pretently to ennue now Scipio and Aemilius. Captains matched together (as one would say) to make a final end & tryal of all, had set all mens minds awoke to expect the event now or never. And even they also who had repented exceeding confidence, and grounded no small hope of victory in Scipio, the more their spirits were amoured upon it, and desirous to see a speedy effect, the greater was their care and doubt of the sequel. The Carthaginians for all the world were likewise affected and disquieted in mind. One whiles, beholding Aemilius, and considering his noble and worthy acts, they repented that they were for peace. Another while again, when they looked back and remembered, how twice in, they had been defeated in battall, Syphax slain themselves driven out of Spain, chased and hunted out of Italy, and all this by the valor and policy of one man Scipio; they trembled for fear of him, as if he were the fscal Captain born for their ruin and utter destruction.

Now by this time was Aemilius come as far as Africamentum; from whence, after he had bestowed some few days in refreshing his dea-tick fouldiers, he was routed with fearful posts that brought news, how all about Carthage was full of enemies and hostility; whereupon he made long journeys till he came to Zama. This Zama is a Town distant from Carthage five days journey. From thence he sent out epials, who being taken by the Roman warders, were brought before Scipio, and he causeth them to be delivered unto the Tribuns or Marshalls, with commandment that they should be led throughout the camp: and suffered without all lost, to see whatsoever they desired. And when he had asked of them whether they had perused and considered everything to their content, and enough to serve their turn; he sent them back again to Aemilius, with a safe conduct to accompany them. Aemilius took no pleasure at all in hearing of any thing that they reported: for (among other particulars) they brought news that Masinissa was charged that very day to come thither with six thousand foot and four thousand horse. But most of all, he was troubled and cast down with the reluciant confidence and assurance of the enemy; which no doubt (he thought) arode not of nothing. And therefore albeit himself was the only cause of that war, and by his arrival had disturbed the truce concluded, and the hope of peaceable covenants: yet supposing, that a more indifferent accord might be obtained, in case he fixed therefore while he was entire and unfore, rather than after he were vanquished and overcome; he addrest a messenger or purfivant unto Scipio, requesting that he might confer and commune with him. Whether he did this of his own accord, or by direction from the publick Council of the State, I have no reason to set down or avouch for certain, either the one or the other. Valerius Antias writeth, That he was by Scipio defeated in the first battle, wherein were slain in field 1 2000 armed men, and 1700 taken prisoners, whereupon himself in person came as Embassador, with other ten Orators into the camp unto Scipio. But howsoever it was, Scipio refused not to embrace; and so both Generals of purpose advanced forward and approached with their camps, to the end they might be nearer one to the other when they should meet in conference. Scipio made choice of a plot of ground not far from the City Nadagosa: which as it was handesome and meet in other respects, so especially in this, that it had a watering place within an arrow shot. Aemilius took an hill four miles from thence, secure enough and commodious otherwise, but only that they were far from water. In the mid way between they chose a plain, open on every side, where they might discern and see all about them, that no ambuscus there were laid: and after they had caused their armed fouldiers to retire a like distance from either party, then came together with one touch-man or interpreter apeece, not only the greatest and bravest Captains of their time, but also equal to the mightiest Kings or Emperors of realm or nation that ever had been aforesaid in A in any age and remembrance of man. For awhile they flood one beholding the other, and said never a word; raviished and astonied with a mutual admiration: and at last Annibal began and spake in this wise, "If the Gods by delinies have fo appointed, that I who first levied war against the Romans, and who fo often have had the victory as it were in mine own hands, mutt needs of my fate and mine own motion, come now first likewise to sue for peace: glad am I and well pleased, that it is my good hap to meet with you above all other men, at whose hands I should seek the same. And certainly, you also for your part among many your singular and excellent praises, may force this upon none of the least, namely, That Annibal (unto whom the Gods have vouchsafed the upper hand over so many noble Captains of the Romans) hath yielded the bucklers, and given place unto your feet; now that you have had the honor to end this war, more notable and renowned at the first for your lofes and overthrows than ours: and that fortune (as it is fallen out) hath made this pretty sport with me, who at the beginning took arms when your father was Consul, gave him battle first of all other Roman Generals, and am now come unarmed into his land to crave peace. Verily much better it had been, and simply the very best, that the Gods had inspired into our fore-fathers this mind, That both you might have contented yourselves with the Dominion of Italy, and we likewise of Afric; For surely, Sicily and Sardinia both, are nothing sufficient to make amends and satisfaction, and it were but only of your part, in recompence of so many brave fleets, so many puissant armies, and so many noble Captains that ye have lost. But faults done and past may well be blamed and reproved, when they can not be corrected and reformed. So greedily were we on both sides to conquer the lands of others, that in the mean time we have hazardous our own. Neither had ye war in it only, or we again in Africk alone: but both ye have seen the enemys and armies of enemies hard at your gates, and in manner under your own walls: and we likewise from Carthage have heard the noise and bruit of the Roman camp. Now then, that which we have came most to detest and abhor, and you to wish above all other things in the world; the treaty of peace is fallen out in time of your better prosperity, and more favourable aspect of fortune unto you. We again are the agents therein, whom it most flaneth upon and importeth that there should be peace: and who are assured, whatsoever we conclude, that the States and cities from whence we come, will approve and ratifie the same. There need no more but a willing mind, well affected and inclined to those courtes which tend to repose and quietnes. For mine own part, one while age hath taught me, who am returned an old man into my country, from whence I came a child: another while prosperity and adversity both, hath fashoone me, that I would now rather be ruled by reason than fivayed by fortune: But I fear me greatly that you as well, in regard of youth, as also of your continual felicity and fortunate train of success, are over-hasty and frows, for to yeeld unto any peaceable wayes. For commonly he fore-calles no variable chances, who never tasted of adverse fortune. And the faine are you at this day, that sometimes I was at Threphoeum and at Cassa. "You being hardly come to that age which is meet for warfare, have had the charge and command of an army: and look what enterprizes you took in hand most venously, the fame you ever expostled as happily. You purfied the vengeance of fathers and uncles death, and wan by the calamity of your house and family a notable name and reputation of singular virtue and piety. Spen full and wholly you have recovered and conquered again: for four armies of Carthaginians you have chafed from thence: no sooner were you created Conul, but when all other mens hearts failed them to defend and keep Italy, you failed nevertheless hither over into Afric: and after you had defeated here two armies, forced and burnt in one hour two camps of your enemies, taken Syphax prisoner, a moft mighty and puissant Prince; and so many cities both of his Kingdom and of our dominion: you pulled me marge my head of Italy, whereof I had been now fifteen years possessed. Well may your hearty mind affect victroy rather than incline to peace. Full well I know of what spirit and stomach you are, more respective to grandeur and honor, than to your good and profit. And the time hath been, when I also had the lightome commenence of fortune lovingly smiling and shining upon me. And were we so bledded of God as to have our right wits and perfect senses in time of prosperity, we would consider and think not of things only which have hapned, but of those also that might happen. But if you should forget all others, I alone might serve as a sufficient example & mirror of accidents of fortune whatsoever, For, whom not long since you either saw or might have been encamped between the river Anio and your City, and ready in manner to scale the walls of Rome: you see me now after the loss of my brethren, two right valiant war-riors, and most renowned Generals, even here before the walls of my countrey little better than besieged, making means in humble manner to avert and avoid those dangers from mine own City, with which crewhiles I terrified yours. Well, the greatest and happiest fortune is least to be trusted, and never is it worth relying on, than when she is to free & bountiful. Now that you flourish and we lade, whiles you are allone and we sink a peace, unto you that giveth it, is a glorious and goodly matter to us that crave it more necessary than honorable. Better it is yet and safer of the train to enjoy a certain peace, than hope for a doubtful victory. The one lieth in your hand to effect, the other as it pleaseth the Gods to dipose. Beware therefore, how in one hour you hazard the felicity of so many years, And as you consider your own strength & forces: to think withal upon the power of fortune: let before your eyes the alternative course of Mars in war. Thou shalt see armor and the edge of the sword; thou shalt see the bodies of men as well of one side as the other and no where les than in war do events answer to our hope and expectation. And make full accord of this, that you shall not gain so much overplus of honor, if haply you should win a field, as this by granting a peace you may presently have in hand and be possessed of: as you shall forgo and lose of the principal, in case you should do amis, and take the foil. One hours misfortune is able to overturn all the honors and triumphant trophies as well gain & gotten already, as in future hope to be obtained, in knitting and concluding a peace, O P.CONELBUS, all lieth in your power. Refute that once and come to the tryal of a bar-tiall you must take your hap as God shall appoint. If M. ATTILUS in times past being conqueror, would have granted peace unto our fore-fathers at their suit and esteem: petition; a rare and fingular example had he afforded of virtue and felicity, and few comparable unto him: but not having the grace to see when he was well, not able to let a gage to his prosperity in some measure and in due time; not willing to restrain and stop the pride and haughtiness of his good fortune, The higher he was heaved, the fouler was his fall: and the more he mounted, the greater was his overthrow. It is for him (I confede) that giveth peace, to capitulate and let down the covenants and conditions, and not for him that craveth the fame. And yet peradventure you might not be thought unworthy, to set upon our own heads a fine and forfeiture. We refuse not therefore but are content, That all shall be yours, for which the quarrel and war first began: Sicily. Sard-ina, Spain, all the lands whatever lying in the Sea between Affric and Italy. And we Carthaginians holding our selves enclosed within the bounds and coasts of Affric (since the will and pleasure of God is so) can abide to see you to rule and govern in foreign lands and strange seas, I cannot deny, but that you have good cause to suspect the Carthaginians for their faith & truth, K whose late define of peace and attendance about the frame, was not to plain and simple as it should have been. Yet Scipio, take this withal: That it is not worth much to the affurance of bopping and oblitering peace once intimated, to consider who the perçons be that seek and crave the fame. And even your own Senators and LL. of the Counsell, as I hear say, were moved not a little to deny and reject the motion of peace, for this cause that our embassie seemd unto them not so honorable as it ought to been had. But now I even I no wot a man than Anuill, but do fear for peace, which as I would not seek, unless I thought it profitable for the certaint it in regard of that profit for which I fought it. And like as when I had once begun to war, so long as the Gods impeached and envied me not, I maintaine it so, as none of our had cause to be weary thereof: for still I endeavoure that none shall repent of the peace obtained by my means. When Anuill had thus said the Roman General made answer again in this form: I knew ful well, O Attillus, that the Carthaginians upon the hope of your acquiescent have both di-rubbed the allowance of the present truce, and also troubled the hope of the future peace.
Neither do you your self dissemble so much, in defecting all out of the former conditions and capitulations of peace, fate only those things which long since have been in our power and possedil-on. But as you have a great care, that your fellow citizens should know & perceive what heavy burdens they are by your means discharged and eated of; even so must I endeavour and labour, that the points which they then covetted and agreed upon, they deduct not this day out of the articles and conditions of peace, for the hire and reward of their fallhood and treachery.
For unworthy you are to have the overture and possibillity of any peace at all, ye feek also, that frand and deceit may turn to your profit and commodity. Neither began our predecessors first to make war for Sicily, nor we fince for Spain. But as then the danger wherein allies the Mamertins food, so now the ruin and deftruction of Seguntum, moved us to take arms most juilly, even for pitty and compassion. That you began the quarrel and provoked us first, your self comics, and the Gods do witness: who, as in the former war they granted and gave the issue, actording to right, equity, and justice: so they do in this, and so they ever will. For mine one part, I remember well, and think upon the frailty of mankind, and the ticklishnes of this world: I conider also the power of fortune and what she doth as I do know likewise, that all our actions whatsoever are subject to thousand hazards and inconveniences. But as I would acknowledge my self to have dealt proudly and outrageous, if before I passed over into Affric, when of your self well nigh you abandoned Italy, when you had imbarred your army, and came of your own accord to seek peace. I had then rejected you and cast you off: even so at this time, when I had haled and drawn you into Affric by strong arm, as it were to trie an issue in law (all the hasting, all the flitting and reitance you could make to the contrary notwithstanding) I am not bound to have any respettive regard at all of you. Wherefore if besides those points and capitula-tions, under which the peace at that time was like to be concluded (and what the were you know as well as I can tell you) you bring with you any recompence and amends for our ships, which being charged with victual and munition, you took perforce from us in time of the celtion of arms, it is for the safe and violence commited upon the perçons of our Embassa-dors there is some reason that I should consider thereupon and be advised by my Counsell. But if you think hard thereof also, as being thereby too faire pressued: look for bater, you that could not like of repose, provide for war, since you would abide no peace, thus without any concluson of accord they left parling; & being returned to their owne companies, they related unto them how their conference came to nothing, and all their words were but wind and did no good: and therefore the matter was to be determined and tried by dint of word, and they to trust to that fortune which the Gods had appointed for them. So soon as they were come into their camps, both of them made proclamation, that the fouldiers should buckle themselves, make ready their ar and arms, and address themselves to a final trial of the quarter; where, if they wished to be victors, not for one day, but for ever and aye. For before the mor-tow next at night they should know, whether Rome or Carnage should give laws unto all nations of the earth. And as neither Africa nor Italy, but the whole world shall be the prize and guardian of the conquerors: so they, whose hap were to lose the field, must make account of dangers and damage equal to the winnings and gain of the other. For as the Romans had no way to ecape nor place of safe retreat, being in a strange and unknown land: so Carnage, having laid to Carnage (having laid all upon this one call) if they now missed, made amends that all was gone, and prevent destruction at hand. So the next day there advanced forward to this doubtful and dangerous trial, two most noble and renowned Captains, of two right mighty and peerless rates; two most valiant and hardy armies came forth into the field, of which that day either to win the victory or lose the saddle; to gain more glory to their former honour, or else to lose all that ever they had gotten. Thus therefore between hope and fear, their minds were perplexed and divided: and beholding one while their own forces, and another while their enemies power: measuring rather by their eye, than weighing by reason their strength. They had at once present unto them objects of joy and content, as well as of terror and heaviness. And look what the fouldiers themselves could not think upon, how things their leaders put them in mind of suggesting unto them by way of admo-nation and exhortation, whatsoever was thought expedient and good, Anabolee heard his noble acts achieved in Italy for the space of sixteen years, he reckoned up how many Roman Captains he had slain, how many armies he had defeated and put to the sword: and ever as he met with any fouldiers of note and mark for some worthy and memorable battle, he put them in remembrance of their honourable service and good actions: Spurius related the conquest of Spani, conquered the three forgotten fields in Africa, alleged the very contention of the enemies; who neither for fear would do other thing, nor yet upon an inbred mildness impetted in their hearts.

continue long in the same. Besides, he inferred the communication and speech of Anabolee had with him secret and apart from others: according as he was disposed to devise, he might turn at his pleasure to that purpose. For as much as the Gods had shrivened unto them that they went out into the field the same tokens and birds of direction whereof their fathers before them fought in times past before the lands of Egypte: he offered and propugned that the war was come to an end, all dangers and troubles overblown, that the spoil and pillage of Carnage was at their devotion and they at the point to return home unto their country, their parents, wives, children, and domestical Gods. And this the ipaque with such a lofty gesture of his body, with so pleasent and lovely a countenance withal, that a man who had seen him, would have thought verily he had achieved the victory already. Then he embattal'd first his Hastari (or spears) in the vanguard behind them the Principes: and the rearward he guarded and fortified with the Triarii.

Neither marshalled he whole cohorts thick and close together, in the head of the battle before their enenge, but divided them into Squadrons, distant a pretty way one from the other:

to the end there might be room and space to receive the Elephants of the enemies, that they should not break the array and ranks, As for Lutius (who had employed before as Lientenant, but that year in quality of a Questor by a special order and direction from the Senat, not by choice of lot), him with the Italian Cavalry he put in the left point and Mofanis with the Numidian horsemen in the right. The open vaises and void spaces between the Squadrons aforeaid, placed in the front before the enenge, he filled with the Velites or javelotiers, who at that time were light armed fouldiers: with this commandment, that presently upon the violent charge given by the Elephants, they should either retire behind the files, or else run to a side, both on the right hand and the left, and joyne close to the formot ranks, and make the Elephants way to run upon their foot from the one side and the other. Anabolee to strike a terror into the enemies, first arranged the Elephants in the front, who were in number four-score, and more than ever he had before in any battal. Then he embattal'd the aid-fouldiers of the Ligurians and Frenchmen, with the Baleare slingers and the Mores intermingled amongst them. In the main battal he placed the Carthaginians and Afriars, with the legion of the Macedonians: behind whom (leaving a little space between) he set in array the battalions of the Italian fouldiers in the rearward for incur-rors: and those were most part of them Bruci; who followed him more per force and by constraint, than of any good will. when he departed out of it. The Cavalry also he disbattal'd and sped round like wings about the two points: whereof the Carthaginians kept the right, and the Numidians the left. Sundry and divers were the exhortations throughout the army, amongst so many men: whose language was dissolunt, whose complexions far unlike, whose manners and conditions were divers, who differed in laws and customs whose armours were not at all one, whose raiment and apparel not intuble; and finally, whose quarrel and cause of war was not one and the same. The auxiliaries and aid-fouldiers fed themselves with the hope of ready and present payment and wages for the time past, yea and with a duple and triple augmentation thereof to boot, out of the spoil and pillage. The Frenchmen upon a special hatred of their own, and the same deeply fled, were soon kindled and enamelled against the Romans. The Ligurians, who were brought out of the rough and craggy mountains, and whole teeth watered at the spirited and plenteous fields of Italy, were quickly by him moved to hope after victory. The Mores and Numidians:

he sighned with the proud and tyrannical rule of Mofanis, under which they should ever after live. Before the Carthaginians he presented the walls of their native City, their houses and holie Gods, the sepulchres and tombs of their ancestors, their children and parents, yea, and their timorose and fearful wives: he set before their eyes either main destruction of all those things and slavery of their persons, or else the empire and soleign dominions of the whole world: and no meanby between those extremeties either of fear or hope.

When as the General was most buie this in exhorting the Carthaginians and the Captains of the strangers, amongst the louders of their own Nations and that for the most part by means of interpreters, intermingled for the same purpose with them: the Trumpets thundered, and the horns bew from the Roman bolt. And such a wonderful shout arose from the men, that the Elephants turnd upon the Mores and Numidians of their own side, especially in the left point of the bat-thal, whom M. Manlius seeing one affrighted, he too redoubled their fear; and riding upon them with a hot charge laid naked the battaillon of footmen on that side, and clean without the aid of their Cavalry. Howbeit, some few of the Elephants driven without fear full upon the enemy, made fast work among the ranks of the light armed Velites, and overthrew a number of them, not without many a wound and much hurt done to themselves. For the Velites leaping again nimbly to the Squadrons, after they had made way to the beasts, bearing they should broad underfoot by them, set fire their javelins at them from both sides, lying open as they did like bouts to the shot on either hand. Neither left they any time, who were in the vanguard before the Ensigns, nor gave over flinging their darts at them, until they were driven by a volley of shot lighting upon them from all parts, clean out of the Roman battallion: and then they turned head aloa upon the very Holomcen of the Carthaginians in their own right point: and forced them to run away, Latins for his part, seeing the enemies in disorder and tore troubled, charged upon them with his Horse, and encroaed their flight. So as now the Carthaginian battalion was dismarshified and brent of their Horsemen on both sides. By which time the Cavalry joyned battallion, whole hope was now quailed and strength abated, and therefore not able to make their parts good. Besides another thing there was, a small matter to speak of but yet in fighting-time and in the very conflict, of great consequence and importance, The thour and cry from the Romans was ever alike and confonant in all parts: and therefore the greater and more terrible: but the enemies made dallent noises, according as they differed in language, being as they were, of many and sundry Nations. The manner of the Romans fight was sure and steadfast, by reason of the peale of their own bodies, and the weight of their armour, bearing still aad pressing hard upon the enemies: but they on the other side, the more twiftness and agility, than force and violence. And therefore at the very first shook the Romans incontinently enforced their battallion to retire and lose their ground. Afterward they fell to shoudering and knocking them with the pikes and boffes of their bucker: which done, they set foot forward a good round pace, and gained some ground of them, marching on still: and no man seemed to make head against them: whilst they that were biddenmost in the files, perceiving once that battaillon to go on and win ground, still put forward the format, which was the very thing that availed much, and was of great efficacy to put the enemies to flight.... But the second bat-tallion which consist of Aferians, and Carthaginians, were so far from scenting and upholding the auxiliary strangers thus dismarshing; that contrary wise, for fear lest the Romans by killing them in the forefront (who fast to it infallly and made renite) should come as far as to them behind, they likewise retired and gait backward. Whereupon the auxiliars also independantly thwed their bin-parts and turning their face upon their own fellows: some of them reired for refuge into the second battallion; others fell to killing of them that would not receive them within their ranks: and good reason they had, for as a while before they had no help all of them, then they were allay excluded and shut out from them. So soon after the Carthaginian had to deal at once in two skirmishes fired well together, whilst they were compelled to close and come to hand fight both with their enemies, and also with their own fellows. Yet norwith-standing for all they were either to affrighted or to annoy with them receive them they would not in no hand into their battallion: but keeping their ranks and files close together, they called them to side to the wings and the void ground without the place of conflict, and all because they would not incerimingle any fouldiers thus feared upon running away and many wounds, with that bat-tallion which flood (will fire enough, and as yet unfoiled. But the place where a little before the auxiliaries were ranged, was so full of slain bodies, and weapons and armour thrumled one upon another: that the Romans had weleer made ado to pass that way now, than they should have had through the press of the enemies standing thick together. And therefore the format of the Hastati following after the enemies every one as well as he could over the heaps of bodies and armour on the earth, and through the flowerly filth of the blood, made a pelmell of their own en-signs, and confusion of their ranks. Whereupon the ensigns also of the Principes began to wave, when they saw the batallion store them to wandering and incontinent. Which Seipio when he once perceived, commended in all haste to found the retreat unto the Hastati: and when he had withdrawn as many of them as were wounded and hurt, and behelowed them in the rear-ward he brought the Principes and the Triarii to the out-wings and flanks thereof: to the end, that the middle battallion of the Hastati should be more liare and strong. By this means there began a new skirmish. For now they were come to their very enemies indeed: such as for armour: and weapons of all sorts, for practice and experience of warfare, for fame and renown of worthy worthy exploits, and laft of all for greatness either of hope or peril, were equal and comparable unto them. But both in number and also in courage, the Romans were superior, for that already they had discomfited the Cyathus, put to flight the Elephants, beaten back the vanguard, and were ready now to encounter with the main battal, now Latins and Moors, having had the horsemen in chase a good way, whom they had compelled to fly as is before said, returned in good time, and charged hotly upon the tail of the enemies battal. And this assault of theirs it was, that struck the stroke, this did the deed and amazed the enemies. Many of them were environed and killed in the place many fled and were scattered over the plains and open fields, and by the horsemen who had taken up all the avenues, and ranged all about, were caught up here and there, and to slain. Of Carthaginians and their Allies, were killed that day above twenty thousand, and weener as many taken prisoners of military enigns there were gotten a hundred thirty three, and eleven Elephants besides alive. Of the conquerors there died about two thousand, Amphil having some few horsemen made shift to escape out of the tumult and heat of the execution, and fled to Aemilius, having affailed and tried all means possible, both in the very conflict, and also before the battal, ere he departed and left the fight. And this praise and commendation he won even by the concealment of Scipio himself, and all those were masters, that with singular skill that day he ordered the battal, and marshalled the field. For the Elephants he had placed in the foremost, whole adventurous force and inoffensive violence in giving the onsets, might empeach the Romans from following their colours, and keeping their arras: the only thing wherein they reproved their greatest hope and confidence. Then, before the main battal of the Carthaginians, he set the auxiliaries and aid-loudiers, of purpose, that being a confuded table and medley of all sorts of nations, such as were not bound by allegiance, but tied only by gain and wages, should have no liberty to retire themselves, and escape by running away: who also, as the forlorn hope, bearing the furious heat of the first brunt, might weary the enemies with charging upon them, and if they did no other good, yet with receiving many a wound in their bodies dull and turn the edge of the enemies sword. After this in the battal, where all his hopes was, he placed the Carthaginian and African loudiers; that being otherwise in all things else equal to the enemies, they might in this regard have the onsets, in that they were to fight with them wearied and wounded, when they themselves were in heart and study. As for the Italians, who also were divided from the rest by a good space between he removed far off into the rearward, as doubtful whether they were friends or enemies. Amphil having done this doughty deed and work, as it were for the last proof of his virtue and valour, fled to Aemilius, and was from thence sent for to Carthage: whether he returned in the 36 year, after that he first departed thence a very child. Where in the Council house he confessed and said, 'That overcame he was not only in a battal once, but also in the main war for ever hereafter: professing in plain terms, that now there was no other way but one to save themselves, and that was peace, they could obtain it.

Scipio immediately after this battal, having forced by assault and killed the enemies camp, returned with a huge booty to the Sea and his ships, being advertised afoore by a messenger that P.Latimus was arrived at Lica with five ships of war, and a hundred Hulks laden with provision of all kinds of victual. And supposing it good policy now that Carthage was troubled and thoroughly affrighted, to come upon them with all terror on every side: so soon as he had dispatched Latimus away to Rome, with tidings of this victory, he commanded Ca. Olibia to lead the legions by land against Carthage. Himself in proper person, after he had joined this new fleet of Lica, unto the old Amado of his own, weighed anchor and departed from Lica, and sailed directly to the Haren of Carthage. He was not far from thence, when there met him a ship of the Carthaginians, garnished with infuless, ribbands, and white flags of peace, and beat with branches of olive: wherein were ten Oratos embarked, the best men of the City, sent by the advice and motion of Amphil to crave peace. Who as they approached the him-deck and poop of the Admiral ship, put forth the vails and tokens of suppliants, praying and beseeching the protection of the Admiral and mercy of Scipio. Who had no other answer made them, but that they should repair to Tunes, whither he intended to remove. Then himself after he had well viewed the situation of Carthage, not so much to have the full knowledge thereof at this present, as to terrifie the enemies, returned to Lica, whither he had called back Olibia also. As he marched forward from thence toward Tunes, he had intelligence given him, that Vermina the son of Siphon was coming to aid the Carthaginians with a power of more Horsemen than Footmen: whereupon, part of the army together with a whole Cyberal was sent: whereas the light horse and van-cuiriers charging the vanguard in their march, after a light skirmish did confound the Numidians: and having stopped all pillages every way with the Horsemen, so as they could not get out and flie, there were upon a fifteen thousand men of them slain, 1200 taken prisoners, 1500 Numidian Horses also were gotten from them alive, and 72 military enigns. The young Prince himself in the mids of the tumult and conflict, with some few escaped. Then encamped Scipio near Tunes, in the same place, where he lay before: and thither repaired unto him thirty Embassadors from Carthage. And they verily, as they were in harder case and greater distress, made much more pitiful entreating than before: but in their audience found less favour and mercy by a great deal for their late treachery and falsehood: for fresh in remembrance. Now albeit when they were fer in counsell, all of them had just cause to be angry, and thereupon were provoked to defory & tale Carthage: yet upon better advisement and consideration, how great and difficult and enterprize, and what a long long peace of service it was to beleaguer a City so strong and so well fortified: and for that Scipio himself was troubled in mind with the expectation of a suite, who should come to win the credit; and honor of finishing the war, which indeed was gotten by the travail and hazard of another, all their hearts were turned and enclined to peace. The morrow after the Orators were called again before them: and after they had been well checked, rebuked, and plainly told of their treachery, and warned withal, that after so many losses and overthrowes which they had received, they should now learn to be wise, and at length believe that there were Gods in Heaven, and that an oath was to be regarded, these conditions of peace were tendered and offered unto them.

Imprimis, it was capitulated, That they might live free, according to the form of their own Laws. It was, That Cities, what territories (and within what bounds and limits) they held and possessed before of the war began, the same they might keep still. It was, That Scipio and the Romans from that day forward should not wait and spoil the country. It was, That the Carthaginians should deliver all renegade traitors, all fugitive persons, all captives and prisoners, yea, and yield unto them all ships of war with brazen heads, above ten triremes or galleys of three ranks of oars. It was, That they should put into their hands all those Elephants which they had already tamed and trained; and should break and tame no more of them. It was, That they should make war neither in Africa, nor without Africa, but by order and warrant from the people of Rome. That they should make restitution and amends to Machinæ for all harms, and enter into league with him. It was, That they should find corn and money for the maintenance of the aid-soldiers until their Embassadors were returned from Rome; and, tender payment of ten thousand talents of silver by even portions in fifty years. It was, That they should put in a hundred hostages at the pleasure of Scipio and none of them to be either under fourteen years of age, or above thirty. It was, That they would grant a truce upon this condition, That the ships which were taken during the space of seven days should be restored back again, with all things else that were therein: otherwise no truce for the present, nor hope of peace hereafter. These articles and conditions the Embassadors were willing to return home withal. Which after they had related in the general assembly of the people, Gises mounted up the pulpit to diffuse peace, and had an audience given him with great applause of the multitude; who as they were heartless and unmeet for war, so they were as peevish and unyielding, and could not long continue in repose. Hereat, Annibal took great indignation, and was highly displeased, that in such a time, so many things should either be delivered or heard; and he made no more ado, but stepped to Gises, laid hand upon him, and pulled him down from the pulpit out of which he spake: whereas the people were moved, and grumbled in a great discontent, to see so strange a sight and unusual, in a free City. Then Annibal, as he was a mere martial man, and could notskill of civil affairs, nor well over with these citizens liberty, "I went, quoth he, from you when I was but nine years old, and now after thirty years I am come again. All military skill and knowledge, which fortune sometime in my private matters, and otherwhiles in publick affairs, hath taught me from my childhood, me thinks I have learned sufficiently: many for the rights and privileges for the laws, customs and fashions of the City and the common Hall I must be informed and instructed by you. Thus having pleased ignorance for his excuse, he discoursed at large of peace, arguing how reasonable and equal, yea, and how necessary it was. The greatest point of difficulty in all the capitulations ministered unto them was this; That touching the things aboveaid which were taken during the abstinence of arms, there was nothing more coming and to be seen but the bare vessels and no easy matter was it to seek up the rest. Now when as they that gained the peace were convinced and put down by reason, agreed it was, that the ships should be delivered, and the men likewise be sought out and found: as for all the rest that was wanting, there should an estimate be made according to the value, at the discretion of Scipio, and to the Carthaginians to make all good in money, Writers there be that have delivered, how Annibal presently from the field spied him to sea and there finding a ship ready prepared for him, freight-ways embarked and went directly to King Antiochus: Also, when Scipio demanded above all other things that Annibal should be yielded into his hands, answer was made, that Annibal was not in Africa. After that the Embassadors were returned to Scipio, the Quellers or Treaturers were commanded to draw an exact according to their books upon record, of all such things as were in the ships, and appertained to the City: and look what belonged to private persons; the owners thereof were willed to declare and certify. In consideration and recompend whereof, there was a sum of money set down, amounting to 25000 pound weight of silver, and the same to be paid presently out of hand by the Carthaginians. Thus a truce was granted to them for three months: with this clause annexed over and besides. That during the said term they should send their Embassadors to no other place but only to Rome: and what Embassadors never came to Carthage, they should not let them depart but before they had certified the Roman General both who they were, and what their message and errand was. Therewith the Carthaginian Embassadors were sent to Rome, P. Petronius Philo, M. Martin Falis, and L. Scipio, brother to the General. At that time there came such store of grain and victuals out of Sicile and Sardinia, and thereby corn was so cheap, that the Merchant was fain to leave corn behind him to satisfy the shipmen and mariners for the portage and carriage thereof.

Now there had been much trouble and fear at Rome upon the first news and alarm, that the Carthaginians had taken arms again: and T. Claudius had commission to conduct a fleet with all speed.
and from thence to pass over into Africk: likewise the other Conulis was commanded to stay till at Rome, until it were certainly known in what terms all matters stood in Africk. But T. Claudius went but slowly to work either in preparing and fitting an armado, or in putting it to sea; because the LL. of the Senat were of opinion, that as touching the peace and the conditions thereof, it was rather at the disposition of Scipio than of the Conulis. Moreover, there were certain prodigious signs reported even presently before the very rumour of the foresaid rising and intersection, which caused men to fear greatly. At Comes, the circle and compass of the sun appeared left and it rained a good shower of ices. Also in the territory of Velitrae, the earth filled and sunk, and made huge hollow chinks, so much as trees were quite swallowed up under the ground. As Aricia the market-pace and the shops all about, likewise at Prunio the wall of the City in divers places yea, and the gate, were smitten with lightning from heaven: and in the mount Palatine it rained ices. This wondrous sight last reheard, was espied after the ancient custom, by keeping a Novenial fast and feast for nine days: the rest by killing of greater sacrifices. Amongst all there were unutterable deluges and inundations of waters, which troubled the minds and consciences of men: for the Tiber so swelled and rose so high, that by reason that the shew-place of the Circus was overflowed, preparation was made for the letting forth of the games Apollinaris, without the gate Collina, near the chappel of Venus Erechne. But upon the very day when the plays should be exhibited it grew to be so fair weather of a fall, that the pageant and pomposo train of the show, which was going to the gate Collina, was called back and conveyed into the Circus; and word brought, that the water was fallen and gone clean out from thence: so the people were more joyful, and the palatines celebrated with greater feare, for that the usual and ordinary place served again for the solemnity to be performed.

Claudius the Conulis at last departed from the city of Rome, and went to see where the havens of Coffs and Laurentium, he was overtaken with a terrible and fearful tempest that arose and put him in exceeding fear. From thence he came to the Popes città, and there stayed until the tempest was overblown and gone. Then he fell with the ile * Huno, and from Huno he failed to Corfin, and from Corfin he passed over to Sardinia; * Elia: which he doubted the point and was passing the race of the mountains called * Infu, there arose a far more cruel guilt, and in places of more peril and hazard, which scattered the fleer. Many of the ships were weather beaten and sore shaken, many lost their tackling quite, yea, and some were cracked and split. Thus the Armada being much toiled and torn, arrived at length at Carthage; where, whiles the ships were drawn up into the dock to dry land, and there a repairing, the winter came upon them, and the year turned about. And to T. Claudius (as a private person, by reason that no man renewed his commission for a further time,) brought the Armada back to Rome. But M. Servilus, because he should not be called home to the city for the solemn election of Magistrates, after he had declared Dictator. * Maiocorens, Prolem, Cestel, Modern. Of the Horsemen, Oftentimes went the votes out for publishing of the election, but by reason of tempests it held not, nor was performed. And therefore when the old Magistrates left their office after the idea of M. Bresc a, and no new substituted in their room the city was clean without any Magistrates of state to sit in the ivory chair. * Elia: L. Menius Turgenius a Bishop, that year died. In his place was invested C. Scribonius Galba. The Roman games were three exhibited a new by L. Elesius Lauderins and Q. Fasinius Ediles of the chair. The Clerks and Scribes belonging to the Ediles, together with their beadle and summoners, were detected for carrying forth certain money out of the treasure and chamber of the city: and being thereof.Convicted, were therefore condemned, not without some touch and discredit of Lucullus himself the Edile. P. Elesius Tibero and L. Lecionius Ediles of the commons, for that there was some error and default in their election, rejoined up their places, after they had represented the playes, and in regard thereof solemnized the feale of Jupiter, and set up besides in the Capitol three images made of the silver that was forded and railed upon the fines of the persons condemned aforesaid. The Dictator and General over the Horsemen, by order from the Senat exhibited the games called Cer.

When the Roman Embassadors and Carthaginians together, were come out of Africk to Rome, the Senat assembled to give them audience in the Temple of Belos: where L. Verminus Philo after he had declared (to the exceeding joy of the LL. of the Senat) that they had fought a battle with Amimals (the battle that ever the Carthaginians were like to fight) and that this grievous and lamentable war was now come to an end, he went on till and related, that Verminus the son of Syphax was vanquished and subdued; which was no small increase of the other exploit to happily achieved. Then he was commanded to go forth from thence directly to the assembly of the people; there to impart these gladsome news unto the multitude, Whereupon (for exceeding joy and in token of thanksgiving) all the Temples in the City were set open, and solemn processions decreed for three days. Now when as the Embassadors of the Carthaginians and King Philip (for they also were arrived) required to have a day of audience in the Senat; the Dictator by direction from the Senat, returned them this answer. That the new Conulis should satisfy their request. After this, was the solemn assembly holden for the election of Magistrates; and Conulis were created Cn. Cornelius Lentulus and P. Albins Patris: for Pretors, first M. Junius Pernius, who was allowed to have the civil jurisdiction in the City: then M. Valerius Fallo, whom the Britains country fell by lot to government, M. Fabius Buteo, whose hap was to rule Sabellina. and P. Aelius Tubero, to be L. deputy of Sardinia. Concerning the Provinces wherein the Confederates were to be employed, it was not thought good to determine anything, before the Embaassadors of King Philip and likewise of the Carthaginians, had delivered their embassages: for as they saw the end of one war, so they foresaw the beginning of another. Con. Lentulus the Consul was inflamed with an ardent desire of the Province of Africa; for it the war continued he aimed at an easy victory: and if it were at the point of an end, he gaped at the honor of finishing the fame, and hoped to have the name; That determined it was whiles he was Consul, And therefore he protested plainly, that he would suffer nothing to pass before that the Province of Africa would be assigned to him. His colleague (a lover, temperer, and discreet man) gave his content: for he flew full well, that as the contriving for that glory with Scipio, was unjust and unreasonable, so in it he would be overmatched, and never able to import and carry it away from him, Q. Memmius Ter-tius and M. Aelius Glabrio, two Tribunes of the commons, gave out and said, That Con. Cornelius were about to compait that, which was commenced and assayed in vain the year before by T.

Clandon the Consul. For when by warrant from the Senate a bill was proposed unto the people, whose pleasure was to nominate for government of Africa, all the 35 Tribes gave their voices and favored that Province to P. Scipio. Much contention there passed and many billets both in Senate-honie and before the people, in the debating of this question: but in the end they grieved to this point to refer all to the judgment of the Senate, So the LL. of the Senate having taken their oaths (for it was agreed upon) thus concluded and gave this order; First, that the two Consuls should either agree together between themselves, or else call lots for their Provinces; namely, which of them should have the rule of Italy, and who the charge of a fleet of fifty

K. fall. Itms, to whether of them twain belon the navy, he should fall over into Sicily: and if peace might not be fully concluded with the Carthaginians, then to cross over into Africa; where the

Consul should war by Sea, and Scipio by Land, by virtue of the same commission and authority that he had already. Moreover, if the conditions of peace were accepted of both parts, then the Tribunes of the Commons should propound unto the people, as touching their will and pleasure, whether the Consul or P. Scipio should conclude the peace; and which of them (if the victorious army after conquest obtained, were to be brought back out of Africa) should have the conduct thereof home again. Also, if they nominated Scipio for to make the peace, and bring away the army likewise, then the Consul should not cut off from Sicily to Africa. As for the other Consul who had the government of Italy, he should receive of M. Sestius the Pretor, two legions. L.

So P. Scipio had his commission sealed again for to remain in the Province of Sicily, with the same forces which he there had. M. Valerius Falco the Pretor in the Brutian country was allowed those legions whereof C. Licinius had the command the year before. It was further more agreed, that P. Aelius the Praetor should take the two legions in Sicily of Cn. Tremellius; and that one legion which P. Lentulus the Praetor had under his conduct, was appointed to M. Fabius for Sardinia. And M. Cnernilius the Consul of the former year, continued also in his government with his own two legions for Heruria. As concerning the provinces of Spain, L. Cornelius Lentu-lius and I. M. Aelius Academus had been there for certain years, the said Consuls were to deal with the Tribunes, that if they thought it good, they should propound unto the Commons, for to know their minds whom they would appoint to govern Spain: and that he whoever it was, should out of two armies enroll one entire legion of Roman soldiers, and of the allies of the Latin nation make up fifteen cohorts or regiments, and with the strength of them joyfully, keep in obedience and defend the province. Itms, that L. Cornelius and L. M. Aelius should bring over the old soldiers into Italy, unto Cornelius the Consul was assigned a fleet of fifty ships, to be deducted and drawn out of two other Armadoes: the one of Cn. Oebanius which was in Aegypt, the other of P. Villius which guarded the coasts of Sicily; and to choose thereout what ships he would: and that P. Scipio should keep those fifty ships of war which he had already. And in case his pleasure was that Cn. Oebanius should be Admiral over them still like as heretofore; then Oebanius was to continue in government for that year as Vice-pretor: but if he made L. Mem-nius the Admiral, then Oebanius should depart and come home to Rome, and bring back with him those N.

ships that the Vice-consul had no use or need of. M. Fabius likewise had ten galleys of service allowed him into Sardinia. And the Consuls were appointed to muster and enrol two legions of citizens, that with the power of fourteen legions, and an hundred ships of war, the affairs of Rome that year might be managed.

Thise things thus ordered, they began to debate in council about the Embassadors of Philip and the Carthaginians: and thought good it was to admit the Macedonians into place for to have audience. Divers and sundry speeches they made, whiles they laboured partly to cheer that point as touching the complaints that the Embassadors sent from Rome made before the King, for the forraging and robbing of their confederates: and partly complained themselves of the allies of the people of Rome, laying much to their charge: but far more bitterly accusing M. Arcelius, for that he being one of the three Embassadors sent unto them, laid behind and took mu-sters of soldiers i, ye, and against the covenant comprised in the league, made war upon them, and oftentimes gave battle unto their Captains and Governors in open field: partly also they demanded, that the Macedonians and their Captain Sepbon, who had served in the wars of Anniers for wages, and were taken prisoners and kept bound in prison, might be enlarged and set at liberty.

A to these points M. Furiaus, sent of purpose from Aurelius out of Macedonia, made answer briefly in this wise. That Aurelius, who was left behind, for fear that the auxiliaries of the people of Rome, wearied with rodes and incursions into their territories and other injurious oppressions, might revolt unto the King: never departed out of the confines of the auxiliaries aforesaid, and endeavoured only, that those robbers and ferragars of the country should not invade and over-run their lands, and go clear away without any harm. As for Sopater, he was a state and peer of the realm, and one nearly allied unto the King, who lately was sent unto Africk, with four thousand Macedonians and with money, to aid and assist Aurelius and the Carthaginians. When as the Macedonians being required what they could say to these challenges, framed but a doubtful and intricate defence, before they had well made an end they received this for their answer: That since the King fought war if he proceeded and went on full, he should shortly have his hands full of so much as he had broken the league in two points, first in offering wrong to the allies of the people of Rome, and molesting them by way of war and hostility: and secondly, in going against their armies with men and money, they deemed this much of it, that not only P. Scipio but also C. Duilius and others well and justly, in keeping them still in prison as enemies, who bare arms against the people of Rome, and were taken captive; but also M. Aurelius performed good service to the state, and a great pleasure to the Senate, in defending the allies of the people of Rome by force of arms, when by right of league he could not. When the Macedonians had their dispatch, and were left away with this heavy answer, then the Carthaginian Embassadors were called in.

When they beheld their reverent age, and the dignity of their personage (for they were the bel't and principal men, as well of their City) then every man was fully persuaded for his own part and said, That now they dallied no longer, but meant indeed and good earnest to crave and have peace. But the chief and most的部分 of them all was Asdrubal, in his country and among his citizens, named Hades, a man that ever perished peace, and opposed himself against the Barchine faction. And therefore he had the more credit and authority, when he derived the blame from the Common-weal, and laid all the fault upon the wilfulness and greedy avarice of some few. Who after he had used diverse and sundry speeches, one while excusing and clearing the times, another while confessing some things objected, lest if they had denied certain truths, they should with more difficulty have obtained pardon and peace: now and then also giving the LL. of the Senate an admonition and warning by the way, to use their prosperity and good fortune modestly and with moderation, he added moreover and said, That the Carthaginians would have been ruled by him & Hannibal, and had been so wise as to have taken their time and the opportunity when it was, they should themselves have given those conditions of peace, which now they are constrained to crave. But for men to be fortunate and wise both at once, it is a rare and special gift, and seldom seen. And here it is that the people of Rome (quoth he) is invincible because in prosperity they can remember to be wise, and to take the best way for themselves. And certainly, a wonder it were, if ever they should do otherwise. For those commonly who happen to meet with some new good success, and have not been used thereto before, overflown and passed themselves too much in excessive joy, which they have not the grace to govern with sobriety and discretion: whereas the people of Rome have ever been accustomed to the continual felicity of joyous victories, in so much as they are grown into a dilute of taking pleasure and delight in them (to common they are) and have encreased their dominion and Empire, more (in manner) by sparing and pardoning those whom they have conquered, than by the very conquest of them indeed.

"The speech that the other Embassadors made, was more pitiful and lamentable, whiles they recounted before the Senate from what high estate, and to how base condition they were fallen: who but a while since held by force of arms, as it were the whole world, & had nothing left them now but the bare walls of the City of Carthage, within which they were shut up, and could leave nothing either by land or sea, which they might rightfully claim as their own. Nay, the very City itself and their houses, they were to enjoy no longer than the people of Rome is willing, and forbear that proceed by rigour and extremity against the same, since there is nothing else behind to work upon. Now when as the LL. of the Senate seemed to encline to mercy and compassion one Senator there was amongst them (by report) who upon a deep and invertebrate hatred of the Carthaginians treachery, spake out aloud and said, "What Gods will they regard and swear by in making of a new league, who have broken their oath, and taken their name in vain whom they called to witness in the former? Mary (said Asdrubal) even those and no other that are so sharp revengers and heavy enemies to the breakers of league and covenant. So when all their minds were enclined to peace, Ca. Lecunus the Consul, who had the government of the army, opposed himself against the decree of the Senate for to crose the same. Then M. Attilius, and Q. Mucinius. Tribunes of the Commons, preferred a solemn bill into the people, in this form: Pleareth in you, and will you grant, That the Senate shall resolve and determine, that peace may be concluded with the Carthaginians? Pleareth it you to chuse and appoint who shall be the man to make that peace, and who shall bring the army out of Africk? As concerning peace, the tribes every one of them were demanded their voices, granted affirmatively (Hei rogatis) that Scipio should conclude it, and also bring away the army. By vertue of this Act passed by the people, the Senate made a decree. that P. Scipio by the advice and counsel of ten Commissioners, should contract an accord with the people of Carthage, under what conditions he thought good. After this the Carthaginians rendred thanks to the LL. of the Senate, and requested that they might enter into the City, and talk with their fellow citizens and country-men, who had been taken captives before, and lay in the common goal and prison. For there were amongst them some of their kinsfolk and friends, noblemen of birth and of good quality; others also, unto whom they were to deliver some message and credence from their kinsmen. When they had spoken and communed with them, they came with a new petition and made earnest suits, to give them leave to ransom and redeem as many of them as they would: whereupon they were willing to give them their names; and when they had named forty upon two hundred, an order was granted out of the Senat, that the Roman Commissioners should take over with them into Affrick unto Scipio two hundred of those captives whom the Carthaginians would make choice of; and declare unto him from the Senate, that in case the peace were fully agreed upon and finished, he should deliver thirteen hundred to the Carthaginians, freely without paying any ransom. Now when the heralds of arms were appointed to go into Affrick, to confirm and establish the peace according to the solemn order, at their own request they added an act of the Senate framed in this form and tenor. *Imperium, That they should carry with them every one by himself, certain flint fones of their own, and likewise Verven. Item, That the Roman Pretors should command them lemonly to pronounce the league, and then they to ask of the Pretor sacred herbs or Verven, A kind of grass or herb this is, which was wont to be gathered from off the Capitol hill, and given to the Heralds.

Thus were the Carthaginians dismissed and sent from Rome: who being come into Affrick to Scipio, concluded peace with the same capitulations as is above said. And so they delivered up their galleys and ships of war, their Elephants, the renegade traitors, the vagrant fugitives, and four thousand prisoners. Among whom was Q. Terentius Entell, a Senator by his calling. As for the ships, so soon as they were lanced into the deep, Scipio commanded them to be let on fire and burnt. Some report that they were five hundred in number, with one another, of every sort, and did directly and guided by fire. Presently were they set a burning; and the light and bloody spectacle (no doubt) to the Carthaginians for to behold, as if Carthage it fell had been of a light fire. The renegat traitors and rebels were punished more grievously than the fugitives. As many of them as were of the Latin nation left their heads: all that were natural Romans, were crost and roundly trampled on the gallows. Forty years before was the peace first made with the Carthaginians, when Q. Lutatius and A. Mamiani were Consuls. The war began three and twenty years after, whilsts P. Cornelius and T. Sempronius were Consuls. And the same ended in the eighteen year after, P. Cornelius and P. Aemilianus being Consuls. Many a time after, Scipio by report, would say that the willful and covetous desire of T. Claudia first, and afterwards of Cn. Cornelius, was the only flay and let, that this war ended not with the final ruin and utter destruction of Carthage.

When as the Carthaginians, who by long and continual wars were grown bare & poor, thought the levied and contribution of money for to furnish out the first payment, lay heavy and low upon them, in much as in their Senate-house, there was great sorrow and heaviness, yes, and piteous weeping; it is said, that Amnibol was driven to laugh a good while. And when A. Hirtius asked him for laughing in that publick lamentation of the City, considering that himself was the cause of M. Claudius, "If, ed. Amnibol has we see by our eye the outward disposition of the face and countenance, so we could look within & behold the affection of the mind, myself might soon perceive, that this laughter of mine, which ye so much blame, proceedeth not from an heart that is glad and joyful, but rather senseless, stupified, and afeut ed with the exceeding griefs and calamities that have hapned. Yet is it not to unpleasable and impetuous to our present condition, as these tears of yours, and weeping that you make, is abstinence and nothing to the purpose. Then should ye have wept and shook tears, when our armor and weapons were taken from us, when our ships were set on fire, when we were interdicted and forbidden to make war with foreign nations: for then had we our deadly blow, then our backs and hearts were broken. And never think that the Romans have proceeded hardly against you, in comparison of the hatred that ye N bare one to another. No great City and mighty State can long continue and rest in quiet. If it have no enemies abroad, it faineth some at home, much like unto strong and furious bodies, which leeming ftreng enough against all outward accidents and causes of ficknes, are overcharged with their own strength and lufines of humours, and thereby subject to most deadly maladies. So much, too much, and no more we feel of the publick miseries & common calamities, as toucheth and concerneth our selves in particular: wherein nothing pitcheth us more, nor goeth nearer to the quick, than to forget our money, and part with our peace. And therefore when Carthage was conquered and deposed of all her anciant honors, when ye few her diliem and stripped naked, when ye lay her forlorn of all the armed nations of Affrick no man then lighted, no man senceth thereat: but now when the tribute imposed, is to be paid out of our private purses, ye keep a weeping and waiting, as in some publick funeral and mortuary carried forth. But alas, I fear me greatly that ere it be long, ye shall find and see, That your weeping this day hath been for the least los of all the rest. Thus spake Amnibol to the Carthaginians.

Seipio having assembled his whole army together before them all, restored Mosenissa to his fathers Kingdom; and over and besides, ended him with the possession of the City Cirtius, and other Towns and territiries which belonged to the realm of Syphus, and were now in subjection

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the one and thirtieth Book.

The causes of the war began again with Philip King of Macedon, which had descended, are set down to this effect: In the time of the holy feast of Ceres, two young men of Acrania, who had not been professed in those sacred mysteries, came to Athens & shewed among other of their counsels, to go into the Chappel of Ceres. For which, as if they had committed some lawful fault in the highest degree, they were by the Athenians executed. The Acraniens moved with indignation for the death of their neighbours, & required aid of Philip to revenge them: Some few months after peace was made with the Carthaginians, in the five hundred and fifty year from the foundation of the City of Rome, when the Embassades of the Athenians, who now were besieg'd by Philip, crested aid of the Senate, and they were of advice & resolved to help them, notwithstanding the common gain & profit (for reason that they thought the continual troubles of so many wars were grievous & heavy upon them) yet so far preserved the authority of the Nobles, that the people also gave their consent to succour their confederate city. This war was committed to the managing of P. Sulpicius the Coful, who led an army into Macedonia, and fought certain battles not only against Philip, but also against the Abodini, being invested and beleaguer'd about him, following the example of the Segusini, who made their wives & children, and their own selves offer them. L. Furius the Praetor overthrew in a pitch field the Gauls called Infubres, who rebelled, and likewise the Carthaginians, who began to make war in those parts, where Amilcar was slain, and with him five and thirty thousand men. Moreover, this book contains the expeditions and voyages of King Philip and Sulpicius the Consul, and the winning of certain cities by them both. Sulpicius the Consul waited with the help of King Attalus and the Rhodians. L. Furius the Praetor triumphed over the Gauls.

Full well appaid am I likewise, that I am now come to an end once of the Punic war, as if myself had been in person there, and born my part in the toil and danger thereof. For albeit unifying it is forme (who have undertaken and professed to boldly to write a compleat and fullstory of the Romans) to be wearied in the severall parts of so great a work: yet when l think, and consider, how three score years and three (for so many are reckoned from the first Punic war, to the end of the second) have taken up no fewer books of mine than four hundred eighty eight years before, even from the foundation of Rome unto the Confulship of that Appius Claudius, who was the first that warred upon the Carthaginians; methinks I foresee already, that like as they who being once entred into the shallows near the shore, are trained on still, and venture to wade into the sea, even so I, the farther I go forward, the deeper I step, and am carried away in a vast Ocean, and bottomless gulph (as it were) which cannot be founded; and that my work groweth still upon me in my hands, which as I went away space, and rid matters at the first, I would have thought by this time should have decreed.

The Carthaginian war was no sooner concluded, but the Macedonian war straightways ensued; I found nothing comparable to the Punic, if ye regard the hazard and danger, the vertue of the Captains for direction, or prowess of the soldiers: but ita man consider the Nobility and reputation of the ancient Kings, the fame and antiquity of the nation, the greatness of their seigniory and dominion, who in times past had conquered and held by the sword much in Europe, and the better part of Asia, I dare well say, as noble and renowned, if not more. But the war commenced against Philip ten years almost before, had ere three years been laid down and discontinued by means of the Aetolians: who as they gave occasion to enter into arms, so they wrought a composition of peace. But afterwards in process of time, when the Romans by reason of peace with the Carthaginians, had nothing to do, and were at leisure: and yet bearing an inward grudge, and owing a displeasure to Philip, as well for his faithless peace with the Aetolians and other allies and confederates of that country, as also for aid both of men and money lately sent into Affric to Amintor and the Carthaginians: the Athenians, whose territories he had clean wafted and spoiled, and whom he had driven within their City walls, impurrnont them with their prayers, and perfwaded them to take arms and renew the war aforesaid. And much about the same time there arrived Embassadors from King Attalus as also from the Rhodians, giving notice that divers Cities and States of Asia were solicited likewise by Philip to band against the Romans, these Embassadors had their dispatch, and received this answer, That the Senat would have a careful eye to the affairs of Asia. But the entire treaty and consultation concerning the Macedonian war was wholly referred and referred unto the Consuls, who then were employed in the war with the Bois. In the mean season three Embassadors were addrefted unto Ptolomaeus the King of Egypt, to wit, C. Claudius Nero, M. Aemilius Lepidus, and S. Sempronius Tuditanus, with this commiption: First, to signify and let him understand, that Amintor & the Carthaginians were subdud: secondly, to give thanks unto the King for continuing so faft and faithful unto the Romans in their difficulties and adversity, when other of their allies, and even their next neighbours forsook and abandoned them: last of all, to request him, that in case they should be forced by wrongs and injuries offered, to wage war against Philip, he would vouchsafe the same mind flill and his wonted affectionate favour towards the people of Rome.

Near about this time, P. Aelius the Consul being in France, advertised that the Boisians before his coming had made rades into the lands of the friends and allies of the Romans, preiently in all haste levied and enrolled two legions upon the rumour of this tumult and trouble; and joyning thereunto four cohorts of footmen out of his own army, sent C. Appius Colonell or Captain of the Confederates, with this power so suddenly raised, and with commandment to march forth that part of Umbria, which was called the Tribe Sappinia, and to invade the territories of the Bois, whilst himself in person led his forces the open way traversing through the mountains, and came thither. Appius being entred into the confines of the enemies, at the first had a good hand, and sped well in forraging the country with safety of himself. But afterwards, having made choice of a meet place near unto a Castle called Mutium, for to cut down and reap the corn, (for now the fields were ready for harvest) but yet, without espials sent out to discover the coasts about, without setting strong and sufficient guards, which being well appointed and armed, might defend the unarmed that were buffie in their harvest work; he changed himself and all his forragers and N. resapers to be surprized at unawares by the Frenchmen, and assailed on every side. Whereupon they also that were armed fled in great fright; and seven or men flying here and there over the corn fields were slain; and among them C. Appius himself their leader. The reft for fear were driven to put themselves within their Camp: from whence without direction and guidance of any certain Captain and only upon a general consent of the foildiers, the night next following they abando- ned their hold, left much of their baggage behind them, and through blind forrests, chais, and wild mountains (in manner unpasable) they came in the end to the Consul: who, after he had performed in his Province no memorable act, save only that he wafted the borders and frontiers of the Bois, and made a league with the Inganni (a nation of the Ligurians) returned to Rome. So soon as he had assembled the Senat, all the whole house with one voice called upon him to treat, and consult upon no other matter before they had determined of King Philip, and the complaints made by their allies: so he proposed that out of hand to be debated in Consill, and the Senate in a frequent number there met, passed a decree, that P. Aelius the Consul should send whom he thought good with commission and authority for to receive the Armado which Cn. Octavius was to bring out of Sicily, and therewith to cross over into Macedonia, So M. Valerius Lanciun the Vice-Prator was sent; and when he had taken the charge of the fleet, confi-
A fling of eight and thirty sail, at the hands of Cr. Octavius about Vibo, he pased the feast to Macedon. Now when M. Aurelius the Lieutenant was come, and had informed and advertised him, what pestilent armies, what numbers of ships the King had prepared and got together; how partly himself in person by going about not only to all the Cities of the Continent, but also the Islands in the sea and partly by sending his Embassadors every way, had solicited unto war, and raised much people to take arms: shewing moreover, that the Romans were not to enter prudence without preparation of greater forces: and that more speedily, for fear left if they made show hasty and fized, Philip might extert in that adventure, which Pyrrhus (a Potentate and Prince of a far better Dominion) had done before: it was thought meet that Aurelius should dispatch his letters to the same effect unto the Comitia and the Senate.

In the end of this year, when a motion was propounded in the Senate-house, as concerning the setting out of lands unto the old founders: for recompence of their good service, who, under the conduct and fortunate government of Scipio the Pro-Consul, had brought the war in Africa to an end: the LL. enacted a decree, that M. Fabius the Praetor of the City, if he thought it good, should create ten Decemvirs as surveyors, for to measure out and divide among them the lands in Samnium and Apulia, so much as had been forfeit and confiscated to the people of Rome. And these were they: namely, P. Servilius Q. Aurelius Messius Censor and Marcus named Servilius and both surnamed Gemini, Lucius and Asius both Horsilius and surnamed Latores likewise, P. Vitellius Tappulus, M. Fulvius Flaccus, P. Aelius Paus, and Q. Flaminius.

At the same time P. Aelius the Coh. called the assembly and high Court of Parliament for election of Magistrates: and for Coh. were created P. Sulpitius Galba and C. Aurelius Cotta. After them were the Praetors chosen to wit, Q. Minucius Rufus, L. Furius Purpureus, Q. Fulvius Galba and C. Sergius Planus. The Roman flaging-places were that year exhibited with great state and magnificency most sumptuously, by L. Velleius Flaccus and T. Quintus Flaminius, Ediles of the Chair, and for two years together were represented anew. These Ediles distributed and divided most faithfully among the people a mighty deal of corn which Scipio the Pro-Consul had left out of Africa; for to four Aliens the Medes: whereby they won great love and favour of all men. Also the Plebeian places were thrice let forth all whole again by the Ediles of the Commons, L. Aemilius Fabius, and Q. Minucius Rufus. This man from his Edileship stepped to the Praetors place. And by occasion of those places there was a solemn feast celebrated in the honour of Jupiter.

In the 544 year from the foundation of the City, when P. Sulpitius Galba and G. Aurelius were Coh., the war with King Philip began, within four months after peace granted to the Carthaginians. And before all other matters this affair was propounded in the Senate by P. Sulpitius the Coh. upon the Ides of March, the very day on which at that time they used to enter upon the Consilium. Whereby by the Senate it was decreed, Iuppiterus, That the Consuls should sacrifice with greater beasts to what gods themselves thought good, with a solemn prayer in this form: That whatsoever the Senate and people of Rome minded and intended to do, either concerning the affairs of the Common-wealth, or the undertaking and enterprize of this new war, the same might speed well and happily in the end, to the behoof of the people of Rome, their allies, and the nation of the Latines. Item, That after sacrifice and divine prayer they should consult with the Senate about the fate of the City, and government of the Provinces. At the same time it fell out very fitly to provoke and stir up their minds unto war, that not only letters were brought from M. Aurelius the Lieutenant, and from M. Valerius Lezinus the Vice-Praetor: but also new Embassies of the Athenians arrived; the one importing, and the other reporting, that the King drew near and approached their confines, and within a while would be not only Lord of their lands and territories, but also Master of their City, unless the Romans set too their helping hand. After that the Consuls had openly pronounced and declared, that the sacrifices were performed rightly and according to order, and that the Gods gave ear unto their prayers, and accepted thereof: and the fourth years and bowell-priests likewise out of their learning made answer and showed, that the invades of the beasts were as they should be, and signified happily, namely, the enlarging of their confines and frontiers, with the achieving of victory and triumph. Then were the letters above said of Valerius and Aurelius read, and the Athenian Ambassadors had a day of audience. After this, there passed an Act of the Senate. That thanks should be renderd unto their allies, for that they being long remitted and solicited for revolt, yet notwithstanding had not failed in their allegiance, nor forsaken their loyalty, no, not for fear of a present prince. As touching tendering aid unto them, it was thought good to answer, when the Consuls had their Provinces allotted unto them: and when that Consul whose help it should be for to go into Macedonia had proposed unto the people, That defense should be given to Philip King of Macedonia, and open war proclaimed against him. Now it fell by lot unto P. Sulpitius to take that charge in Macedonia, who preferred and presented a bill unto the people in this manner: Please it you, and is it your will, that war be proclaimed and denounced against King Philip and the Macedonians within his Realm and Dominion for the wrongs offered and the war levied by them upon the friends and allies of the people of Rome? Unto the other Consul Aurelius befall the Province of Italy. Then upon this the Praetors cast lots for their Provinces. Cn. Sergius Planus had the jurisdiction of the City; Q. Fulvius Gilti was to govern the Province of Sicily. Q. Minucius Rufus of the Bruittis, and L. Furius Purpureus of France.

The Oration of P. Sulpicius Rufus to the people of Rome.

The forenamed bill concerning the Macedonian war, in the first Parliament assembled about it, was in manner by all the centuries in the formost scrutinies nipped & flatned denied, Which thing, partly men of themselves were forward enough to do, as being over-weighed with long and fore wars: and worn out for very irkstones of tedious travel and painfull perilis: and partly to endeavor a Tribune of the Commons, failed not to let them on, to taking the old course and way of blam- ing and accusing the nobles, had laid to their charge, that they lowed the seeds of war full, and ceased notto raise war upon war, to the end, that the commons might never be at rest, and enjoy the repose of peace. The LL. of the Senat took this to the heart, in such sort, that the Tribune was shaken up and much reviled in the Senate-hone with most opprobrious and reproachfull terms: and every man did his part to encourage the Coniul to publish a new assemblie and scrutiny for the proposing of the same bill, to challege and rebuke the fault and idleness of the people; yet I and to open and shew unto them what great damage and los, how much shame and dishonor they should incur by their delays before the war begin. Then the Coniul having assembled the people for this purpose in Mars field, before that he cited the Centuries to give their voices, called them them all together and made a speech unto them in this wise: It seems (quot he) that you are ignorant, my Masters and Citizens of Rome, that the matter put to question is not, whether we should or would have war or peace. (for Philip will not permit that to be at your disposition and pleasure, who already preparesthe mortal war both by sea and land:) but whether ye would rather choose to transport the legions into Macedonia, or receive your enemy here within Italy. And what difference there is between the one and the other, you had sufficient proof and experience: (if ever at any time before,even in this last war, especially with the Carthaginians. For who is he that maketh doubt? But if we had with speed relieved the Saguntins beleaguered, who fled into us for help, and earnestly craved for our protection, like as our ancestors and progenitors in due time assisted the Maccabees; we should have turned the whole violence and force of the war into Spain, which by our long driving off & lingering delays we entertained in Italy, to our great los, and grievous calamity. Neither need we to doubt of this, but that we have hitherto laboured in vain. Philip in Macedonia, (who without question and combined with Anniball by means of letters and enterprize of emissadors, let to have passed over into Italy before this time:) only by sending of Uxanus with a fleet, to begin with him at home, and make war in his own kingdom, Defer we then to do that now, when Anniball is chased out of Italy and the Carthaginians defeated; which then we did, when we had the same Anniball our enemy within Italy; Go I. we onfild and suffer the King by winning the City of Athens (like as we permitted Anniball by forcing of Saguntins) to try and flee the flackness and cowardice: we shall then have, I warrant you, arrived in Italy, not five months end, as Anniball was after his departure from Saguntins; but within five days, after he is dilanchored once & under fail from Corinth, See, ye will not compare Philip with Anniball, no not the Macedonians with the Carthaginians; yet I am sure ye will make them matches, and equall with King Pyrrhus, so far forth I say, as one man exelleth another in valour, and one nation surpasseth another in power. Epiphan hath never been accounted, nor is at this day, but the famed appendant to the kingdom of Macedonia, and of least importance. But as for Philip, the whole and entire seignory of Peloponnesus is under him, and Lord he is of Argos as I tell you, every day, as by the death of Pyrrhus, as the ancient name and rem- mow that goeth of it. Compare now again the times of ouriare, How much gloriously Italy in those days more than now? Our affairs were then much more bound and unfoiled: our Cap- tains safe our armies all, so many as they were, untainted; whom the Carthaginian wars after- ward consumed: yet as purfaint and great as we were, Pyrrhus affaid us, he put us to trouble and sorrow enough; and came intrain of victory to take our free hold even near the City of Rome. So as not only the Tarentins, and all that tract of Italy, which they call the greater Greece, banded with him in that fort, as a man would have thought they had followed the very language and tone of their name: but the Lucans also and the Bruttians, ye, and the Salernies revolted from us, and rebelled: and are ye of believe that these will be quiet and remain in loyalty and obedience? If Philip once were pased over into Italy? yes may they there is no quelli- on: for they fled fast afterwards, and continued true in the Pyunic war, Nay, they never make reckoning that these States will not revolt from us so long as they know any oneunto whom they may turn and range themselves. If ye had thought much of it, and been loath to pafs over into Africk, in truth at this day ye should have had Anniball and the Carthaginians your enemies still in Italy. Let Macedonia therefore be the seat of war rather than Italy: let our enemies Cities and lands be destroyed with fire and sword, We have found well by good experience, that our fortune is better, and our forces were purfaint abroad in forain parts, than at home in our own Country. Go to therefore in the name of God to the Scrutiny and give your voices: and those things that the LL. of the Senat have devised to do,grant ye the same, and yield your assent. Ye have not only the Coniul of this advice and counsel, but also the immortal gods (who as I offered sacrifice and prayed devoutly unto them, that this war might redound to the good and benefit of my self, of the Senat, of you, of our allies, of the Latin nation, and finally of our armies and armades) have vouchsafed me all the signs and tokens of comfort and joy, and affured me that all shall be well and according to our hearts desire. This Oration of his once ended, they were presently to deliver up their voices and gave: affirmatively for the war, & suffered it to pafs according as he had propounded. Then by an order from the Senat there was a solemn supplication for
A for three days proclaimed: and in all Churches and Chapells, and before every shrine & altar the gods were praised unto, that the war (which the people had allowed of) against K. Philip might be well achiev'd and have an happy end. Moreover, the Consul Sulpicius conferred with the heralds, and asked their advice, Whether they would ordain, that the war to be denounced against King Philip should be intimat'd to himself in person: or thought it sufficient to be proclaimed within the confines of his dominion, at the next frontier town of all, where he kept a garrison and guard: they pronounced again, That it mattered not, but the Consul should please himself, and do full well in the one and the other. Then the Consul was permitted by the LS of the Senate to chuse whom he would: he were not a Senator, for to send as a messenger or purveyor of arms to give the King defiance and to publish war. After this it was debated in Council how the armies should be disposed as well of Consuls as Prætors. The Consuls were commanded to enroll two legions, and to dif-harsh and cafe the old armies. Sulpicius, who by a decree was to manage this new war of so great name and consequence, was allowed to take with him out of that army which Scipio the Vice-Consul had brought out of Africk, as many voluntaries as he could procure: but in no cafe to urge any old soldier against his will. Alto it was decreed, that the Consul should allow unto the Prætors L. Firminus Properius, and Quintus Minucius Rufus 5000 men space of thealiots of the Latine nation: whom they shou'd employ, the one in the Province of Gallicæ, and the other in the Burrians country to defend those parts and keep them in obedience. Q. Fulvius Cillo was himself like wise commanded to chuse out of that army which P. Aelius the Consul commanded, as many as had served twelve years, until he made up the number of 5000 also of the allies & Latines: which should be a garrison to keep in order and safety the Province of Sicily. M. Valerianus Fallo. Prætor the year before, and L. deputy of the Province of Campania, had his Commission signed anew, to continue for the term of one year longer, and as Vice-Prætor to pass over into Sardinia, with direction to chuse out of the army there 5000 of the allies and Latines such as had served late time. And the Consuls were commanded to take up two legions of Citizens, which might be sent to any place, as need should require, considering that many nations in Italy tained and needed with the fellowship and company of the Carthaginians during the wars and ever since, were revive'd with anger and despite against the Romans. Thus the Common-wealth for that year was to use the employment of six Roman legions.

Amidst these preparations for war, there arrived Embassadors from K. Proumey, giving intelligence, that the Athenians had craved aid of their King and Mallet, against Philip. And although they were confederate as well with him as the Romans, yet the King would lend into Greece neither a fleet of ships, nor an army of men, defensive, or offensive to any, but by authority and content of the people of Rome. In case therefore the Romans were resolved, and sufficient withal of themselves to defend their allies, he would be willing to fit full and take his repose at home. Otherwise, if the Romans were rather dispose to yield and take their ease, he would himself be well content to lend such forces to the aid of the Athenians, as should defend them early against all the power of Philip. The Senate returned great thanks unto the King, with this answer, That the people of Rome were purposed to protect their own allies: but if during this war they flood in need, upon any occurrence that might happen, they would give knowledge thereunto the King: as being allured and making full account, that all the plenitude and wealth of his kingdom was a sure prop and trusty pillar of their State and Common-wealth. This done by order from the Senate the Embassadors had been given them for a reward five thousand Ases apiece. Now whiles the Consuls were busy in taking matters: and providing all things meet for the war; the City very devout and given much to religion, in the beginnings especially all new wars, after they had performed their supplications aforefaid, and done their devotions at every altar and shrine, because nothing might be for -let and left out, that at any time heretofore had been done: ordained that the Col. unto whom the Province of Macedon fell, should vow solemnly to exhibit to the honour of Jupiter, the great games and plays, and a rich present before. But Lucius the High Priest laid this publice for the time that it went not forward, alleging that it was not lawful to make a vow of an uncertain sum of money not determined: & if such money might not serve for the use of war, it ought presently to be let by and laid up safe, and not be mingled and shuffled with other moneys: and unless that were duly done the vow could not be paid and performed according to the order of holy rites. Albeit the thing it fell and the person of the man that moved this statute, touched and troubled them much, yet they would needs that the Consul should propose the matter to the college of the Priests and Bishops, to know their resolution, whether a vow might not directly be made of an uncertain piece of money. The Bishops let down their opinion and judgment that it might be well enough, yea, and better than otherwise. Whereupon the Consul pronounced the vow, according to the very same form of words (as the High Priest entitl'd and spake before him) which aforetime they were wont to use, in making the quinquennial vows from five years to five: gave only thus much, that he vowed and promised to perform the plays, and to perform oblations unto Jupiter, amounting to such a sum of money as the Senate should let down when the vow was to be performed, so many times before had the great games been vowed, and a determinate sum of money ever assigned: but these were the fift that were not limited within any certain time and compasses. Now when men's minds were wholly bent upon the Macedonian war, behold on a sudden when by chance nothing less than such a thing there arose a rumour of French troubles and rumour:

rums: for the Inhabitants the Cenomans and Beii, having solicited and raised up by way of injuri H relation the Sallus, the Iuvatones, and other states of Leguriae, under the conduct of Amilcar the Carthaginian, who in those parts stood behind with the remnant of Achaean his army, were seiz of Pleciatia: and after they had sacked the City, and for very dissipate anger burnt a great par of losing hardly two thousand perions of all sorts, which amidst the fire and ruins thereof chance to have themselves, crossed the river Po, and advanced forward to the spoil and pillage of Cremona. But the inhabitants of that Colony, having heard of the misery and calamity bet upon their neighbour-City, had some respect and time to fluit their gares, and to bestow their guards upon the walls: so as, they should at least while be first besieged or ever they were forced, and might be able to dispatch messengers unto the people of Rome. L.Furius Purpureo was governor of that Province for the time; who having by order from the Senate discharged all the rest of I the army but only five thousand allies and those Liguriae, abode with that power in the next country to that Province, about Aressinum. He then addressed his letters unto the Senate, signif-ing in how bad terms the provinces good, namely, that of those two Colonies, which all the time of the Punick war had escapced those great storms and tempests of strues, the one was won by the enemies and put to the sackage, the other now besieged, and at hand to be lost: neither would his forces be sufficient and able to help the distresse Cremonians, unless he should wilfully cast a way five thousand allies, and expose them as a prey unto forty thousand of the enemies (for so many they were strong to have their throats cut, and to be hewn in pieces: and by so great a loss and overthrow of his, to give more heart and courage to the enemies, who are now in their ruff, and pulled up with pride for the ruin of one Roman Colony already. Upon the reading of these letters, there went forth a decree from the L.L. of the Senate, that C. Aurelius the Consul should send out his precepts for the army to be ready at Aressinum that very day, on which he appointed them to the Rendezvous in Hetruria: and there he himself in his own person, it might stand with the good of the State, would go with a power to suppers the French commotions, or else write to L.Furius the Praetor, that when the Roman Legions preferred themselves unto him out of Hetruria, he should fend in their stead his own five thousand allies for the guard of Hetruria in the meantime, and make a journey himself in person to raise the siege before Cremona, and to set the Colony free that now was beleaguered. They thought good besides to dispatch Emba-dors into Affrick, who should go to Carthage, and afterwards to Memphi in Numidia, To Carthage, to or to intimate unto them. That Amilcar, a Citizen of theirs, left behind in France, and (L whether he were of the army of Achaean before or afterwards of Mosoy they knew not for certain.) Having war there, against the covenants in the League contained: that he had assembled certain forces of French and Ligurians, to enter into arms against the people of Rome: and therefore if they had any love to entertain peace, they should call him home, and deliver him to the people of Rome. Over and besides they had in commination to give them to understand, that delivery was not yet made of all the running rebels, but many of them, by report, were retired to Carthage, and there went up and down, and conversed openly: which persons were, after diligent search made, to be attacked and apprehended, that they might, according to the tenor of the accord, be sent home again, and delivered into the hands of the Romans. And thus much concerning their message to the Carthaginians. Now they had in charge besides to congratulate with Mosafina, M. and to declare what joy they took in his behalf particularly for that he had not only recovered the inheritance of his fathers kingdom but also enlarged his dominion, by conquest of the most flourish ing part of the Realm of Syphasis. Moreover, command them were to signify unto him, that they had undertaken war upon King Philip because he had befriended and aided the Carthaginians ; and by offering and doing wrong to the friends of the people of Rome, even at what time as all Italy was full of troubles and wars, enforced and put them to it, to send their armies and their armadoes into Greece, and so by dismembering and dividing their forces into fundy places, was the principal cause that they were for late so they passed over into Affrick: requiring him for the maintenance of this war, to send over certain aids of Numidian horsemen. These Orators had great gifts and honourable presents given them for to carry unto the King, to wit, divers pences of plate both of gold and silver, a purple robe of State, with a rich caskock or coat wrought in palm-tree-work, with a royal sceptre of ivory, also a robe embroidered before with purple, with an ivory chair of state, Laft of all, they were willed to make promise unto the King, that if he could think upon any thing needfull and expedient either to establish his kingdom, or to advance his royal estate, the people of Rome would endeavour respectively for his good demerits to compas the fame to the uttermost of their power.

There arrived also about that time Embassadors from Vermina the son of Syphasis, and preten themselves unto the Senate, excusing the error, and pretending the youth of the Prince, lea ring him of all fault, and laying the whole blame upon the fraud and treachery of the Carthaginians, proposing for their King and Master in this wise. That like as Mosafina of a professed enemy O was become a sworn friend to the Romans, even so would Vermina do his best, and strain himself, that in all offices of friendship toward the people of Rome neither Mosafina, nor any other should fulfil and go beyond him: and making petition in his name that the Senate would vouchsafe to give him the titles of King of Ally, and Friend unto the Romans. These Orators had this for their answer. That not only Syphasis his father before him, of a conderate friend suddenly without any cause at all proved an enemy to the people of Rome; but also himself had practised already in his

A young years, and laid the first ground of his warfare in annoying and troubling the Romans by war; and therefore he was to seek pardon and cease peace at their hands, before he might be invetted by them with the terms of King of All, and Friends: for the honour of that title the people of Rome were wont to vouchsafe to none, but those Kings only who had deferred singularly well of them. Mary there should be certain Roman Legats in Affric, unto whom the Senate would give order to minisiter and tender unto Vermissa certain conditions of peace, according to a large and absolute commission that they had from the people of Rome. To do what they thought good, and in case the King mistook ought in those capitulations, and were desirous to have any article added, put out, or altered, he might recourse again to the Senate, and demand the same. So there were Legats or Commissioners sent to Affric with such a Commission above said named, C. Terentius Vero, Sp. Lucretius, and Ca. Olibius, and each of them had a galley directed with five rows of oars.

After this were the letters read of Q. Maminius Prator in the Province of the Bruttii, importing thus much, That the confecrated money of Pogreffy at Locri was by night stolen out of her treasury; but to say who should do the deed, they had no presumptions to give light and lead them directly. The Senate took the matter in very ill part, and grieved exceedingly, That sacrilegious men should fill Church-robbing, and would not give over: and that the late and fresh example of Pogressy (to notorious as well for the hainous fact as the fearful punishment) was not able to terrify them and give them warning. So C. Aurelius the Cof, was enjoined to write unto the Prator into the Bruttian country, to this effect: That it was the Senate pleasure, that due enquiry and examination should be had of the Treasury thus robbed. After the same precedent and course that M. Pompeius the Prator took three years before. And look what money could be found, it should be laid duly in the place; and what was not forth coming, it should be supplied and made good again, Alfo (as he thought meet) that there should be certain purgatory sacrifices, according to the Bishops before ordained in the like cafe, for the expiation and satisfaction of the violating and defiling of the Temple. Moreover, there chanced about the same time divers prodigious tokens from many places to be reported. In the Lucians country the rumor and voice were that the wekin was on fire; and at Perusinum, while the sky was bright and fair, the inn appeared red all day long. At Laronium, in the Temple of Juno Sospita, there was heard in the night-lesson a mighty great noise, Nay, and more than this, in sundry places (as men say) were many monstrous and strange births been. In the Sabins country one child was born, and no man knew what to make of it male or female: and another likewise was found of sixteen years of age, a very Hermaphroditic of douall sex between both. At Frunis there was a lamb yeaned with a swines head: and at Sinnaesa a low friarow a pig with the head of a man. In the Lucians country there was looted upon the common ground a coax with five feet. All these monstrosities were ugly to see and abominable, and holden for great defects and errors of nature working strangely out of kind. But above all others, those births both male and female, (or rather neuter) were most abhorred and detested and order was given presently, that they should be cast into the sea even as of late days when C. Claudius and M. Livius were Consuls the like deformed monstros was thither had away and drowned. Nevertheless the December were commanded to turn over and peruse the books of Sibylla, to know what such prodigies monitors might pertain: who by their learning and out of those books, gave direction to make the same sacrifices which list of all for the like incount fights were made. Moreover, they gave commandment, that certain hymns and songs should be chanted throughout the City by three severall quires, of nine virgins in every one: and an obligation to be offered by them with all devotion to queen Jone. C. Aurelius the Consul caused all this to be performed according to the order and direction of the December. And as in our fathers days Livius composed the ditty of the hymn, so at that time P. Licinius Tegdrat framed and set down a form of long which they could sing. Thus when all things were expatiated, and satisfaction made accordingly for the appealing of the wrath of the gods, (for even at Loci the sacrilege was found out by Q. Monintius, and the money missing was raised out of the goods of the offenders and guilty persons, and bestowed there again in the treasury) as the Consuls were minded to take their journey into their Provinces, there repaired many private Citizens unto the Senate, unto whom the third payment was due that year for the loan of money, which in the time of M. Valerius and M. Claudius Consuls they had lent out and disbursed, because that the Consuls had made them answer, That the stock of the City Chamber was hardly able to defray the charges of a new war, which required maintenance of a mighty Navy and of pillusive armies, and therefore faintly denied them, and laid, That they had not whereunto to satisfy and make present payment. The Senate could not endure that they should have this occasion to make complaint; considering, that if the Common-wealth would still employ the money upon the Macedonian war also, which was granted in loan for the Punic war, this would be the end of it that (one was following this in the neck of another) their own money which was lent upon a curteise and benevolence out of their private purses, should be little better than confiscate for some forfeitures, and fall to the Exchequer and common Chett of the City. These private persons demeaning nothing but respect and right, and the City withall not able to discharge her debt, the Lords set down a middle and indifferent course between honesty and prudence, and that was this: That forasmuch as many of these men said, that the City had much land upon sale, and they were to buy and make purchase, therefore the common grounds grounds lying and being within fifty miles of Rome every way, should be granted unto them in fee for farms, and the Cornhus to let down an estimate of their value and worth, and charge them with a chief rent or tribute of three farthings an acre by the year, to testify only that they were the Cities lands, to the end that if any man hereafter (when the City should be aorehand and in case to repay the former debt) were desirous to have money rather than land, he should restore the lands and possessions again into the Cities hands and receive his money. These private Citizens (who were the forefaid creditors) accepted gladly of this offer and condition. And hereupon this land was called by the name of Tributaria and Tributum, because it was set out and granted in lieu of a third part of the lone money. Then Paulinus after he had pronounced his vows above-said in the Capitol, and departed out of the City in his coat of arms, with the Lictors and Ushers afore him, arrived at Brundisium: and so with the old voluntary fouldeir drawn out of the army that was returned from Affricus, whom he had enrolled into legions and ships chosen out of the fleet of Cornhus the Cornhus he loosed from Brundisium, and the next day after landed in Macedonia: where attended him the Embassadors of the Athenians; who humbly besought him to deliver them from the siege that invested their City, So C. Clau. Cento was incontinent sent to Athens furnished with twenty long ships of war, and a strength of men of war the King himself in person belied not Athens, but even then made hot assualt upon the town Alydus, as having already given proof of his forces in sea-fight, both with the Rhodians and King Attalus, and in neither battel had good success: But besides the ordinary routs and pride engaged in him by nature, he was aolst now and looked high, by reason of the alliance made between him and Antiochus King of Syria, with whom he had parted the riches and Realm of Egypt, unto K which they both aspired, upon the news they heard of the death of Ptolemes. Now the Athenians had drawn upon themselves the war against King Philip, upon a small occasion and of no importance; who of all their ancient etate and glory, retain nothing else but great heart and haughty spirit. It fortunate that two young men of Acrarnania, who had taken no orders and were not consecrate, entered among the other multitude into the Temple of Ceres, in the time of the feast all days, and celebration of sacrifices to that goddes belonging: and being altogether ignorant in the cultume of that solemnity and religion, and asking some foolish absurd questions, nothing fit for that time or place, were soon bewrayed by their speech and language: who being accommoded before the Prelates of the said Temple, notwithstanding it was evidently proved and known, that upon an error only & oversight, and for no ill intent they were come into the L Church, yet were they put to death as fellows, and guilty of some hainous fact in the highest degree. The people of Acrarnania complained unto King Philip, and informed him of this villanous part and hostile act by them committed; and obtained a grant from him, that they might be permitted with the aid of the Macedonians to make war upon the Athenians. This army at first invaded the territories of Athens, and with fire and sword made waste & havoc of all, and so with a rich booty of all forts returned into Acrarnania. These were the first quarrels on both sides, that stirred coals and kindled fire between them. Afterwards was defiance given, and open war proclaimed, by the general decrees of both States; For when King Attalus and the Rhodians purfued after Philip as he retired into Macedonia, and were come asfar as Argos then the said King passed over to Pyreasmus to renew and confirm the league with the Athenians. Against his coming M the whole City went forth with their wives and children to meet him on the way: the Clergy with their rich vestments and goodly ornaments were ready to receive him as he entered the City: the very gods themselves in a manner abandoned their shrines to give him entertainment. Immediately was the people summoned to a general assembly, that the King might deliver his mind before them all: but afterwards, upon more sage advice, it was thought to stand better with the honour and Majesty of a Prince, that he should set down in writing what he thought good, rather than in open place either to blush himself in recounting his favors and good turns done unto the City, or in hearing the acclamations of the multitude in token of joy, to be abashed and ashamed of their gods and unmeasurable flattery. But in his letters which he sent unto the assembly, and were there openly read and published, first he made a rehearsal of the benefits that this confederate City had received at his hands. Secondly, he discarded of the worthy exploits which he had performed against Philip. And finally he knit up all with an exhortation, that whiles they had himself, the Rhodians, and especially the Romans to friend them, they should put themselves in arms and begin war: as who if they now forsook the enterprise, and let slip the present opportunity, should hereafter seek in vain to find it, which once they had it refariously loft. Then had the Rhodian Embassadors audience given them, who lately had done the Athenians a great pleasure, in recovering and sending home unto Athens four long boilers, which newly had been boord and taken by the Macedonians. Hereupon with general accord they decreed to denounced and wage war against King Philip. But first they did King Attalus incredible honour beyond all measure and then likewise to the Rhodians. Then and never before there was some speech moved of adjoyning unto the ten ancient tribes, one other tribe, which of the Kings name should be called Attalida, Unto the City of the Rhodians they gave in token of vertue, a Crown of beaten gold. And like as beforetime the men of Rhodes had granted free Burgeofie of their City to the Athenians, so they of Athens now endured the Rhodians with their liberties and franchises. This done, K. Attalus returned to his fleet in the rade of Egina. The Rhodians then weighed anchor, and from Egina failed to Con. From whence alone the illslands, they passed to the Rhedes: and A and in their voyage considered themselves with them all, excepting "Andres," "Pillor," and "Cybeme," which were guarded by garrisons of the Macedonians. In "Egina" King "Attalus" made his abode a certain time, and entred into no action, by occasion of messengers whom he had sent into "Aetolia," and Embassadors that were expected from thence. But as he could not prevail with the "Aetolians," to invite them to take arms, containing themselves with the peace that in some sort they had concluded with "Philip" to himself, and the Rhodians (who no doubt, if they had pressed and followed hard upon "Philip" might have gained and enjoyed this glorious title. That they alone of themselves had delivered "Greece" from sedition by infuring him one again to cross the seas as far as "Hellepont," and to profess himself of the comminations and importunities of "Greece," thereby to re-enforce his power and gather more strength, gave nothing to the war, B and in the end the "Romans" go away with the honour, both of managing and also of limiting the fame, "Philip" carried with him yet a more princely mind and bodily courage; who, although he was not able to match and make his part good so much as with "Attalus" and the Rhodians his enemies, yet was he nothing at all dented with the threatening threats of the Roman war; but sent "Pheidias," a Captain of his, with a power of two thousand foot and two hundred horse, to invade and spoil the territory of the Athenians, committed his "Amado" to the charge of "Helle-ides," to set fail for "Marseilles," and himself in person marched by land thither with another regiment of two thousand footmen lightly appointed, and two hundred men of them. "Marseilles" was forced at the first assault. But as for "Euripus," after he had with much labour and travell laid siege thereto a long time, in the end he was Master thereof, through the treachery of "Gypsonia," depicted C L. Governor there for King "Peisistratus." After this he surprised and won other Citties, as "Cephal.

Doris," "Sestos," and many more. Thence he advanced forward to "Chersonesus," where he gained "Elias and Alpine conquest," which willingly surrendered: "Calipolis" also and "Marmara," with some other places of notable account and reckoning. But the "Abydians" that their gates against the King, and would not suffer so much as his Embassadors to set foot within their Citties. There lay "Philip" a long time before the town and beleaguered it; and of late had no "Attalus," and the Rhodians forelacked the time, it might have been saved and the siege raised. "Attalus" sent thither three hundred souldiers and more to lie in garrison, and the Rhodians one galley only with four banks of oars out of the navy when it rode at "Tenedos." And afterwards when "Attalus" himself was thither come, at what time the townsman could hardly hold out any longer against the siege, he made them anewly near at hand of some help: other relique would have afforded none to his allies either by land or sea. The "Abydians" at first planted their engines and arsilly along the walls, and with shot from thence not only disquieted their enemies, and kept them from approach and entrance, but also annoyed them as they lay in harbour with their ships: but afterwards, fellowing part of their walls minacate and laid open; and perceiving besides that the enemies had undermined and were come under the ground as far as the inner countermore, which the inhabitants in great haste had raised within, forthwith they sent Embassadors to the King to treat and article about some conditions for delivereng the Cittie. The townsman capitulated and demanded, that the Rhodian galley afoide, with all her mariners, and the garrison also of King "Attalus," might be sent away in safety, and themselves permitted to depart the town every one with a single only of apparel. But "Philip" made answer again that they had no peacemaker them at all, unless they would quit the place, and simply commit themselues unto his mercy. This Embassage related unto them, set them in such an heat and choler, that partly for upright and indignation, and partly upon despair, they fell into the like rage that the "Sagatenius" did in times past. All the dames and wives of the Cittie they commanded to be shut up within the Temple of "Diana:" their young boies and maiden that were free-born, the fucking babes, together with their nurces, they could be betwixt within the common place of publike exercise: their gold and silver they took order to be brought into the market place: their rich attire, their costly apparell and iiiture, to be call into the two Galles, the one of "Rhodes," and the other of "Cyzicus," which rid in the haven: and last of all, that their Priests should be brought forth with their heats for facri-F ice and altars erected in the midst of the place. There first were certain men chosen of purpose: who so soon as they perceived the battallion of their countrimen decreated and flain, fighting before the breaches of the wall, immediately should run upon their wives and children, and kill them without mercy, call away into the sea their gold and silver, and all the furniture above said that was in the Gallies, and let the edifice and housees arise, as well publike as private, in as many places as possibly they could. For the performing and execution of these premises, they were bound by an oath minified unto them: the form whereof, with a curtail malversation thereto an-nexed, they pronounced word for word from the Priests mouth. Then, as many as were of lawful age to bear arms, were likewise. That not one of them would depart out of the battallialive, but with victory. Thus remembering the oath they had taken, and how they called the gods to G witnesse, they fought so resolutely, that whereas the might would have parted the combata, the King terrified with their furious rage, first gave over the conflict. The chief and principal men of the City, whose charge was to play the more cruel and horrible part in this tragical act, seeing there remained but few alive after this skirmith, and those grievously wounded and tired out of heart for wearciness; the next morning early by day-break sent their Priests with their infules and veiles of peace to render the Cittie unto "Philip." Before the town was fully yielded, "M. Em-libus" the youngel of those three Roman Embassadors which were sent to "Alexandria," hearing of the
the straight siege of the Abydens came by the consent of the other two unto Philip, Where he laid open their grievances, and made complaint, That he had ware upon Attalus and the Rhodians, and namely, even then besieged and affall'd Abyden most forcibly. And when the King answered, that "Attalus and the Rhodians without just cause on his part offered, began first to molest and troub'le him, What? (Quoth Eumenes again) were you molested and troubled first by the Abydens too? Philip who was not wont to be told the truth to plainly, thinking this rejoinder of his more bold and malignant than to be offered to a King, "Your youthful age, quoth he, & fair face, and above all the Roman name makest thou harshly and audaciously, But I would advise you all, first to remember your covenants, and to entertain peace with me. For in case ye once begin with me, and put me to it: Do you understand, that I also am fully resolv'd to make you feel the smart, and know, that the realm and nation of the Macedonians is no less renowned for its force of arms than the Romans. Philip having dismissed the ambassador, and seiz'd upon all the gold and silver that lay on an heap together, lost all the booty of men of quality that might have yielded him a round ransom. For the multitude of common people fell into such a fit of rage and madness, that all of a sudden they imagined those who let their lives in the conflict were betrayed: and so calling one in another's teeth their perjury, and charging the Priests especially that they were forsworn in delivering them alive unto the enemy whom they had devoted and appointed to death: they ran at once from all parts to the pitiful massacre of their own wives and children: and when they had so done, they made no more ado, but by fire, by sword, by drowning, hanging, and one way or other, they wrought a quick dispatch and clean riddance of themselves also. But the King allowed to see them thus hord-maid, laid his bloody hand to his heart, saying, that he would allow the Abydens three daies to dye in. During which time of the day the conquer'd Abydens exercis'd more fearful cruelty upon their own persons than ever the conquerors would have put in practice in the height of their heat and cholerick fury. Insomuch as there was not one of them came alive into the enemies hands; but such as were fpared were tied with bonds, or otherwise by some forcible means were ridd from being their own hangmen, and the butcher'd of their proper bodies. Philip after he had placed a garrison at Abyden returned unto his own Realm. Now when this miserable calamity of the Abydens had relieved Philip to enterprise war against the Romans, like as Amulius before him took heart by the wo'ul destruction of Sagum, to do the like; he was encountered with news, how the Conflul was in Epirus already, and had withdrawn his land-forces to Apollonia, and belowed his sailors at sea in Corcyra, there to winter.

In this while the Embassadors who were sent into Africa had their dispatch and this answer from the Carthaginian, First, ass'ouching Amilcar, the Generall of the army and forces in Africa, they could do no more but banish his person, and confiscate his goods. Then concerning the savage traitors and rebels which were ran from the Romans, they had sent home again unto them as many as they could search out and come by; and to that purpose they would addresse Embassadors themselves into the Romans, to satisfie the Senat in that behalf. And presently they sent to Rome two hundred thousand Modii of wheat, and other two hundred thousand into Macedon to the army there. From hence the Roman Embassadors went forward to the King in Numidias. To King Masinissa they delivered the presents which the Romans sent, and declared unto him their commission: at whose hands they received a thousand Numidian horses, whereas he offered them two thousand: himself took order for their embarking, and disposed them into Macedonia, with provision of two hundred thousand measures of wheat, and as many of barley. A third Embassage they had to Vermina, who met Embassadors. The Romans, as far as the utmost marches of his Realm, and to their disposition and direction referred the drawing and penning of all conditions of peace as they would themselves: saying withall, that he held any peace whatsoever that he should have with the people of Rome for good and just. So there were preferred unto him certain articles and conditions of peace, and forthwith the treaty thereof he was enjoyed to send his Embassadors to Rome.

Much about the very same time L. Cornelius Lentulus the Vice-Prator returned out of Spain: Who having declared in the Senate his valiant and fortunate exploits, that for many years together he had achieved in Spain; in consideration thereof, demanded, that it might be lawful for him to enter the City in triumph: the Senate judged that his noble acts deserved no less than he fued for: but they had no such precedent from their ancestors, that he should be allowed to triumph, who had wear'd neither as Dictator, nor Consul, nor Praetor: and as for Lentulus in quality of Vice-Prator only, and not of Consul or Praetor he took upon him the charge of the Province of Spain. However, in the end they came down to this point, that he should ride into the City on horseback as Orant. But T. Sempronius Longus, the Tribune of the Com, interposed his negative, alleging that they had as little example to shew for that; and no praetor or consule as all of their ancient predecessors. But in fine the Tribune gave place to the general accord of the L, O, and was content to be over-ruled. So after the order let down by the Senate, L. Lentulus entered Rome in that solemnity and pomp before-named. He preferred in shew of the pillar that he had 30,000 4500 pound weight of silver; 2450 pound weight of gold. To his foundlers he distributed out of the spoil 126 Ares specie.

Now was the army of the Conful translated already from Aretium to Ariminum, and five thousand Latin allies were posted out of France into Epirus. Therefore L. Eurius departed from Ariminum Ariminum, made haste by taking great journeys to come against the Gauls, who then laid siege to Cremona, and encamped within a mile and an half from the enemy. Means and opportunity he had to do a notable exploit, and win a good hand of the enemies, it immediately upon his first coming he might have affaile their Camp: for they wandered to and fro in incontinent wise up and down the country a foraging, and had left no sufficient guard for the defence of their Camp. But he feared greatly that his soldiery were weary and tired: because the companies marched space thither in exceeding great haste. Howbeit the Gauls being called back by the hooping and hollowing of their fellows, let go their booty which they had in manner as good as in their hands, and returned to the Camp, and the morrow after ranged themselves in battle array. The Romans were not behind for their parts, albeit they had hardly time enough to let themselves in order, the enemies ran to suddenly, and made such haste to fight. The right wing (for the army of the allies was divided into wings) was placed in the vanguard: the two Roman legions in the rearward; M. Furius led the right wing, M. Cecilius had the conduct of the legions, and L. Valerius as Placens (all three Lieutenants) commanded the Cavalry. The Praetor kept with him two Lieutenants, Cn. Lollius, and P. Titinius, by whose means he might look about from every part, and be ready to oppose himself against all sudden attempts whatsoever of the enemies. At the sight, the Gauls hoped that with their numbers they should be able to tread down and trampie under their feet that right wing of allies which was in the forefront: and to that effect they reduced their multitudes into one place, and charged upon it with all their might and main together. But being that enterprise sped not well, they endeavoured to enround the corners and sides, and to compass the enemies round about: which they thought they might so do, being so many as they were in comparison of so few: when which the Praetor perceived, to the end that he also might spread out his battalions at large, he dispaired the two legions in the rearward, so as he compelled on both hands that wing which fought in the vanguard and therewith vowed two Chappels to Jupiter, that that day he might be so fortunate as to vanquish his enemies. To L. Valerius he gave direction, that of one side he should with the Cavalry of the two legions, and on the other side with the horse belonging to the allies charge upon the wings of the enemies, and not suffer them in any case to enclose the battell about. Herewithall himself also, eying the middle battalion of the Gauls to be but thinly reason they were stretched out from thence to the corners and points of each hand, commanded his soldiery to keep close together, to advance forward and break through their ranks. So were the wings of the Gauls by the horsemens discomfited, and they in the midst repulsed back & chased by the footmen: and when the enemies thus at once on every hand were beaten down and killed, they shewed their backs, and fled as fast as they could to the camp. The horse pursued them in the route and chase: and anon the legionary footmen made after also, and gave an assault upon their Camp. There escaped from thence not all out six thousand: slain there were and taken prisoners above 35000, with seventy banners and ensigns, and more than two hundred French wagons, charged and laden with much pillage. In this conflict, Amictar the General of the Carthagians lost his life, and three Noblemen of the French, Leaders of mark and name, The Placentine captives, to the number of two thousand men of free condition, were delivered again to them of their own Colony. This was a goodly victory: and upon the letters which came with tidings thereof to Rome, received there with great joy; and ordained it was, that a solemn procession should be held for the space of three days. Of Romans and allies one which died in this battell two thousand: most of them were of that right wing, upon which the enemies in the beginning of the conflict most of all dischargs them fury.

Albeit the Praetor had brought the war to a good pass, and in manner finished it, yet the Cousul alio C. Aurelius, having accomplished his necessary affairs at Rome, made no stay but took his journey into France, and received the victorius army of of the Praetor. The other Cousul who came into his Province but a little before the end of Autumn, wintered about Apollonia. The Roman galleys which from the Armado that lay in dock at Cosreae, were sent as is aforesaid to Athens with C. Claudius, were no sooner arrived at Pyrceum, but they mightily comforted the allies, whose hearts were well-nigh done: for neither were there any more inroads now by land as there were wont to be from Corinath side by the way of Megara along into their territorie: and the men of war and Pyrrhis ships which from Chalcis had made not only the less dangerous to the Athenians, but also the maritime & sea coasts, durst not now approach nearer than to the Cape of Siumin, no nor venture into the open main sea from out of the straights of Euripus. Over and besides, there came in to them three Rhodian galleys with four banks of oars: there were also three open ships of Athens well rigged and appointed, for to keep the quarters that lay along the river. Claudius was well appeased, and thought he had got enough for the present, in case the City and Territory of Athens might be sufficiently guarded by this fleet. But fee, there prevented him an occurrence besides of great importance and consequence. Certain banished perions of Chalcis, expelled from thence by the wrongs and violence of those that fled with King Philip, advertised him, that the City of Chalcis might be easily surprized without any conflict or resistance at all: for, not only the Macedonians ranged abroad every where up and down because there were no enemies near at hand to fear; but also the townsmen preying upon the garrison of the Macedonians, neglected the guard of the City. Upon the assurance of their words, he set forward: and although he was arrived at Siumin with so good speed, that he might with safe have failed to the entrance of the straights of Euboea, yet for fear of being being discovered (when he was once got past the cape) he kept his fleet within the bay till until night: and at the shutting in of the evening he weighed anchor and lashed forth, and having a calm lee, he arrived before Chalcis a little before the break of day, and presented his forces against those parts of the city that were least peopled: and with the help of some few fojourners he scaled and got the Tower that stood next with the wall about it, whiles in some places the warders were found asleep; and in others not at all to be found. Then they advanced forward unto those parts that were more inhabited, and stood thicker with houses; where, after they had killed the guard and broke open a gate, they received into the town all the rest of their fojourners. Whereupon, there was running now on every hand into all parts of the city, and much hurry and confusion; which was the greater, because the enemies had set fire on the houses about the market place. The Kings' garrisons also were of a light fire, together with the arsennals and armory, where there I was exceeding store of provision, of engines, of artillery and other ordnance and instruments for war. After this they fell to execution and to mischief in every place, as well those that fled as those that made head so as they missed not one that was of age meet to bear arms: but either he was killed or put to flight. Sepher likewise the Acmantian Captain of the garrison was there slain. Then the pillage was still brought and piled up together in the common place of the city, and afterwards embarked. The common Goal besides was broke open by the Rhodian, and the prisoners and captives let out, whom Philip had theretofore as in a place of strict guard and custody. Then they overthrew the Images and statues of the King, and brake their necks; which done, they founded the retreat, went a shipboard and returned to Pyrgam from whence they came. But if the number of Roman fojourners there was but few, that they might have kept Chalcis still with a garrison, without quitting and abandoning the defence of Athens, a great matter had been got in the very beginning of the war: to wit, the City of Chalcis and the pillage of Eurytus, had been taken from the King. For as the narrow palls of Thermopylaeaspect, the water to Greece by land, so the streights of Eurytus maketh all fire by sea. Philip at Chalcis also, the City of Athens where, after he heard the news of the calamity befell upon a confederate City, albeit now it was too late to help when all was lost; yet because he would be avenged (which is a thing that cometh near to the nature of aid and incouragement) he went forth immediately with five thousand footmen lightly appointed and nimble, and three thousand horsemen, with all the speed and hasted he could to reach near unto Chalcis; making full reckoning that the Romans might be surprized upon a sudden: but being disappointed of this hope, and further cognizance where he could see nothing else but a pitious spectacle of a friend City ball himself and stillishing, and a few people left alive that they hardly were able to bury their dead, he returned as hastily as he came and having passed over Eurytus at a bridge, he lead straight to Athens by the way of Boiotia, with a deep peripatetick and hope that a like encounter into the Romans should have the like issue. And very likely he had not mislaid of the lemmable effect, correspondent to his designs, but that a certain watchman (one of those whom the Greeks call Hemerocroptes, that is, postes and carriers that in one day's space will run and rid a mighty deal of ground) descried from a watch-tower the Kings troops marching: whereupon he ran out at once, and came to Athens ere midnight. There were they all alage too, and as recheats as they of Chalcis were a few dails past, which was the loss of their town. The Praxer of the Athenians, and Dionysius the Captain of a regiment of hired strangers and aid M-fojourners, awoke at this to fearfull and suddenly tidings and got up, assembled the fojourners into the market-place, and commanded to the highest place of the City that all men might take knowledge that the enemies were near at hand. By which means they ran every man from all parts to the gates and up the walls. Within five hours after, and somewhat before day-light, he approached the City: and seeing many lights everywhere, hearing also a noise of people running to and fro as in time of such a tumult he bid his march commanded his fo- journers to fit them down and fell themselves, intending to proceed by overt and open action, since covert and crafty couched sped no better: and so at length he came before Dipnus, this Drypauis a gate, standing in the very front of the City, greater and wider a great deal than the rest. Both within and without that gate are large and broad streets, so thick both the inhabitants within may marchall an army, and lead in battalarray from the common place directly to the gate and all the enemies without have room at will to conduct a power as well of horse as foot, by means of a spacious caucy or high-way, which reacheth out almost a mile in length from the fozialgate and leadeth to the place of exercise or school called Academia. At this quarter of the City the Athenians, together with the garrison of Alexus, and the regiment of Dionysius, filled forth, and entred the caucy abovesaid, having first within the gate set their men in order of battel. Which was when Philip saw he made full account. The King his enemies as he would himself to do pleasure with them, and that now he should have his fill of a massacre and slaughter that he had wished for so long (for there was not a State or City in all Greece that he walked more than this of Athens.) And therefore he exhorited and encouraged his fojourners that they should have their eye upon him ever as they fought; and knew well this that where the King was, there should the banners and cornets be displayed there should the strength and fire of the battel be, and so he did spurs to his horse, and ran with full career to charge the enemies. Thus was he not only carried away with heat of choler, but ravished also with a desire of glory, exalting it a goodly thing, and a matter tending to his great honour, for to be seen fighting in the view of a great multitude of people that had taken up and filled the battalions of the walls.
A (as it were) to behold a solemn spectacle. Thus being advanced a good way before the main battalions, accompanied with some few men of arms, he rode among the sides of the enemies, where he bare himself so valiantly, that as he mightily hearted his own men, so he affrighted no less his enemies. Many a one he wounded with his own hand, reaching at them that were nearer, levelling at those that were farther off, and drove them afore him like sheep and followed hard upon them in person to the very gate; where he made so full work among them, thronged and crowded as they were together in the height of the pillage, so far they made to escape, and committed a grievous slaughter. And albeit this was but an unwise and rash adventure of his yet he retired himself in safety, without farther danger of his person by reason that they who were placed in the corners of the gate, forbode to thrust and lance their darts, because they would not hurt their own sides, intermingled among the enemies. But after this, when the Athenians kept their foot-soldiers within the walls, Philip founded the retreat, and pitched his tents at Cycnosiger, where there was a Temple of Hercules, and a school of learning, and a grove standing about it. As for Cycnosiger, and the school Lyceum, and whatsoever was either religious, or pleasant and delectable about the City, was burned. And not only the edifices, but the sepulchres also and monuments of the dead were defaced and cast down: in which furious heat of anger, nothing was spared, were it sacred or profane, without regard of God and man. The next morning, when the gates were still kept shut, and afterwards set open again upon a sudden, because the garrison of Actaulus entered into the City from Eginus, and the Roman from Pyraeum's side; Philip dilodge®d and removed back from the City almost three miles. From whence he went to Elenus, hoping to surprise the Temple at Buna, warned together with the Town and Castle, which both environeth the Temple, and also commanded the same. But when he perceived that the corps de guard was not neglected, and that a fliebe besides was coming from Pyraeum to succour them, he gave over this design, and led his army to Megara, and so forth forward immediately to Corinth: and having intelligence, that the Achæans had held a general Diet, and counsel at Argos, thither he came unlooked for of the Achæans, and put himself among them at the very session and assembly. Conjunction there was, about waging war with Nabis the tyrant of the Lacedæmonians: Who seeing, that the Seignory of Achæas was taken from Philæumæans and conferred upon Cyclos, a Captain not to be named, and considering also that the aids which the Achæans had, were fallen from them and gone, took their vantage named the old quarter, and made fresh war upon them,

C waiting the villages and territories of the borderers, yeas, and threatening the good Towns and Cities also. Now whiles they so far devising and contriving together what number of foot-soldiers should be levied and enrolled out of every several State and City, tor to withstand this common enemy, Philip frantically promised to safely all of that care as touching Nabis and the Lacedæmonians: and not only to impeach them for spoiling the lands of their Allies, but also to lead his army out of hand into the very territory of Laconica and Sparta, and thither to turn the whole terror of this war. This kind speech and friendly offer of his, being with a general applause of them all accepted. Mary, this you must (quoth he) take withal, that good reason it is, whiles

E my self am content to defend and maintain your country by my forces, mine own territories in the mean time be not confounded of their garrisons and left naked: and therefore, if ye think good, provide me as many foot-soldiers as may suffice for the guard of Oenus, Choiæ, and Corinth, that thus making all sure behind me, I may be secure from danger that way, and with more confidence settle this siege: the war against Nabis and the Lacedæmonians. The Achæans smelt him quickly & knew full well, to what end this gracious promise of his and frank offer of aid against the Lacedæmonians tended. His only design was to draw forth of Philæumæans the youth and flower of the Achæans as a pledge and sure hostage, for to engage the whole nation so far as they should be interested in the war that he had with the Romans, Cyclos the Pretor of the Achæans thinking it bootles, and no good policy, to discover so much and to entice that point against him, inferred only this speech and said, That it was not lawful by the customs and ordinances of the Achæans, to propose other matters to parle of, than those for which they were assembled together: and so after the order enacted for levying and waging anarchy against Nabis, he dissolved and brake up the assembly, which he now had held right long and with the liberty of the place, who otherwise before that time was taken ever for no better than one of the Kings flatterers and favorites. Thus Philip put besides the great hopes that he had conceived, levied some small number of voluntary fouldiers, and returned to Corinth and the land of Attica.

During the time that Philip was in Achæas, Philæus a Captain under the King, departed out of Euboea with two thousand Thracians and Macedonians, to wait and spoil the confines of the Athenians: and over against Elenus passed over the forest and hill Cytherus, from whence having sent out the one-half of his forces every way to prey upon the plain country, he sat himself down close with the other half in a convenient place for an ambush, to the end, that if necessity should make him to come out from the Fort at Elenus, and set upon his fouldiers as they drove booty, he might suddenly arise and charge upon the enemies at sunaures, dispersed and scattered all abroad. But this ambushment was discovered. And therefore after he had called the fouldiers back who were run all abroad a foraging, he put them in order well armed & appointed to besiege and assault the Fort of Elenus against which he led all his forces: but after much hurt and many a wound received from them, he retired, and joined with Philip as he returned out of Achæas. The King also himself in person, assisted to force and batter the said hold: but the Roman ships coming from Pyreum, and a fresh garrison received into the place, caused him perfecce to give over the enterprise. After this the King divided his power, and sent one part thereof against Athens, under the conduct of Philoctes, and himself with the other marched to Pyreum: that whiles Philoctes kept the Athenians within the city, by approaching their walls, and the monting to besiege and assault it, he might himself with facility win and gain Pyreum, wherein there was left but a small and light guard. But he found as hot a piece of service about the assailing of Pyreum, as before at Eleusis, by reason of the same soldiers in manner that defended as well the one as the other. So on a sudden he departed from Pyreum, & marched directly toward Athens. From whence he was repulsed and chafed by a sudden fall both of horse and foot, made from the frights of the wall half ruinat; which wall stretching out as it were, two arms, joyneth the port, and at last faltly fallen, as both the valiant and valiant at assault, and by the rage of the inhabitants, and the fear of the Romans, wherein there was left one hundred and eight hundred of their forces, all taken, and none of them escaped. But the King perceived the apprehension of the Athenians, and that the citizens of Athens were disposed to hail and adorat them for their victory, he himself, with the will and consent of his friends, to demolihe the tombs, and to make the city to more despicable and less quickish, he commanded the chapels of the Gods, which were consecrate in every village and hamlet, to be pulled down, razed, and burnt.

The country of Attica was marvailously beautiffed and embellished (as it were) with goodly pieces of work in that kind, (by reason as well of the store they had of native marble, as also of their industrious and excellent workmen) which minified matter and occasion unto him of this outrage and madness. For not contented and satisfied with the ruin of the Temples, and casting down of images, he commanded that the very stones should be broken and barr’d in pieces, that left being whole and found they might serve to make up and fop the breaches of the ruins. And after that his fell mood and anger was not so much satisfied and lattate, as it wanted matter to work upon in that place, he departed out of his enemies company into Bocis, and performed no other deed in Greece worthy of remembrance.

A Conil. The Athenian Embassadors likewise were at this assembly. And first the Macedonians (with whom a league was but lately concluded, and therefore freest in remembrance) had audience, who said, They had no new matter to speak of, seeing there was no new occurring and business. But only this, that upon what motives and considerations they were entered into an accord and peace with King Philip, (as having experience that the alliance with the Romans never did them good) for the very fame they should maintain it still, being once concluded & confirmed. Or, love ye rather (quoth one above the rest of the Embassadors) to imitate the Romans licentiousnes or their liberty. I know not whether? who, as they gave order and commandment, that your Embassadors being at Rome, should receive their dispatch and answer in these terms: Come ye now to us indeed my masters of Etruria, when without your consent and warrants ye have made peace with Philip: Provided to you at this present accord ready to require that ye should band with them and war upon Philip. They pretended that sometime that they took arms against him, by occasion of you, in your quarrel and defence; & now they forbid you to be in peace with Philip. At first, they entered into Sec. IV. to aid and succour Messana. A second time they went thither to fetch free and deliver Syracuse out of the opprobrium of the Carthaginians. And now at this time they hold in possession both Messana and Syracuse: and all Sicily entire they have made it tributary, yes, and reduced it into the form of a Province, to be ruled under their sword, and the jurisdiction of their Deputies and Magistrates. In good faith, I affirme you that as ye according to your laws & customs hold your Diets & Councils at Nauapolis, by your own Magistrates elected & created amongst your selves, wherein ye have liberty to make choice both of friends and enemies amongst you, and to entertain either peace or war at your pleasure; so, your writs are sent out to the States of Sicily for their knights and burgesses, to assemble in Parliament at Syracuse, at Messana, or Lilybaeum. And the Roman Prefect it is and no other that honneth them thither, as also to their Allies and Subjects at his commandment & not otherwise. They are cited to general Councils. Him they see sitting on high in his tribunals seat, guarded with Levites, attended upon with Lithets, there to hear and determine causes, and from sloit to pronounce the hard sentences and proud awards. His rods threaten their backs and fides, his axes are ready to chop their heads from their shoulders & from year to year new Lords they choose and send among them. And in his dealing, none of them either an or ought to manifest: at for why they see Cities of Italy, by name Rhegium, Taranto and Cuma (to speak nothing of their neighbour Towns by whole the other three) by whose ruine grew mighty subject like-wise to the same rule and government. As for Conil, the very lepfulchers and Tomb of the Compan nation (now that the natural people thereof are either dead and buried, or driven out as exiled persons) remaineth at this day as a moniter and wonder in nature, resembling a headless and limbless dilumbrated trunk of a boddy Town (I say) without Senit, without Commonalty, without Magistrats; where more cruelty was showed in leaving it to itself than abandoned, and in this manner to be inhabited than it had been clean railed and laid even with the ground. Miser it is, and without all fencie and reason, to believe or hope, that if these strangers and aliens born (who differ more from us in language, in customs and laws, than they are distant and disjoyned by space between of land and sea) be once feized and possessed of these places, that any thing will continue long entrie in the present state. The Kingdom of Philip ye will say is a block in your way and preeminent to prejudice your freedom & liberties; yet he being made your heavy friend, and that through your own fault and defect, required no other thing than your hand at your discretion, to be pretended before; and, as a friend, and that through your own consent he had been chosen and sent in the manner of the samne, Acquire foreign legions once with this your country; you take the spoke of servitude upon your necks for ever. Accept the Romans once for your Lords; too late it will be then and in vain for you, to seek Philip again, and with him your ally. Small matters and momentary occasions may well cause the Etrolians, Acrarnanians and Macedonians, (men of one language) to fall out, and as felder motives, will soon make them friends again: a little thing being the agitators therein, but all Circuits both are and ever will be best war with Barbarians: enemies they are by nature, which is perpetual and immovable: and not by occasions which alter every day. But where I begin my speech there will I leave & make an end. In this very place you the same men agreed three years past to have peace with Philip: and the self-same friends as they mislikkened then & disdained that peace so now they will needs disquiet and trouble it after it is once past and accorded. And since the case full is all one and, fortune hath made no alteration, I fee no reason why ye should vary and change your minds.

After the Macedonians, the Athenian Embassadors entred in place, for the Romans were well contented therewith, and would needs have it so: Tho those Athenians having suffered many songs and indignities at the Kings hands, had better cause of complaint, and more reason to inveighe and aggravate matter against his cruelty and outrageous dealings. First, they bewailed the piteous post & miserable case of their territories: neither complained they so much and found themselves grieved in that they had suffered harms and injured holibity to an enemy (for there be certain laws and rights belonging unto war, by vertue whereof, to give and take, to suffer harm and to do harm interchangeably is an ordinary matter and allowable. As for example the burning of horse & corn in the field, taking and pulling down of houses, harrying and driving of booyes both of men and cattle, rather pitiful calamities, than shameful indignities to endure.) But this is the point they say, and hereof we complain, That he who termed the Romans, 111 strangers strangers born, and barbarous, hath so polluted and violated at once all laws of God and man, as in his former rode and expedition he seemed to make most impious war with the internal Gods and Spirits beneath: and in the second, with the heavenly powers and Gods above. All the monuments and tombs within their confines are defaced and destroyed: the dead in their graves are all laid bare, not so much as the bones of any one eye covered with mould. Temples we had and Chappels, which, as in times past when our ancestors inhabited those small holds, lie some scorched and half burnt: others headless and dismembered, among the pillars and posts of the Temples thrown alone on the ground. And look what foul work he hath made in the country of Attica, so rich and so beautifully adorned in times past, the like havoc he might be yet to make, would he make in Ætolia and in all Greece throughout. For had not the Romans come in time to succour, our very City also had been so served and pitifully disfigured... But with like mishievous intent came he to the City which worshipped those Gods, not sparing the gods of Minerva, the patronesses and protectresses of our Town and Country: the same wicked mind he carried against the Temple of Ceres Eleusinia: and no better affected was he to Jupiter and Minerva in Pyrgus. But being repulsed by force and arms not only from our Temples, but also from the walls of our City, he wreaked his anger and rage against those Chappels and religious houses, which had nothing for their defence but only the reverent regard of the Gods, whereof he had none. Hereupon, they prayed and humbly besought the Ætolians, to have compassion of the Athenians, and to enterprize the war, under the conduct first of the immortal Gods, and then of the Romans, who next to the Gods are most powerful and mighty. Then the Roman Embassador spake in this wise, 'The Macedonians first, and after them the Athenians, have altered the whole course and form of my speech. For, whereas my coming hither was to complain of the injuries done by Philip to so many Cities of our allies and associates: the Macedonians by acceding the Romans first, have put me so hardly to my fruits, that I need rather to employ my words in making a defence of our selves, than in framing an accusation against others. The Athenians again in reckoning up and recounting the impious, abominable, and inhuman parts of King Philip, committed against the Gods, both above and beneath, what have they left behind for me or any man else to object against him besides? What they have said, you may well think, and truly suppose, that the men of Chios, Ægina, Euboea, Mæonia, Tarsus, Paros, Samos, Lascaris and Melos; those also here of Achaia, complain of the same, yea, and of more grievous and cruel enormities: as whom he had greater means to annoy and hurt. As for such things as he hath laid to our charge, if they defer not honor and glory, I confesse they cannot be answered and defended. Reproached us he hath with Rhegium, with Capua and Syracusae. I cannot deny, but during the war of Pyrrhus we sent a legion to Rhegium, there to lie in garrison at the instant prayer of the Rhegins themselves, who requested us to send them. This legion I confess, most wickedly and treacherously seized upon the City, and polluted it to their own use, for the guard and defence whereof they were shut out. A vowed we (I pray you) that act of theirs? Nay, pursued we not by arms that lewd legion and usurpations? and when we had them in our power and at our devotion force not we them to make amends and satisfaction to our allies, with the smart of their backs and sides, and with the loss of their heads in the end? And when we had so done, restored we not unto the Rhegins their City, their Lands, all their goods whatsoever together with their liberties, franchises, and laws? As for the Syracusans, when they were oppressed by strange and fierce tyrants, we judging it to be a great indignity, relieved and inquired them out: and after we had been (for three years space almost) wearied and toiled out with continual siege and incessant assault both by land and sea of their City, so exceeding strong and so well fortified: we seeing that the Syracusians themselves made choice rather to be in extremity under those tyrants, than to be taken by us, gave them their City again both forced and freed by the same armies. Neither deny we that Scipio is our Provincia; and that the Cities which took part and sided with the Carthaginians & joyfully with them accorded to wage war against us, are tributaries unto us, and pay us yearly rents and pensions: nay, we are far from not taking this upon us, that contrary-wise we would, that both you and all nations besides well knew, that every one received at our hands that measure of fortune that he duly deserved. And now as touching the Capitans, should we report that we have chastified them in such fort, whereof they themselves verily can not complain? These men, after we had maintained war against the Samnites in their quarterly and defence, for the space well near of seventy years, to no small diligence of ours, and with many a loss and overthrow, after we had linked them unto us, first by league and alliance, then by marriage and affinity, and last of all, by freedom and burgage of our City: these men I say, in our adversity, were the first all other nations of Italy, that villainously maffacked our garrison there, and revoluted unto Annibald: and then for very sight and indignation that they were by us besieged, sent Annibald to affult the City of Rome. And if we had proceeded in that rigour against them, that we had left neither City standing nor any one person of them living, who could take offence thereat, and justly say, That they had been more hardly entreated and dealt withal than they deserv'd. There were more of them, that upon touch and prick of guilty conscience for their lewd and wicked deeds, made

As for the rest, we took from them indeed their Town, we deprived them of their posessions and living, yet so, as we left them both lands to occupy, and place to dwell in: the gudilcs " Town it fell we suffered to stand still safe and sound, that whoever at this day feeth it, can not find the least token of shew of a City either forced or won. But what speak I of Capua? (seeing we have afforded unto Carthage (a City conquered and subdued) both peace and also liberty? Intomuch as we have caused rather to be afraid, left by remenfices and over-willings to pardon those whom we have vanquished, we give occasion to many more to be bold as to trie the hazard and fortune of war against us. And thus I had to say in defence of our selves. Now somewhat I have to speak against King Philip; whose horrible murders committed upon those of his own house, even his nearest kinsfolk and friends; who so loose life and unbridled lust (more unkend and inhuman in manner than his cruelty) ye know better that are nearer unto Macedonia. As for you, my masters of Aetolia, we have for your sakes begin war with Philip, and you again without us have concluded peace with him. It may be you will alledge, that whiles we were occupied in the Peric war: ye were forced and compelled for fear to take such conditions of peace at his hands, who was the stronger; we likewise (presied with greater affairs and troubles) forbade to profec and follow that war, which by you was lift laid down & given over. At this present, seeing by the grace and goodness of the Gods the Punick war is come to an end, both we have employed and bent all our forces against Macedonia and ye also have good occasion and opportunity offered to reemter into amity and alliance with us, unless ye had rather perish with Philip, than vanquish with the Romans.

When the Roman Embasfador had ended this Oration, the Aetolians generally were enclin'd and affected to the Romans; but Demetorius their Pretor (corrupted as the speech went with a sum of money receiv'd from King Philip, and made for him) gave silent neither to the one party nor the other, but said: That in councils of great weight and importance, there was nothing more hurtful and prejudicial, than half for repentence (as he) follow it never so soon, when a thing is once done, yet it cometh too late and too bootless not: considering, that rash councils can not be revoked, hasty and headlong courses cannot possibly be recalled, nor matters once past be reduced again to their former state. As for the proper time of that resolution now in hand, whereof my self am of advice, that the due maturity & full ripeness should be expected, it might now at this present be set down and concluded upon. For seeing that by our laws & ordinances provided it is that we may not treat of any affair concerning peace or war, but in the general councils called Panalatak or Phylak: therefore for the present I would have you to ordain and decree, that your Pretor without fraud or covin might call and hold a Diet or court of Parliament, whenever he is minded to treat of war or peace; and whatsoever then and there shall be proposed & determined, it may stand in as good force, strength, & vertue, as if it had pass'd in a full Panalatak or Phylak council. Thus the Embasfadors being dismissed and went away in infinence: and nothing decided and concluded, he said. That he had performed a singular piece of service to his nation and country. For now they would fide and take part with those, whose fortune it was to breed better in the field. Thus were matters in the assembly of the Aetolians.

Now Philip with all diligence prepared for war both by sea and land. His sea forces he assembled together unto Demetorius a port in Thessaly, making acoount that Attus and the Roman fleet would in the beginning of the next spring depart from Aegina. Over his navy and all the sea-coasts he appointed Thirrides Admiral, like as he had done aforetime. Himselfie led and gathered his land-forces, supposing veryly that he had debaured and bereft the Romans of two great means of aid, to wit, the Aetolians of the one side, and the Dardanians of the other; in that the narrow fireights and passage of Peleponisus, was stopp'd and made fast against them by his Ion Perseus. The Conful on the other side made not preparations for war, but was on foot and in action already, conducting his army through the confines of the Dafcaritians, and transporting with him out of his wintering harbors all the provision of grain, whereof the country yielded him sufficient to the maintenance of his foolders. The great Towns and Villages were intrenched unto him, partly for love and partly for fear, some were forced by assault, others abandoned by the inhabitants, and were found defolu, by reason that the barbarous people were retired into the mountains near by, to have themselves; and at Longinus near the river Betsus he encampd from whence he sent to purvue for corn out of the garners and barns of the Dafcaritians. Philip saw well enough that the country all about was in an hurry, and the people in great fear and fright; but being in certainty to what place the Conful intended to march he sent out a corne of light horsemens as espians to discover what way the enemies took, and whither they pretended to go. The Conful likewise for his part was as doubtful: well he wift that Philip was dislodged from the places where he had wintered, but in what quarter he journeyed, he knew not: and therefore also had set forth certain horne in espians to scour the coasts. These two bands or troops from divers and contrary parts, encounded in the end in one way, after they had a long time wandered at adventure through the country of the Dafcaritians. Both parts knew well by the noise they heard a far oft, as well of men as horse, that enemies approached: and therefore they had both horse & armours in readiness before they were in sight one of another for to loon as ever they were within their interview, they made no stay, but charged immediately and joyned issue. It fortuned, that for number and valour both, they were equally matched, as being choice and elect men of either side: whereupon they fought for certain hours alike, until such time as their own weariness and the faintness of their horses parted the battle in doubtful victory. Of the Macedonians there died 40 horsemen: and of the Romans five and thirty. And for all this, neither brought the Macedonians any better intelligence to-their King, nor the Romans to their Consul, of the place where the enemies were incamped. But certain fugitive traitors gave advertisement thereof: who, cunningly in all wars, upon a running head and light manner that naturally they have, are given to hurry after news, and to enquire in what terms enemies stand. Philip imagining that it would avail somewhat both to purchase the affection of his foudlers, and also to induce them more cheerfully and readily to undertake all hazards for his sake, in case he seemed to have a careful regard to buy their horsemens which were slain in the journey and expedition aforesaid: commanded their bodies to be brought into the camp, to the end that all men might see what honour he did them in their funerals. But see how nothing is more uncertain, nor whereof a man may make less reckoning than the minds and affections of the multitude. That which was thought would have made them more willing and forward to enter into any danger and jeopardy whatsoever, even that, wrought a contrary effect and caused them to be most fearful and backward. For they who were used to fight with Greeks and Illyrians, and to see mens bodies wounded with pith of galees, with arrows and pierced with lance here and there, in this or that part, after they beheld once their fellows so butcherly mangled with the Spanish cutelaxes and arming swords, the arms cut away from the body, the head either limeted clean off by the neck, or cloven down right, and lying on the fould-iers their panches ript with the bowels open and guts drawing after; with other deep wounds and broad slashes, so hideous and fearful to behold: then they saw all full (fearful creatures it was they were,) what manner of weapons, and what kind of men they were to deal again. Nay, the King himself was very affraid who had not as yet encountered with the Romans in any field, Whereupon he sent for his sea to come back with the garrison that he had in the heightes of Meagonia, thereby to increase and strengthen his own forces, and laid open the way into Macedonia, for Placentia and the Dardanians. Hisself in person with a power of 20,000 foot, and 4,000 horse, guided by the fugitives aforesaid, marshalled toward the enemy, and about a quarter of a mile or somewhat less from the Roman camp, posted himself of a hill near to Actium, which he fortified with trench and rampier. From whence, when he beheld the Romans encamp-med hard under him, he wondered (by report) to see not only the whole body of the camp, with the form and order thereof in general, but also how every part was ranged and set out integral, both in the manner of quartering and pitching their pavilions, and also in the proportion of the ways for breadth and length between. And having viewed and considered every thing according-lby "Believe me, (saith he) there is no man who seeth this, that can either think or say, it is the camp of a barbarous nation. For two days (pace the Consul and the King) expecting one anothers attempts and enterprises) kept their foudlers close within their holds. When the third day was come, the Roman General brought forth his whole power into the field, But the King fearing to hazard all so soon, upon a call drew forth 400 Triballians (which were, as we have said elsewhere, of the Illyrian nation) and 300 Cretians, all footmen, accompanied with the like number of horsemens: and sent them under the conduct of Atheneogoras, one of his curiers and gallants, for to brave the Cavalry of the enemies, and to challenge them to fight. The Romans, whose main battle was little above half a mile off, put out against them their light armed van-curiers, and as it were, two companies or cornets of horsemens: to the end, that they might be equal with the enemy in number, both of foot and horse. They of the Kings part supposed verily, that they should fight after their old and accustomed manner: namely, that the horsemens should by turns, one while ride forward in the face of the enemy, other while retire again; sometimes follow in chase and have use of their darts and weapons, and sometimes turn and flee their back parts; that the nimbleness and swiftness of the Illyrians would stand in good stead to make excursions and infield skirmishes: also that the Cretian archers should be employed in shooting arrows aloof at the enemies, as they advanced and came forward, or flung out all abroad on every side: but the violent charge of the Romans, no less continual and obstinate, than fierce and eager, put them quite out of this manner of service, and disordered all. For no otherwise than if it had been a fret battle between two entire armies, their footmen lightly armed, so soon as they had lanced and let go their javelins from them, took them to their swords, and came to hand fight: the horsemens likewise, no sooner affronted the enemies, but either staying their horses they fought on horseback, or else alighted on foot, and among the footmen maintained the skirmish. By this means neither the Kings Cavalry could match the Romans, because they had not been used to a steady battle: nor his footmen who were wont to traverse their grounds, and skirmish, never standing still, and withal in manner half naked for any harness they had, was able to make their parts good with the Roman light appointed footmen, who had their swords and bucklers, and were furnished with armours, as well defensive as offensive. So they could not endure long to maintain fight but were forced to retire into their camp, and by nothing else saved themselves but by good footmanship and riding space. These passed one day between, when the King minding to try a conflict with all his forces of Cavalry, and footmen lightly appointed, had laid in wait by night certain targets, whom they call Pelisias, in a convenient place between both camps, and given direction and charge unto Atheneogoras and his men of arms, That if they sped well in open battel and plain fight, they should on still and follow their good fortune: but if they went by the worse,

The Roman Confl had both obtained victory in open battle, and escaped the danger of a covert train, retired himself into his camp. The morrow after, he came down into the plain field with all his forces, and put them in battle array, having arranged his Elephants in the forefront of the vanguard. And this was the first time that ever the Romans had lost in their wars, of this host by occasion, that in the late Punic war they had taken some of them alive from their enemies. But perceiving that Philip kept himself close within his camp, he approached under the very rampart, and reproached him for this cowardice. And seeing for all that, he could not even then be drawn to a battle; considering also, that if he kept there a standing camp long, so near unto the enemy, his provision of corn should be exposed to dangers; for no sooner should the purveyors and forreagers be gone abroad into the country, and spread over the fields, but the enemies light horsemen would be ready at their heels to fetch them in, and cause them to come short home: therefore he removed his camp to a place almost eight miles off, called Olustophanes, where he might make his provision with less danger. Now when the Romans purveyed for corn and viand in the territory thereabout, and we came upon a time somewhat nearer and within danger of Philip at first the King let them alone, and kept his men within their camp, to the end, that they might be more bold and venturous, and withal less wary and circumspect: but玉石 and the auxiliaries of the Cadiots, and marched to fall, as the swiftest of his footmen by running might keep pace with the horsemen. Thus being gotten between them and home, he pitched down his enigets between the Roman camp and the forreagers. Then divided he his forces in two companies, the one he went forth to course and chase them, so dispersed as they were: giving special charge and direction, not to leave any of them alive, that they could reach with the other; he halted himself behind, and before all the waifs, and stopped the forgeries by which the enemies were like to retire and have recourse unto their camp. Soon were they killed or put to flight in every place, and as yet none escaped to the Roman camp, for to bring news of this disaster: for, as many as fled back chanced upon the guard that the King had set: and more were slain by them that before the waifs, than those that were sent out to the pursuit and execution. At length some happened to escape through the midst of the Kings corpi de guard, and in great haste and fearful manner came into the camp with a troublesome noise and tumult, rather than any certainties, the Confl, after order given to the horsemen, that every man should mucour and refuse what way whatsoever he could, their disfrighted fellows in this extremity, himself led forth the legions out of the camp, and marching in a fortrong battaillon advanced toward the enemies. The Horsemen beingsped over the fields in divers places, some lost their right way, being deceived by other outcures heard from a contrary part: othersome met with their enemies, and at one instant, the skirmish began in many and in Entry places. The band that guarded about the King, fought most fiercely and cruelly: for both they were for their number as well of horse as foot, a full army wales: and also most of the Romans light upon them, because they kept the very port and roadeway in the midst. In this regard also were the Macedonians: the better and had the vantage, because the King himself was present in person to encourage and exhume them: and withal the auxiliary Cadiots wounded many of the Romans ere they were aware of them: for why, they were well prepared for battle, ranged thick and close together, and fought against them that rode as far as abroad one from another, and without alarm. And verily, if they could have kept any mean and measure in their chase, they had mightily advanced themselves, not only in winning the honor of that day, but also, in the main point of the whole action. But pursuing them beyond all reason, and without discretion, upon a blind and thoughtless desire that they had of mischief they chanced upon the Roman Squadrums which were gone before with the Tribuns and Colonels: in so much as the Horsemen aforesaid, who before fled, when they once saw the enigets of their own infantry, leaned their horse heads, and turned again upon the enemy that ran with bridle in horse neck: and so in the turning of an hand, the fortune of the battaillon changed and came about, and they that erstwhile made purfue, now flowed their backs, and fled again. Many of them were slain that came to close handfight, many likewise of those that ran away. Neither fell they all upon the edge of the swords, for some there were who plunged into groves and masstives, where both horse and man sunk in the deep mud and mire, and so were swallowed up, and perished. The King himself also was in great danger: for his horse being wounded under him and fallen, he also came headlong down to the ground, and hardly escaped, but he had been troden under foot, and mickied as he lay along. One horseman above the rest saved his life, who hastily kept himself from horseback, and withal mounted the King (so feared as he was) upon his own horse: who being now on foot, and not able to run as fast as the horsemen that fled away, was with many a flab and thrust soon dispatched by the enemies that came running together to the King when he was seen to fall. And the King after he had ridden in fearful flight about the enemy meers, one while where there was some way, and other whiles where there was none at all to be seen, chanceit at length to come to his camp, when most men were in despair that he could possibly escape in safety. In this skirmish there were 200 Maces Macedonians slain a hundred almost taken prisoners: four score brave and goodly courtiers, with rich caparisons and other furniture, together with the spoil of fair armours carried away.

There were that blamed the King for being too rash that day, and the Consul for his slackness. For Philip, say they, should have kept him quiet in rest and repose, knowing, as he did, that the enemies in few days would have brought to extremity want and penury, now that the territory all about was clean spoiled and wasted. And the Consul for his part, when he had failed the Cavalry and light armed soldiers of the enemies, and as good as taken the King prisoner, ought presently to have advanced against the Kings camp: for never would the enemies to discomfit have stood to it; and in the minute of an hour, they had been vanquished for ever. This is soon said, but (as most things else) not so soon done. For in case that the King had likewise brought forth into the field all his Infantry, peradventure in that tumult, when all his men were discussed and driven to fly out of the field to their camp, ye, and to keep within the rampier, for fear of the enemy, ready upon his victory to get over the counter-fac and other fortifications, the King might have been diffused of his hold, and lost all. Again considering, that the whole power of Philip his footmen remained still entire within the camp, the corps de guard before the gates warding; the sentinels and watch set in convenient places of the rampier attending: what other good should the Consul have done in advancing thisither, but imitated the rash fool-hardiness of the King, who a little before so hastily followed the chase of the hostmen discomfit? Neither was the Kings first designment to be reproved and found fault with, when he charged upon the foragers, scattered as they were over all the fields: if he could have seen when he was well, and have used his good hand in measure and moderation, Leis marvail it is besides, that he was willing to trye the fortune of a batall ; because there ran a rumor, that Pleuratus and the Dardaniens were departed from home, and with a puissant power entered already into Macedonia: And if he thus were before round about with these armies, there was no doubt but the Romans might have vanquished and subdued him, and never flirred foot for the matter. Philip therefore supposing that upon these two late received calls of the horsemen, he should have but unquiet and dangerous sitting in the same standing camp still: and minding to dislodge from thence, and in his remove to beguil the enemy and not be seen, dispatched a Purivative at arms or herald unto the Consul a little before fun setting, to crave surcease of arms, until he had buried his horsemen that were slain: and at the relief of the second watch he deceived the enemy: for leaving many fires through all his camp, he marched without any noise and departed. The Consul had newly supped, and was going to rest, when he was advertised that a Purivative was come, and what his errand was. And for the present, he made the messenger no other answer but this, that the next morning he would talk with him, and give him audience. But Philip by this means got the advantage of that whole night, and part of the next day, to gain riddance of way in his journey, which was the only thing he sought for. And toward the mountains he took his flight, for that way he would well the Romans would not follow after, with an army so heavy and charged as it was. The Consul by day break, granted the Purivative a ceasing of arms, and gave him his dispatch; but it was not long after that he was advertised how the enemy was gone: and not knowing which way to follow after, he passed some few days in foraging and purveying provision all about the place where he lay encamped.

After this he marched to Studera, and gathered together all the grain that was to be about Pelagonia. From thence he went forward as far as to Plovina, and all this while knew not for certain what of the country the enemies were retire. Philip having first set him down and encamped before Bruna, and departed from thence by crois and crooked ways, struck a sudden fear into the enemy, whereupon the Romans dilodge from Plovina, and neer unto the River Osbyges pitched their pavilions. The King likewise refted himself not far from thence, and had call a trench and tailed a rampier along the banks of the River, which the inhabitants call Erigonae. And after he was for certain advertised, that the Romans intended to go to Erusela, he marched afore to seize upon the frit, and to empeach the enemies, that they should not gain the passage that lyeth as it were in a narrow gullet, barred and enclosed on each side. There he tailed in one place a rampier, and call a trench in another; made barricades here and there, partly by piling stones up on heaps in fied of a wall, partly by felling of trees acroes, according as either the ground would give leave, or the place afford matter: And thus stopping up all the ways by fundry devices and means, he made the place (to his thinking) both impassable and impegnable, which of itself by nature was hard enough and troublesome. The country all about was for the most part forestous, and full of wood, very inconvenient, especially for that manner of battalions and ordnance of array, which the Macedonians call Thalamas: which serveth them in small or no need at all, unless with their long pikes they may make a pallisade, or fyall (as it were) and oppose them before their shields: which they cannot well do, unless they have free scope and liberty of plain and open ground. The Thracians also were founly troubled and cumbed with their spares named Romphes, which were likewise of a mighty length, and by reason thereof (catching as they did, and snarling within the boughs and branches of Trees that grew in their way) (where about) hindered them very much. There remained the Cohort or band of the Candies, that seemed of some ufe for to be employed. And yet the same also as it was able to discharge arrows against both Horse and man, and to annoy them so long as they lay open and exposed to shot, if haply they offered offered to charge; so they were not of strength sufficient to drive their ships level, and to pierce thorough the Roman targets: for otherwise there was no part of the body offered it self unarmed and naked for to aim at. And therefore to soon as they perceived that kind of shot to serve them to little or no purpose, they caught up stones which lay all over the valley, and let them fall at the enemy. Which stones, as they light and bear upon their bowiers kept a great clattering, and with the bound they made (rather than with any hurt besides) kept the Romans for a time from mounting up the bank. But the Romans making no reckoning of these stones neither party by paroxysms and target-encens on their heads, made way directly through the thick kept of their enemies and partly by wheeling a little and feething some compacts about gained the pitch of the hill, and were got up to the very top: from whence they drove the Macedonians (as all armed as they were) down the hill, and chaled them from their holds and guards: and by reason they had much ado to file (the ground was so rough and uneven), most of them were killed and cut in pieces. Thus the difficulty of the fight was overcame, and they were perplexed therewith, with far less trouble and conflict than they looked for and made account of. Then they marched on forward as far as to Eraclea, where the Conful after he had put the fields all over to the wall, retired himself to Eumes. From thence he forced Oroibes and assailed the Town of Celerium, situate as it were, in a demy land: there is a lake that environeth the wall, and but one way by land that leadeth to the Town from the main, and the same very bright and narrow, in form of a gutter. At the first when the Town was summoned the inhabitants: troubling to the natural strength of the place kept their gates shut against the Conful, and refused his summons. But after they saw once the ensigns displayed and marching against them, when they perceived the enemies defended under a paroito to approach close to the gate, and the narrow bright and avenue aforesaid, before with a band of them: before they would encounter fight and danger they yielded themselves for very fear. From Celerium he marched on towards the Dileareians, and was by assailing the City of Pechium. From thence he carried away the bondslaves, with the rest of the piglages: but all persons whatsoever free born, he let go at liberty without paying ransom. The Town he gave them again after he had planted in it a strong garrison: for it stood well, and in a very good place, for to make rodes and incursions into Macedonia. Thus the Conful having raged the country of the enemies, brought his army back through the peaceable parts into Apolonia, where he began first to make war.

now the Etolians the Athamanis, and Dardanians, and many other wars rising suddenly at once, from one place and some from another, had diverted and turned Phil. P contary way. Against the Dardanians (as they returned out of Macedonia) he sent Achaienar as with the footmen lightly armed and appointed the greater part also of the horse giving him in charge and direction to follow them hard at their heels as they departed, and to play upon their backs, and cut off the tail of their rearward: so to teach them against another time, not to be so hastily to fall abroad with an army again. Demetrius the Pretor of the Etolians (who in the Diet aforesaid held at Naupactum persuaded to take a longer time tor to commit about this war) had in the next Council or Parliament following, moved the Etolians to enter into arms: namely upon the fame that was spread abroad of the horsemens flight before Oiolobus: and a few upon the coming of the Dardanians, and Plataeans with the Illyrians into Macedonia: besides the arrival of the Roman fleet at Oceana and the general voice and bruit that went, how Macedonia should shortly be assailed also by sea over and above to many nations that from all parts about were come already by land. These motives regained Demetrius and the Etolians to try the Romans again. Who joying unto them Achaia the King of the Athamanis, went forth together for to besiege Ceresium. They within the Town had shut their gates, whether by contrivance willingly of themselves, it was not known for they had the Kings garnish within among them. How ever it was, within few dayes Ceresium was taken and burnt. As many as remained alive after that great defeat, as well bond as free one with another, were with the rest of the piglages carried away. This fearful example cauld all the people inhabiting about the marshis of Bodae, to abandon their cities, and to retire themselves for security into the mountains. The Etolians for want of rich prey and booty (which they could not find there) turned from them and marched toward Peribasia. In that quarter they were won by force the City Creticae, and cruelly put it to the ramrack. The inhabitants of Mala were reduced of themselves without compulsion and were received into protection as allies. Out of Peribasia Ammonar was of advice and desirable to march against Compsob, by reason that the country of Achaia was bordered to neer upon that City, and it seemed easy to be forced without much trouble. But the Etolians fingers tickled and itched again to be doing with the rich and fertile fields of Thessalia, and thither went they to raffe booties and take piglages. Achaia followed till for company, albeit he liked well neither of these business of the Etolians thus arrogantly to make rodes and to spoil everywhere: nor of their manner of encamping at adventure, in what places ever they chanced to come, without all discretion, regard, and care of fortifying and guarding the army. Fearing therefore left their inconsiderate rashness and supine negligence, might be an occasion that he, or his should come to a thousand turn, and incur some damage, iped his time; and seeing them to incamp in a plain near to the City Placentum, he took a little Hill little above half a mile off, where both he and his, might with the help of any small guard, lie in security. Now when as the Etolians seemed in manner to have forgotten that they were in the enemies country, but that they drove some booties: whiles they were some of them wandering and itraging, disbanded and half armed, others others within their camp without any corps du garde, swilling and sleeping all night and day long. And made no difference of the times, Philip came upon them before they looked for him. And it being once known by the report of some that fled out of the fields in great affright, that he approached them; Democrates and the rest of the Captains began to quake for fear. Now was it about noon on the day, at what time as most of them having taken their full lode of wine and victuals, lay along fast asleep. Then they fell to awake and raise another, and to give the alarm; anon they sent out every way to call in those that were spreading abroad in the fields; So much they were astonished, that for half many of the horsemen went forth without their swords, and most of them forget to put on their cuirasses. Thus being led out in post haste, and hardly in all foot and horse together able to make up the number of six hundred, they light upon the Kings Cavalry, for number, armour, and courage much better than theirselves; And therefore at the first push were discomfited: for before they were well entered into skirmish, they fled flamefully away toward their camp. Some of them came short thither, and were either slain or taken prisoners, even as many as the Kings horsemen overtook; and got between them and their other companies, Philip, when he saw his men approach near unto their camp, commanded to found the retreat: for both horse and man was weary, not so much with fight as with their long journey and the exceeding speed that they made. Whereupon he gave commandment, that the Horsemen by troops, and the light armed Footmen by their companies and Squadrons should water their horses one after another, and go to their dinner and repast. Others he kept still in armour for a guard attending the Regiment of the footmen, that came but slowly forward, by reason they were heavily armed at all pieces; who being come, they also were enjoyed to pitch down their enigons, and lay their weapons before them, and to take a short bait and halfyittance, pending two or three at the moment out of every band for to water the horses. All this while the horsemen, together with the light armed foilliers, flood well appointed and in readines, if haply the enemy would have given any attempt. The Attolians belovved armed men all about the gates and the rampier, intending to guard and defend their strength and fortifications; for now by this time they also that were scatterd over the fields, had retir'd themselves into the camp. And so long as they beheld the enemies to keep quiet, and not stirr, and were themselves in a sure hold, they made their bravadoes, and were very lutt: but after that the enigons of the Macedonians began to advance forward, and march in order of battle well appointed, close into their trenches at once they abandoned their guards and quarter, and ran out at the back part of their camp; and fled to the foresaid hill, where the Attolians were encamped. Many of the Attolians were likewise in this halfy flight killed or taken prisoners. Philip made no doubt, but that the Attolians also might have been driven from their hold, if there had been day enough behind them, but the day being spent already first in the skirmish, and afterward in the rummaging of their camp, he let him down upon the next plain, hard at the foot of the hill aforecited, intends very early the next morning to affil the enemy. The Attolians stared as much now, as they were before when they quit their own camp, and flee skirmishing away the night following. Here Aminander flou'd them in very good head, by whom good guidance and direction, the Attolians being skilful in the coasts of the country, conducted them into the Attolia, over the high mountains, whereas the enemies followed after them in blind and unknown by-ways. Some few of them hapned in this confused and scattered flight to lose their way and tumble upon the Macedonian horsemen, whom Philip by day light, had sent to cut off the tail of the enemies, so soon as he perceived the hill abandoned. About the very same time, Atheneus as a Captain under the King, overtook the Dardanians as they returned into their country, and at the first put their rearward in disarray. But afterward the Dardanians turned head again, and embattell'd themselves so they fought on even hand, and nothing was won nor lost on any side. The Dardanians began not so soon to advance forward and march on again, but the Kings power, with their horsemen and light armed foilliers came upon them at once, and put them to great trouble. For they had not such means of help, and were besides uncharg'd with heavy armour, and withal, the place gave great advantage to those of the Kings part. Very few were slain more wounded, none at all taken prisoners: but the Dardanians, as not to break out of their ranks and arteries for a little, and upon small occasions, but as they fight close, so they retire together, and part nor. Thus Philip having restrained these two nations, by two brave exploits, which were as happily perfor'd as bravely enterpris'd, recovered the losses again, by him received in the Roman war. There hapned besides another occurrence, which diminish'd the number of his enemies the Attolians. For Scopus, one of the chief noblemen of that nation, being sent from Alexandria by King Philip, with a mighty mass of gold, caried away with him into Egypt five thousand footmen, and certain horsemen, wadged for mony to serve. Neither had he left behind him any of the flour and youth of Attolia, if Democrates had not chastised and rebuked them, and so by that means kept some of them at home; making remonstrances into them, one while of the war that was toward, and another while of the defeation which was like to ensue thereupon. But whether he did this upon a good zeal and care that he had of his country, or only to crofs Scopus, because he had not fed him well with rich rewards and fat presents, it is not known. And thus much concerning the affairs passed between Philip and the Romans for that summer.

The Roman fleet having in the beginning of the same summer committed to Sea from Crete, together with the Lieutenant An, Apollinis passed beyond the point of the cape Malaga, and joyned
A joined with King Attalus, near Scylleum in the territory of Hermione. Then the whole City and State of Athens, upon hope of present aid and succour, brake out and poured forth at once all the hatred and malice which they had conceived against Philip, and which a long time for very fear they had held in, and therefore kept themselves in good and reasonable terms with him. Now in this City there never was prompt and ready tongues to stir up and provoke the common people to a commotion. And as in all free States generally such kind of men are entertained and born out by the favour of the multitude, so in Athens especially, where eloquence is in most request, and beareth great weight. PRETEN. therefore an Act was put up and proposed unto the common people, and by them granted and confirmed, That all the Statutes and Images of King Philip, together with their titles and titles, likewise of all his progenitors and predecessors, as well men as women, should be defaced, pulled down, and destroyed.

B. That all the external dikes, the facvices and fectaries, which had been instituted and ordained for the honor of him, should be defaced, or inscriptions graven to his honour, should be held as detestable and accursed: and that from hence forward, it might not be lawful to set up there any of those things that ought to stand, and be dedicated in a pure and clean place.

C. That the publick Priests of the City, in all their prayers, and so often as they prayed for the good estate of the people of Athens and their allies, for the preservation of their armies and armadoes; should detest and curie by name King Philip, his children and realm, his forces both by land and sea, with all the race and name of the Macedonian nation. Moreover, it ran on in the decree, That if any man from that time forward,

D. would prefer and propose anything that might tend to the disgrace and intamie of Philip, the whole people of Athens should approve and allow the same whatsoever, and make an act thereof. Contrary-wise, if any person lay or do anything for honour, or to impeach and check his dishonour, whosoever should happen to kill the said party, he should be deemed and reputed, that he had killed him justly and lawfully. Finally, this branch was comprised within the decree, That all things ordained in times past against Philip's line and progeny, should be observed and stand in force against Philip. Thus very warred the Athenians against Philip with letters and words: wherein they are very rauant, and to say truth, good at nothing else. But Attalus and the Romans, having from Hermione Chaped their course for Pyreneus, arrived there. And after they had sojourned some few days in Athens, and were laden with a number of decrees, where-in the Athenians recounted the praises and commendations of their allies beyond all measure, like as they had before exceeded in shewing their malice against their enemies; they set sail from Pyreneus to Andros. Where, riding at anchor in the bay called Gaeulzoum, they sent certain men to find the minds of the inhabitants, Whether they would choose to yeeld the Town willingly, or rather abide the hazard of a forcible assault. Who answered again, that the Kings garrison being poptelled of the Castle, and keeping it for Philip, they were not their own masters. Whereupon the King and the Roman Lieutenant set their forces on land, and with all preparation of engines and artillery fit for an assault, approached the City divers ways. The Roman Standards and their arms, not seen before in those parts, the resolute courage also of the soldiery, who so lightly and nimly came neere to scale the walls, terffified and amazed the Greeks, much more than any thing else. Therefore immediately they fled into the Castle, and the enemies were LI. of the City.

E. Now after they had for two days space held out in the forrests, premissing more upon the strength of the place than the force of their armour and weapons: they and the garrison together, comprehended upon the third day to quitt the place, so they might be brought with a convoy to Delium, a Town in Boetia, and every man to have one single suit of apparel. Then the Romans leaving the bare City unto King Attalus, ranfacked it themselves, and took with them all the pillage and ornaments that beautified the same. And to the end, that the Ile should not lie waft and defart. Attalus persuaded the Macedonians in manner all, and certain alfo of the Andrians, there to remain. Afterwards they also who composition were transported to Delium, were by the fair promises of the King drawn away from thence: which they gave ear and credit unto the soonder, for the love of their native country the mis whereof they might hardly brooke. From Andros they crossed to Cythous. There they spent certain days in assaulting the City, to no purpose: and seeing the gains would hardly quit their pains, they departed from thence. Neer unto Pythia (which is a place of Attica within the main) there joined unto the Roman fleet twenty pinnaces of the Ileans, who were sent to rob and spoil the territory of the Carytians: the rest of the fleet remained at Geraulzoum, a noble roade and port of Euboea, until such time as the Ile was returned from Cythous. Then all together they made sail, and passing the mids of the main sea, they fell with the Ile of Icces, neere unto Scyros. There they staid forcertain days, by reason of the raging Northwind: which being once laid and the sea calm again, they passed to Scyathos a City lately pilled and ranfacked by K. Philip. The soldiery ranged over the country, and brought

G. corn with them to their ships; & whatsoever else was fit for mans food. Other booty neither was there any. nor delivered had the Greeks to be spoiled at their hands. Thence they bent their course for Cosandrea: & first they rode at anchor neer unto Mendes, a village situat by the sea side, and belonging to that State. From whence having failed beyond the cape, & desirous to come about with their veffels for to approach the very walls of the City, there arose a tempest & sudden gale: wherein they had like to have been cast away: but scattered they were ainder: & having for the most part lost the tacking of their ships, they escaped with much ado to land. This tempest at sea, was also a fore-token prefaging unto them, that they were to follow the war by land; and to give over sea service. For when they had brought all their ships together and let their men a shore, they asailed the Town: but they had the repulse with many a bloody blow besides (for there was within, a strong garrison of the Kings) whereupon they gave over their enterprise, returned back and sailed over to Campania, a City of Palatine. And having doubled the point of Taurana, they let their course for Aeclhynus. There at first they torraged the territory; then forced the Town, and ranlaced it. And for that their ships had their full fraught and charge of pilgrage, they failed no farther forward, but returned from whence they came to Sicyonius, and from thence to Ebusus: where leaving behind them their main navy, they put in with ten ships lightly appointed, to the Bay or gulf of Malaxa, for to parley with the Aetolians about the whole course and managing of the wars. The chief of this embassage went from the State, was one Sypryphus an Aetolian, who came to Heraclea for to treat and confer about the affairs together with the King and the Roman Lieutenant. They demanded of Attalus by virtue of the accord and agreement before made, to furnish them with a thousand folding: for so many ought he by right to set out and maintain, whenever they were to wage war against Philip. But this demand was denied to the Aetolians: in regard that afoetime they likewise thought much to make a rode to spoil Macedonia, at what time as Philip kept foul work about Perigamus, burning all edifices before him, as well fared as prophane, when they might have drawn him perforce from thence into his own realm to look unto his proper affairs there. Thus the Aetolians were dimissed with more hope than help: for the Romans fed them them only with fair words, and large promies of all things. Then Apollines with King Attalus returned to the fleet.

After this they laid their heads together, and began to consult about the siege and assault of Oreum. A strong City this was both in regard of the walls, and also of a good garrison, by reason that heretofore it had been once asailed. Now there were so fail of Rhodian ships all close covered with hatches and decks, which under the conduct of Captain Agesimenes, had joined with the fleet of Attalus and the Romans, after the winning and conquest of Andros. These ships they sent to lie in the Bay of Zelaius, which is a promontory or cape above the City Demeteris, lying very conveniently over against Pobmia) for this intent, that if the Macedonian ships should come abroad from thence, they might be ready in guard to make fail against them. Heracleas an Admiral for King Philip, lay there at rode with the Navy, attending rather some enterprise by opportunity and vantage of the enemies negligence, than by plain and open force. The Romans and Attalus in the mean time planted their ordinance against Oreum at divers parts. The Romans at the Cattle side that standeth upon the Sea: The King from the vale that lieth between two forts, where as the City is enclosed also with a wall. And as they asailed in sundry places: so their manner of asailing was much different, and their engines divers. The Romans asfayed to approach the wall with torroies, pavoies and mantletes, and to shake it with the Ram: They of the Kings part used Crossbows, Balists, Catapults, and all manner of engines to shoot forth quarrels and darts, yea, and to level and weigh mighty floones of exceeding great weight. They undermined also: and in sum, they practised all means which they faw by experience did good during the former assault and siege. But the Macedonians were not only more in number than the time before to defend the City, but also of better courage and resolution; by reason that the King had rebuked them sharply for their fault padd: and they remembered well both his menaces, and also his promises for the time to come: in so much as the assailants had small hope to win the Town in haft. Mean while the Roman Lieutenant, supposing that some other exploit might be performed, leaving a sufficient number (as he thought) for the finishing of the Fabricks begun and other engines of assaut, put over to the next places of the continent: where he surprized on a sudden Lartia (not that noble and renowned City in Thessaly, but another, which they call Cremoë) and won it, all but the fortresses. Attalus in like fort took Egeleon, fearing nothing less than thus an accident from them that were busie in besieging another Town. By this time, as the engines and other Fabricks without Oreum were at the point of finishing, and ready to perform the battery for which they were made: so the garrison within was overcoiled with continual pain and travail, spent with watching night and day, and faint with many a grievous wound. Moreover, part of the wall, shaken underweath with a butt and push of the Ram, was already fallen down in sundry places: so much as the Romans entred by night at the open breakes, and all the way above the Key, and so were possessed of the Cattle. Attalus likewise by the break of day, after he faw the banner reared upon the fortresses, and the signal which the Romans put forth, entered the City: for now the walls in many places lay along. The garrison and the Townsmen fled to a second citadel that they had, from whence after two days they yeelded. The City was the Kings lot: the bodies of the prisoners were the Romans share. Now drew the sun nearer unto the Aquinoctial line in Autumn, at what time the Eubeian gulf called Calis is dangerous, and not well triested of mariners. Therefore being desrons to be gone into a place of fafe retreat, before the troubled winter weather overtook them, they turned their course and made head to Pyrceum, from whence they came: where Apollines leaving behind him thirty ships, fet a compas about the cape of Malaxa, and failed to Ceryra. But the King played still so long as the festival dayes of Ceris continued, becaufe he would be present at the celebration of those solemnities. After the feast ended, himself likewise retired into Agra: but first he sent Agesimenes and the Rhodians home again. There were the affairs and exploits performed this summer by sea and land, by the Roman Consul, and the Lieutenant General, with the aid of King Attalus and the Rhodians, against King Philip, and his allies.

The other Consul, Aurelius, being come into his Province when the war was brought to an end, could not another and conceal his anger conceived against the Praetor for fighting in his absence. When he had taken order therefore to send him into Etruria, himself with the legions invaded the country of the enemies: where by way of robbing and spoiling he was led so as he got more prey than peace. But L. Furius, seeing there was little to do in Etruria, and withall deific:

gorous rather than his life of a triumph over the Gauls (which he supposed to obtain with more case, while the Consul was absent, who was both angry with him, and also envied at him) arrived at Rome, before any man looked for him; and assembled the Senate in the Temple of Bellona. Where, after he had declared what acts he had achieved, he requested that he might be permitted to ride into the City with triumph. In great credit and account he was with many of the Senators, both for his noble and worthy deeds, in which regard they honoured him: and also for a special favour and love, in which respect they affected him. But the more ancient and elder Senators denied him triumph, as well for that he had warred with the army of another, as also because he had abandoned his own Province, and government, upon a greedy desire to catch a triumph, by Tying his opportunity, and taking advantage: a thing not warrantable by any former precedent or example: And as many of them as had seen Consuls said moreover. That above all things he ought to attend upon the Consul his return. For well might he (lay they) be encamped near unto the City, have defended and guarded the Colony only, and so have drawn the time out until his coming, and never needed to have fought aet b provides for the matter. And although the Praetor for have omitted to do, yet ought not the Senate to follow his example, but expect the Consul. When as therefore they have heard the Consul and Praetor dicating and arguing the matter both together face to face, then they should be able to judge better and more soundly of the case. A great part of the house was of opinion that they ought to look unto nothing else but the service done, and whether he were lawfully called thereto, as a Magistrate of himself, and to manage his affairs by his proper conduct and the guidance of his own fortune. For, of the two Colonies (lay they) which were opposed as two forts and bulwarks to restrain the sudden impressions and tumults of the French: when the one was sacked and burnt, and the same fire like to leap from it to the other so near, (as from house to house that joyn together) D what could the Praetor have done otherwise in that case? For if there might be nothing attempted without the Consul, it must needs follow that either the Senate did amiss in giving the Praetor the charge of the army (for if their will was that the war should be managed not by the Consul but by the Consuls, they might have limited it in the Commision by especial words, expressly forbidding the service to be done by the Praetor, but only by the Consul) or else the Consul hath committed a fault, who having commanded the army to go out of Tuscany into France, came not himself in person to Ariminum to encounter the enemy and be present in that war, which without him might not be lawfully fought. Over and besides, the occasions and leasons of war attend no Staies, and terry for no politick delays of Generals. And otherwhiles, fight a man must, not because a man is willing thereto, but because his enemy puts him to it. To consider, the very battel they felt, and the happy issue thereof, ought only to be considered and regard;

The enemies are defeated and slain: their Camp taken and rancked: the siege raised from the one Colony, and it preferred: the captives of the other recovered and restored to their friends: and to be brief, in one battle the quarrel is decided, and the war finished. And not only men have rejoiced for this victory, but also there have been precedences for three days: in respect of the immortal gods: [For that L. Furius hath managed the Common-wealth well and happily and in great glory.] Finally, the French wars fall by a fatal destiny to the house and race of the Furiis. By these and such like remonstrances alleged by himself and his friends, the majesty of the Consul absent was over-weighed with the favour born to the Praetor prefer. And so in a frequent assembly of Senators a decree was granted, that L. Furius should ride in triumph. Thus triumphed over the Gauls L. Furius Praetor, while he was in office. He brought into the common treasury 37,000,000 Ases, 17,000 pound weight of silver. But neither were there any prisoners led captives in them, no spoils carried in pomp before his chariot, nor yet his foUdiers follwed after. So as it appeared that all other things besides victory alone, pertained properly to the Consul.

After this were the plagues exhibited with great magnificence by P. Cornelius Scipio, which he had vowed in Affric, during his Consulship. Also there past an order for the lands of his foUdiers: That for so long as each one had served in Spain or Affric, he should have two acres for every year: and that these lands should be let out and assigned into them by ten Decemvirs for the purpose deputed. Then were certain Triumphs created for to supply and make up the number of the Roman Inhabitants in Venuia. By reason that during the time of Aurelius his war, the strength of that Colony was much enfeebled and impaired: C. Teccius Florus, T. Quintius Flaminius, and P. Cornelius Scipio the son of Cneo, enrolled new Colonies to inhabit Venuia.

The same year, C. Cornelius Cethegus, who governed Spain as Pro-Consul, did confine a great holt of the enemies in the country of the Sedetans. In which battel, by report, were slain 15,000 Spaniards, and 78 military enligns taken. C. Aurelius, the Consul, when he was returned out.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the two and thirtieth Book.

Many strange and prodigious sights (as they were reported from divers countries) are here related and set down; among which, this is one, that in Macedonia there was a bay tree growing up of itself in the pop of a gallv, T. Quinius Flamininus the Consul fought fortunately against Philip in the sight of Epirus: and having put him to flight, he compelled him to return into his own kingdom, himself with the assent of the .. Atius and Athamas, infilled fire and plagued Thessaly, which had revolted from Macedonia. I. Quinius Flamininus the Consul his brother, by the aid of King Attalus and the Rhodians, made conquest by war at sea, of Euboea and all the sea-coast. The Achaei were received into the city. The confederacy of slaves, that conspired to deliver and set at large the hostages of the Carthaginians, was detected and took no effect. The number of Prati's was scarce 5000. The Consul Cornelius Cæcennus defeated the French Insurabians in pitched battle, League and army was concluded between the Romans and the Macedonians, with their tyrant Nabis. Over and besides, there is contained in this book the winning of many cities in Macedonia.
When the Consul and Praetors were entered into office upon the * Ides of March, they call lots for the government of the Provinces, To L. Lentulus, fell Italy; and to P. Villius, Macedonia. As for the Praetors, L. Quintus had the jurisdiction of the City of Rome, and C. Babinius the government of Ariminum; E. Valerius ruled Sicily, and L. Vibius his lot was to command Sardinia. Lentulus the Consul had order given him to levy new legions and Villius to receive the army of P. Sulpicius, with commission and licence to take up many fouldiers as he thought good himself to furnish the same with a sufficent supply. Those legions which C. Aurelius Consul had in charge, were assigned over to Babinius the Praetor, with condition to keep them with him, until the Consul were arrived in France with a new army; and in so much as he came, to discharge and dismiite all the fouldiers home to their houses except 5000 allies; forasmuch as this number was thought sufficient to govern the Province about Ariminum.

The Praetors of the former year continued still Commanders of their armies. C. Sergius was enjoyned to see and take order, that certain lands should be set out for those fouldiers who had served many years together in Spain, Italy, and Sardinia. And Q. Minutius had in charge to go through with that inquisition of certain conspirators and traitors in the Britains country, upon which he had taken already as Praetor with great fidelity and diligence: and also to lend unto Lepidus for to receive due punishment of those prisoners, whom being attainted and convicted of a crime, he had sent bound to Rome. And finally, to cause all the treasure taken out of the Temple of Proserpina, to be restored thither again, with an over-entreaty, to make satisfaction and to raise out the wicked part committed. The Latinefeats and holy-dates were solemnized again by virtue of an ordinance of the Bishops, upon this occasion. That certain Embassadors from Attal was complained in the Senat, how they had not their ordinary allowance of flesh at the Latinefeats aforesaid in the mount Alban, according to the old custom, News came from Sestri, that two of their city-gates, and all the wall between was assaulted with lightning. Messengers also from Formia reported that their Temple of Jupiter was likewise blasted. Moreover, they of Opis brought a word of the like mischief with them in the Church of Jupiter. And from Velitrae tidings came of the like mischief, fallen upon the Temples of Apollo and Sanguis. And that in the Temple of Hercules there sprung up a bush of hair. Letters came also from Q. Minutius the Pro-Praetor out of the Britains country, that there was a colt foaled with five feet, and three chickens hatched with three feet asleep. After all this, P. Sulpicius the Pro-Praetor sent letters from out of Macedonia, containing among other matters this news, that there was a Laurel tree grew of itSelf in the poop of a galley.

The Senat in regard of all the former prodigious sights, ordained, that the Consul should sacrifice greater beasts, unto what gods he thought good: but about this last rehearsed, the Soothsayers that pry into beasts inwards, were sent into the Senat-houfe; and by direction of their answer, an Edict went forth, That the people should go in procession, and make supplications one day, and in all Temples and Altars of the gods there were sacrifices celebrated with great devotion.

The Carthaginians this year came to Rome with the first payment of the tribute imposed upon them: and for that the treasurers and receivers of the City made report, that the silver was not good and lawful, and being brought to the treasurers, was found too light by one fourth part wash'd away those Carthaginians were constrained to take up money of the bankers of Rome, and to make good the defect and loss of the silver above said. They put up a petition besides unto the Senat that it might stand with their good pleasure to re-deliver now their holigies. Whereupon an hundred of them were rendred back, and good hope was of the rest, to be continued.

When they made a farther request in behalf of those holigies which were not deliv'd, that they might be transported from Norba (where they were not to their good liking and ease) to some other place, granted it was, that they might remove to Signia and Feronien. In like fort, the Gadiitans made humble suit, and obtained this liberty, that there should not be sent from the Romans a captain to govern Gödes, anything to the contrary in their covenant (concluded with L. Murtius Septimius, when they yielded themselves under the sujection of the Romans) notwithstanding. Moreover, forasmuch as the Embassadors of Norba made complaint, that they had not their full number of inhabitants, and that there were certain fugitifs entring amongst them, not of their own nation, who bore themselves as Coloniers; therefore L. Cornelius the Consul was commanded to create three Deputies or Commissioners, called Tribunies, for to reform this disorder, and chosen there were for that purpose, Publius and Scipio Aelia, who had both of them the surname of Patius, and C. Cornelius Lentulius. This that was granted to them of Norba, was denied to the Embassadors of Coffs, who likewise requested that the number of their inhabitants might be encreased.

The affairs thus finished at Rome, that there were to be done, the Consuls went into their several Provinces. P. Villius so soon as he was arrived in Macedonia, was welcomed at his first coming with a dangerous mutiny of the fouldiers, which long store being kindled, was not well quenched. at the first beginning, there were those two thousand, which after the defeat of Annibal, were first sent out of Africa into Sicily; and from hence, a year after almost, transported into Macedonia for voluntary soldiers: but they so far prevailed that they were not shipped by their Colonels and Tribunes full against their wills. And howsoever it was, whether they served willingly or unwillingly, it was but for the common interest, that the time of their fouldiers should run out, and their service have an end at length. Alluding, that for these many years they had not seen Italy; that they waxed old men under their harness, having born arms in Sicily, in Africa, and in Macedonia: that with toil and travel so tedious, they were weak and feeble; and after so many wounds and hurts received, they had no more blood to lose. The Consuls made them answer, that their cause was good and reasonable, but rather in the handling; and meet the thought of it, that they should be dismissed, if they could have requested it in moderate terms: but neither is, nor any cause else whatsoever was warrantable to make a mutiny and sedition. Therefore, if they could content to keep to their colours, and be at command as loyal fouldiers, he would in their behalf write his letters unto the Senate, as touching their commissary and disposition: for he well assured, that they should get more by lobers and gentle behaviour, than by any such stubborn, sordid, and wilful demeanour.

At the same time Philip sailed the City of Thessalicae with terraces and mantelets in all forcible manner, so that he was now at the point to batter & shake the wall with the ram. But the sudden arrival of the Macedonians enforced him to surcease the enterprise: who by the conduct of Archidamus having called through the midst of the Macedonian guards, & entered the town, never ceased day nor night to make failest with one while upon their standing watch, other whilsts upon theirke"}

The fight of the city Thessalicae. * Amiable, or moneterull.
A aloof, the royal pavilion of the king himself was pitched before the rampier upon a bank in a most conspicuous place of open sight, for to terrify the enemy, and also to encourage and hearten his own men, when they should see him to confide and to follow. The consul advantized by Gracchus the Epirus, what paragings the king with his army was posted off; after he had passed the winter in Corcyra, himself likewise in the beginning of spring, went up into the main land, and held on his march toward the enemy. And being advanced almost within the miles of the Kings' camps, he left his legions in a strong fended place, and went himself in person forward with certain lighty appointed in epistles to discover the quarters; and then, too, through held a consultation, whether he might do better to fight his way through the place which the enemy kept, not considering how he saw evidently before his eyes great trouble and hazard in that adventure; or to bring his army about and lead it a comp the same way, whereas the year before Sulperius entered into Macedonia. This deliberation him for certain days in due balance and suspense, until news came unto him that T. Quinctius was elected consul; and having the Province of Macedonia allotted unto him made haste thither and was already passed to Corcyra.

Valerius Antias writeth how Vitulus was entred the pas before & because he could not take the straight and direct way (by reason that the king and his forces had betet all places followed the valley along through the middle whereof the river Aruns runneth and having made a bridge over it, in great haste passed over the bank, whereas the king was encamped, and there fought a battle: wherein the king was didi omitted and put to flight, and driven out of his camp; that 3,000 enemies were slain in that conflict. 2,000 taken prisoners, 1,525 enigns won and carried a way besides 2,000 horse. Also that during the conflict there was a Temple vowed unto Jupiter, in case the Consil sped well in the battle. But all other writers both Greek and Latin, at all whose hands I have read, report that Vitulus performed no memorable act, and that the Consil T. Quinctius who next proceeded took in hand the whole and entire war himself.

Whiles things so pised in Macedonia, the other Consil L. Lentulus who flaid behind at Rome, held a general assembly for the election of Censors: And among many famous and noble perfomers who vied for that dignity, P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, and P. Aemilius Paetus were the Censors. These two ag eing together in great conford, both elected: Scaurus without deeming any person; and also formed out the toll for portage of all things that were sold at Copon: Item, they let & to farm let the uffome for passage that way whereas the camp stood and where now there is a town built and enclosed three hundred Colones (for that number was limited by the Senate) there to inhabit. They sold all the lands of Copon lying under the hill of Palaia.

About the same time L. Mucius Acilus departed out of Spain, and was prohibited by M. Porcius Loca a Tribune of the Commons, to enter at his returninto the city with the solemn pomp of an Oration notwithstanding he had that honour granted by the Senate. So he came into Rome as a private person and brought into the Chamber of the City 2,000 pound weight of silver, and thirty pound weight well-near of gold. The same year Cn. Batinus Laophatius, who had received the Province of France from C. Aemilius the Consil of the former year, engaged himself rashly within the marches of the French Inhabitants, and was enviroined and enclosed round about, both he and in manner his whole army, he left above 6600 men. See what an overthrow was received in a war, whereat there was no confoning made, and from when no danger was feared any more. This caused L. Lentulus the Consil to come unto the city of Rome, who being arrived into a province of trouble and tumult after he had received the three E. stripped and disarmed a man gave the praetor a great check and rebuke, & took him up Junily with reproachable terms, and commanded him to get him gone out of the Province, and to repair to Rome. Neither performed the Consil himself any exploit worthy of remembrance by reason that he was made home to Rome for to hold the solemn election of Magistrates: which also was laid by M. Fulvius and M. Curtius Tribunes of the Commons: who likewise would not suffer T. Quinctius Flamininus, having been but Quozil for to stand for a Consilship. Now adays, saythey, the dignities of Ediles and Praetors are sought for, and not worth the seeking for: and these noblemen will needs mount into the Consilis place, not by fleps and degrees of other offices, whereby they should make proof and give good testimony what their carriage is, but leaping over those in the midst, joyed the lowest and highest together. This debate which began in Martis field in the assembly of the people, came at length to be decided before the Senate. And the L. ordained, That forasmuch as he which voted for that dignity, was by law capable thereof, it was reason that the people should have plenary and absolute power to create him, or whomsoever else they pleased: so the Tribunes submitted themselves under the authority of the Senators. And for Cill, were elected Sex. Albius Porcius, and T. Quinctius Flamininus, Then elected the election of the Praetors, in which were created C. Cornelianus Merulas, M. Claudianus Marcellus, M. Porcius Cato, and C. Heliacus, who had been Ediles of the Commons: By whom the Plebeian plains were received, and a solemn fact made in the honour of Jupiter in regard of those places. The Curule Ediles likewise c. Valerius Flaccus, who also was the Flaminian Disilis or Priest of Jupiter, and C. Cornelius Celsus, either agree betwixt themselves, or else cast lots whether of them should govern the one or the other: And that he, whole hap was to have the charge of Macedon, should enroll of Romans three thousand foote, and three hundred horsemen: Aio of Latine allies five thousand foot, and five hundred horset; for to supply and furnish the legions. And for the other Conui, it was decreed, that he should have an army all entire and new. L. Lentulus the Conui of the former years; continued till Governour in the Provinces with express commandment, that neither himself should leave the government, nor withdraw his forces from thence, before the Conui were come with the new legions. So the Conui referred themselves to the direction of the lots. To Aelius fell Italy: and Macedon to Quintius. As for the Pratours, who all were guided by lots, L. Corelius Merulla had the jurisdiction of the City of Rome. M. Claudius governed Sicily. To M. Perclus was allotted Sardinia, and C. Helvius his lot was to be L. Deputy in Gaul. After this they began to take mutiners. For over and besides the Conui, the Pratours alo were charged to levy souldiers. To Marcellus were assign'd four thousand foote of Latine allies, and three hundred horsemen to go into Sicily, and for Cato three thousand foot of the same kind of souldiers with two hundred horse to serve in Sar'dinia: upon condition, that when both these Pratours were come into their Provinces they should discharge all the old souldiers there, as well foote as horsemen.

Then the Conui granted the Embassadors of King Attalus leafe to come into the Senate house: where having audience given them, * after they had declared how their King and Maiter had affidur'd the State of Rome with his forces as well by sea as land, and shewd himself cheerfull, ready, and obedient to this present day for to execute and perform whatsoever the Roman Conui had enjoyned him to do: they laid now that they much feared lef from hence forward he would not be able to do the same by reason he was impeach'd by Antiochus. For Antiochus taking his vantadge, and finding the realm of Attalus dishonour'd of garrisons, and unprovided of forces both by sea and land, had invad'd the same. For which occasion Attalus begu'd the L.L of the Senat there assembled, that they minded to use his navy, and employ the means that he could make, in the service of the Macedonian war: they would then lend him a sufficient garrison to defend his kingdom: but if they thought not well thereof, their request was to permitt him to return with his fleet and other forces to the defence of his own. The Senat gave order to return this answer unto the Embassadors: Whereas King Attalus had succour'd the Roman Captains with his Armado and other means of war, the Senat accepted thereof in the bell part. But as touching Antiochus the King, anally and friend of the people of Rome, they neither would send any aid against him: nor yet detain the aids of King Attalus in any service of theirs, longer than the King himself should think it fit with his own comodity. For the manner of the people of Rome hath always been to serve their own turn with the help and alliance of others, yet at the good pleasure & discretion of others. And whooeuer were willing to relieve the Romans, they were at their own liberty to begin and end when they would themselves. Howbeit they purposed to address their Embassadors unto Antiochus to advertise him and let him understand, that the people of Rome employed the help of Attalus his ships and souldiers against Philip a common enemy: and the Senat would take it kindly at his hands, if for theirakes he tolerate the Realm of Attalus, and abstained from war. For meet and reasonably it was, that the Kings who were friends and allies to the people of Rome, should likewise enter into peace and amity among themselves.

T. Quinuin the Conui made haste to be gone into his Province: and when he had leaved and mustered his forces, so as he had enrolled those old experienced servitors for the most part, who had given good proof of their valour in the service of Spina and Affrick, he was detained fo long at Rome by occasion of certain prodigious signs reported, until he had taken order for the appeaing of the gods, and expiation of them. The lightning forshed and blasted the great portway from Venet the Common Hall likewise of publicke assemblies, and the Temple of Jupiter in Leumunio; also the Temple of Heracles in Ardeis: the walls beside and turrets of Capua, and the Temple there which is called Aem. At Arceum the sky appeared to be on a light fire. At Veneti the earth felted and sunk down, leaving a great gaping chink for the compass of three acres of ground. Word moreover was brought that in Sufia Arvunc a lamb was yeaned with two heads; and in Sulla a porcher with a mans head. In regard of these prodigies, there was a procession and supplication one whole day, and the Conui intended devoutly to their faccients. And after they had pacified the gods, they took their journey into their Provinces. Eliciu, together with C. Helviius the Pratour went into France and gave unto the said Pratour the army which he receiv'd L. Lentulus, and should have dismissed and discharge of their service; because he purposed himself to employ in his own wars the fresh and new legions which he brought with him: but he performed no action worth the report. The other Conui T. Quinuin having taken the sea, and departed from Brundisium sooner than other Conui were wont, arrived at Coreya O with eight thousand foot, and eight hundred horse. From thence he crost the seas with a galley of five tanks of oars, directing his course for the nearest coasts of Epirus, and by great journeys made haste until he was come to the Roman camp: from whence after he had licenc'd Pliinis to depart, and laid there some few daies, until his forces which were at Coreya could overtake him, he called his Council together to resolve, Whether he should keep on his journey directly, and make way through the midst of his enemies where they lay encamp'd, or rather without any fish Attacking (which could not but carry with it great pain and peril) fetch a compact about with facility, and to enter into Macedonia by the way of the Dardaniots country and Locris. And verily, this latter course of the twain had taken place, but that he feared, when he were retired once far from the sea, and had let the enemy slip out of his hand—li as the King happily were minded (as he had done before) to defend himself within the deserts and forests, that he should spend all the long summer, and do no good. Therefore come what would did he resolve to affaire the enemy in that very place as difficult as it was, with all the disadvantage whatsoeuer. But as they determined in their intention thus to do, so they were not so ready in the means to execute and effect the same. Thus they fast till and spent to try dates within the eye of the enemy, and made no attempt.

Then Philip conceived some hope to affaire a peace, by the mean and intercession of the Epipolæ nation. And after consideration had, there were certain agents chosen for that purpose to wit, Simonianus the Prætor, and Alexander Gepellan of the horse, who brought the Conful and the King together for to parle unto a place whereas the river Axios was not too wide, and the banks nearest together. The demands of the Conful in these were these: That Philip should remove his garrisons out of the Cities Ionæ. That which territories or towns he had pill'd and spoileth, he should make restitution again unto them all those things that were extant and to be found: as for the rest, they should be priz'd and valued indifferently to their worth. Philip made answer again, Thus all those pieces were not of like quality and condition. As for such as he had taken himself, he would be content to let them at liberty: but for those that were left unto him by his progenitors and predeceivers, he would not lose the possession thereof, since he held them lawfully in right of inheritance. Finally, if those Cities wherewith he had wrack'd men complaint, that they were ever endanger'd by him, he would report himself to what Cities and States they would themselves, and stand to their award in they were neuters. or in peace as well with the one as the other. The Conful hereupon replied and said, That for this matter it was needless to refer them elcs to the arbitrement or doom of any. For who feeth not evidently (quoth he) that he hath done the wrong who hath took arms? And that Philip before ever that he was molested and troubled by any war from others, offered violence first unto all? After, when it was debated what Cities should best meet the Conful named first of all Thebæ and Athens, which word the King was in it a heat of choler that he cried out aloud: What harder condition O Quintus would you impose upon him that you had conquistet? and withall, he flung away in a chafe from off the place of meeting and entrance, and would no longer parle. And much ado they had on both sides to hold their hands from shoving one at another, for the river ran in the midle between them that they could not try it out by the ears. The morrow after there passed many light skirmishes between the epig. de guard upon both parts by way of excursions, full in a plain that lay our broad enough for that purpose: but afterwards the Kings men retir'd themselves into the narrow frowns and rough rugged places, the Romans of an argent defete to be fighting, entered thereupon. The Romans had on their side the benefit of good order and military discipline and were furnished with such kind of weapons as were fittest to maintain a skirmish in a just batall. The enemies again for their parts had the vintage of the ground, and the help of sundry engines to cast forth their fire off (as ballist and catapults) planted and range almost upon every hill and rock as it had been upon the walls of a City. After they had on both sides given and taken many a wound, so as divers of them were left dead on the earth, as if they had length in a full battall the night at length parties of both sides stood.
he made unto him many fine and large promises if it might appear, that he meant truth, and dealt faithfully; howbeit in the mean time he delivered him bound to the custody of the said Colonel. When their companies were thus sent away, the Roman General travelled and endeavoured to much the more to gain vantage of the enemies guards. All this while the Romans that were left out with the Colonel, marched forward: and upon the third day, when they had given token by smoke, that they had won the pitch of the hill as they intended, and had set fill; then the Comil divided his forces into three squadrons and entered the midst of the valley with the main strength of his army, but he led forth the wings of his battalion, both the right and the left, against the very camp of the enemies, who also for their parts were not behind to be encountered and receive him. And all the while that they advanced without their fortifications; of defence upon a hot desire of conflict it fell out, that the Romanoulter had the better a good deal, as being more valourous, more skillful, and better appointed with weapons for that kind of service. But after that the Kings followed, so many were round or killed outright, retired themselves to places of safety, either by natural situation or by art of man the danger returned upon the Romans heads, who inconsiderate were engag'd into places of disadvantage, and into narrow frequents, from whence they could not retire with safety. And surely they had not returned back again unprovided for their safety but that the Kings men hearing hit an onency behind their backs, and seeing also a skirmish began, were attuned at the sudden terror, and put besides themselves. Some fled here and there away, others that made a stand and entered fill, for that they rather were wond'red to flie than that had heart enough to fight it out, were environ'd by their enemies both before and behind. The whole army might have been utterly defeated, if the winners had but ill followed the chase. But the straights and the roughness of the ways hindered the horse, and the weight of armor confounded the footmen. At first the King rode again with bridle in horse neck, without regard of any thing, or looking behind him: but after he was got five miles before &2 gueffing (as it was indeed) that by reason of the disadvantage of the place the enemy could not possibly make way after he refueled upon a certain mount, and sent his people all abroad over hills and dales, to rally his soldiers together that were dispers'd. Thus with the lost not all out of two thousand men the rest of the multitude met together, as if they had repaired to a Redresed and taken their stand &2 form'd with a great train into Thrif. The Romans prud'd them afar they might with safety, killing them, and rifing the deadsmen and manac'd the Kings camp which though it were not naked without defendants, yet for the difficulty aces into it, they had much trouble to win: & that night large they lodg'd in their own camp, The next day the Comil in de pursuit after the enemy along the straights, whereas the river ran through among the villages, The King came the fifth day into the hold or camp of Pyrrhus (a place so called in Triphila, belonging to the territory of Molus) From whence the sword, after he had matched a mighty journey with his whole army (for needs he, must go that fear drives) & approach'd the mountain Longus. These Mountains are in Epom, situated between Macedon and Thrif. The side that lieth to Thrif regards to the East: that which breadth upon Macedon hath the North directly before it. Covered they are and overspread with abundance of woods; yet so as the very tops do afford open and running waters. The King keeping his camp there for certain dates, was much troubled and perplex'd in his mind, looking and revolving whether it were expedient or him to return immediately into his own kingdom, or possible M to retire himself into Thrif. In him, his resolution was to bring down his army into Thrif. And so to the rear he matched the next way he possibly could. From then he passed in great haste through all the Cities that were in his way. As many men as were able to follow, he forced to quit their habitations and dwelling houses, The towns he set on fire yet he permitted every one to carry away with him as much as he could of his own good; all the rest fell to the followers there. No manner of cruelty there was, that the very enemy could exercise, but he practis'd among his own allies, and Philip himself in the execution thereof, grieved not a little, and was vexed at the heart, but as he could do no other yet his deserv'd was in that country which in a while should be possest by the enemy to lose the bodies at least of his auxiliates. In this manner were ranvixed & spoil'd those towns following Phocis, Tegea, Eurylium, Epirus, & Palamium. Against his coming to Pher the gates were shut upon him, And because it would some time to win that town by assault and no leisure he had thereto, he gave over that enterprise & pass'd into Macedon for the bruit went that the Etruscans also approch'd. Who having heard of the whole of the battalion fought by the river. The first waited and ranac'd all the country near unto Speeath and Muse Camp (as they call it) and having from thence pass'd over into Thrif, at Cymis and Agoris with the first assault, Howbeit, a repulse they took at Metropolis, whiles they harried the fields about it by reason that the towns men ran together to the defence of their walls. After this they gave the stress upon Callibea. where they found the like resistance and violence of the enemies, but they there perished longer, and gave not over, still, they drove the enemies that fled forth within their walls, and contesting themselves with that viciosis they depart out thence seeing no great hope to force the town, Then they won and pillag'd two villages Themam and Alumnae, As for Aphrodis, it was investibly by composition, And upon the like fear It was abandoned of her own inhabitants, These Citizens thus driven out of their own houses, humbled as a venture upon a garrison which was a leading into Athenia, for the better guard of the foragers that were to purvey corn. This multitude, I say, marching disorderly without armour, fell into together, with a sort that were unmeet for war, was hewn in pieces by by the armed souldiers, and Xyane was latched, thus left and forsaken as it was. After this, the Etrians won Cypbaria, a fort and town of strength, well fitted for to emeape and command. D. A

Thee exploits performed the Etrians hastily, all in few days.

Neither rified Ammander nor the Athaman quiet and still, after they heard the news of the prosperous battle which the Romans had fought, but Ammander replying small triumph in his own his own hand, crevied on the Conful a small supply of other forces: and as he marched toward Gomphus, he surprized forthwith and forced a town named Plata, situated between Gomphus and the straits that divide the Sees from Athamanis. From thence he advanced before Gomphus, and assailed the town, which was defended right valiantly, for certain days: but after that he had erected scaling ladders against it, he took the townmen within, for very year to yield and render all to his \n \n
B hands. The surrender of this City terrified the Thebians exceeding; y in such sort, that the Citizens of Argeta, Phleum, Thelaum, Lida, Tham, Simon, and Lampessum, one after another submitted themselves, with other pieces thereof of small importance.

While the Athamanians and Etrians (secured from all danger of the Macedonians) made spoil and raised again to themselves by the victory of others: whilst Thessaly was pillaged and sacked by three armies at once, and knew not their friends from their foes, nor whom to trust the Conful palled over into the country of Epirus, by the way of the straits which he had opened and made大切 by reason that the enemies were fled. And albeit he knew full well which way all the Etrios in general went, and with whom they had sided. Excepting only the Timion and Locrus, yet because he saw them not only carefully to make amends and satisfaction, but also willing and forward to do whatsoever he commanded, he esteemed and regarded them by their present state, more than by their demoral plight, and to by sweeping himself inclined to mercy and ease to pardon a fault, he won their hearts, and gained them him to the for the time to come. After this he dispatched messengers to Locrus, to will that the hark and ships of burden should put into the gulf of Aembracia, whilst himself travelled by easy journeys; and the fourth day after pitched his tent upon the hill: Cereus: and thither he sent for Ammander to repair with his aids, not for any need he had of his forces, so much as of his guidance to direct him in his journeys for Thessaly. Most of the Epirios also, for the same intent were received, who voluntarily offered their help and assistance. The first City that he afforded in Thessaly was Phaleria, wherein there lay a garrison of two thousand Macedonians. Who at first held out and resisted most manfully, and as much as each arm or the walls were able to do, defended themselves. But the affrt & battery continuing incessantly both night and day, overcame at length the constant and resolute jaw of the Macedonians. And who the Conful made this resounding. That upon this point depended the hearts and dispositions of all the other Thessaliens: if the first should not able to subdue the violence and force of the Romans, Phaleria was no sooner won, but there came Embassadors from Metopota and Perea to render up their Cities into his hands, who raved pardon and obtained it. Phaleria was burnt and laded. From thence he set forward to Epirus, but seeing the place defensible with any small garrison and in manner impregnable, he bestowed some small force of his upon the next cap de guart, and turned his army toward the country against Gomphus, and from whence he marched down into the Plains of Thessaly, and set up his camp. And he was left as an army, was disturbed of all necessaries, for that he had forborne to make spoil in the territories of the Etrians, after he had sent out espials, to discover whether the hands above said were a riced at. Lacho or Epirus, he sent out his companies one after another to Aembracia, to procure corn and victuals. The way between Gomphus and Aembracia, as it is mountainous and hard to passage, so again, it is but short and very comprehensible. So that within few days he had transported certain conscripts of victuals from the port of Gomphus, where the camp was stored with plenty of all provision. From thence he palled to Rhages, a town at ten miles distant from Larissa, The city and country of which were defended from Perylia, and the City itself seated upon the river Peneus. The Thebians were nothing afraid at the first coming of the Romans. As for Philip, like as he durst not him self in person march forward into Thessaly, to have taken a place within Tempe, and even as he could find opportunity and advantage, sent underhand succour and relief thither accordingly.

Much about the same time that the Conful first encamped against Philip in the straits of Epirus, L. Quintras also, the Conful his brother, who by commision from the Senat had the charge of the fleet and the government of all sea-coasts, failed beyond Corcyra with two Gallesse of five banks of oars: and hearing that the navy was departed from thence, seeing also there was no staying there, he made sail after space, and having overtaken them at the ile Zima he di miffed Apfins in a whole place he succeeded: from thence he went fair & foilly hailing after him the most part of the ships which he followed with the provision of victuals, until he came to M. A. From thence, when he had given order, that the rest should make as good speed as possibly they could alter him, he went with three Quinqueremes lightly appointed, and arrived before at Pyramus, where he received the other ships that L. Apfins the Lieutenant had left there for the guard and defence of Aetolias.

At the same time there were two Armadoes set out of Asia, the one conducted by King Antialus, confining of four and twenty fail of Quinqueremes; the other were of Rhodians, and stock of twenty corvet ships with decks and hatches, commanded by Agesilomas the Admiral. These

These fleets joyning together about the [Island] Andros, crossed the narrow seas from thence to [Island] Euboea. And first they foraged the territory of the Caryatians: afterwards seeing Carthage strong enough against them by reason of agarrison lent to them in all haste from Chalcedon, they approach-ed to [Island] Etruria, L. Quinctius having intelligence that King Attalus was come, repaired thither also with those vessels which had been at Pyrrhus, and gave commandment, that as many ships as arri ved thither belonging to his fleet, should bend their course for Euboea. Now was Etruria by all forcible means allured, for not only the vessels of those joynt navies had brought thither all forts of engines and artillery devised to shake and batter: the walls of Cities, but also the fields and country hard by, yielded them plenty of timber, and other matter to make new. The towns-men from the very first day shewed no valour and courage in defending their walls: and afterwards when they were wearied, and some of them hurt, and saw withall a part of their wall overthrown by the ordnance and engines of the enemy, enclin'd to yield: but they had amongst them a garrison of Macedonians, whom they feared no leas than the Romans. Moreover, Philoctet a Captain under the King sent messengers unto them from Chalcedon, affuring them, that if they could hold out still and endure the siege, he would in good time be with them, and bring relief. Thence hope and fear together constrained them to drive off longer than either they were willing or well able to do. But when they heard once that Philoctet had a regale by the way, and in great haste and fear was retired and fled to Chalcedon again, then immediately they sent their Embassadors unto Attalus, to crave pardon and protection. Whiles they were wholly bent to seek peace (whereof they had some hope) and forelacked the affairs of war-service, opposing their corpore guard on that side only of the wall where the breaches were, and neglecting all besides, behold, Quintinius in the night-leafon gave a camillasso in that quarter which was least suspected, and with scaling-ladders won the town. The whole multitude of the inhabitants fled with their wives and children into the Cattle, whic also afterwards was rendred up. As for money, gold, and silver, there was no great store to speak of: but Images, and painted tables of antique work, artificially wrought, and such like ornament, there were more found, than for the proportion of the bignes, of other wealth besides, of such a City as that was. From thence they sent two regale again for Carthage, where the whole multitude, before the enemies were put on land, having abandoned the City, were fled into their forterefs: from whence they sent their Orators unto the Roman General, humbly craving their mercifull protection. The towns-men presently had their lives and libertie granted them. But the Macedonians were put to their ransom, and they compounded to pay three hundred sil-L everefettus apace, and to give up their armour and weapons, and lo to depart: With this sum of money having redeemed them selves they were set out disarmed into Bithynia. These forces at sea having in few days gained two noble and renowned Cities in Euboea, called about Sestium, a promontory or cape within the territory of Attica, and arrived before Cenebora, a town of mer-chandise and traffic belonging to the Corinhians.

The Conful all this while had a longer and more dangerous piece of service in the siege (of Rhages) than all men looked for. And the enemies within made resistance, where he would have leATURE hid all suspected. For he suppoeted verity that all the trouble and difficulty would be in battre-ting down the wall, & making some breach. For this he thought that it he had once opened way for his armed loundiers to enter into the town, the enemies afterwards would either flee or be bestrafed as it fialfe on commonly in Cities when they are forced. Howbeit, when part of the wall by the battery of the Ramayl flat on, and the enemies were get over at the breaches & ruins there of; then began their labour and pains anew, as if they had had no trouble not to afor. For the Macedonians in garrison, who were many in number, and those approved and selecte loundiers, thinking how honourable a service it would be to defend the City by valour and dint of sword, rather than by the strength of walls had ranged themselves in a batteriwell strongly marshalled into many ranks and files close together: and when they perceived the Romans were mounting o-ver the breaches to enter the City, they repelled and beat them back in that place of great disad-vantage, where they had much ado to recover and retire themselves. The Cof, hereat was much dis-pleased, and vexed himself: and making this account, that such a foul foil and disgrace was not only an example of a longer tract of time, before he could force that one City; but also material and important for the main progress and proceeding of the whole war, which commonly de-pended upon the occurrences of light matters and of small moment in the beginning: after he had rid and cleansed the place which was chock'd up with the ruins of the half-broken wallying there upon hamps, he raised a tower or frame of timber of a huge height to overtop the walls, confiding of many stories and floors one over another, which contained and carried a mighty number of armed men, and drove the same upon wheels and rollers close to the wall. Moreover he sent out certain enjings one after another by turns, to break through by force (if it were possible) that strong and close barraiion of the Macedonians (which they themselves call Phalanx). But the place being go freight (for that the breach of the wall was nothing broad) the enemies had the vantage both in regard of the weapons which they used, and of the form of battle wherein they were ranged. For when the Macedonians standing close one to ano-ther with continued roof or fence of targets over their heads, opposed their pikes before them which were of an exceeding length: the Romans neither with their darts could hurt them al fir, nor with their swords drawn come near them to fight close at hand, or cut their pikes in two: and if it chance that they whipt off or shape any alander, yet the steel and truncheon there-thereof being sharp still at the point (headles though it were) among the other pikes that were headed, served to make a fence as it were an hay or palisado. Over and besides that part of the wall that, solid whole and sound still, was a true defence unto both the fronts of the enemies: neither had the Romans any room at length to return, and from thence to letch their beir, and to give a violent charge which is the thing, that usually breaks and disconcerts ranks. Moreover, there chance one thing by mere fortune that encouraged them within a sensor as the tower before said was in driving over a terrace or bank whereof the floor was not flat and soundly hardened with the rammer, one of the wheels happened to sink in and make a deep rong in the ground, whereby the whole frame, nodded to forward that the enemies without thought verily it was ready to fall, and the armoured fouldiers standing upon it within masked for fear, and were put well near besides their wits.

Thus when nothing that was provided might avail and come to any great effect, the Conful was vast at the heart, and rose him elbo over mixed in fouldiers, in armours, and in manner of service and with all he had that he had not to force the City and to win it in any short time, nor could make means to pass the winter in those parts far from sea, and left naked already and wale by those calamities that follow wars. Whereupon he raised the siege: and because there was to have in all the trial and coast of Acarnania and Aetolia, which was able both to serve and harbour all his ships that brought victory to his army, and also to yield winter lodging for his legions, he thought upon the Illyria Aetiae within the country of Phocis, which lying toward the gulph of Corinth, seemed to him most fit and commodious to his purpose; because they should not remove far from Teffalon, and the territories belonging to the enemies having besides Illyria a front over which against them, divided by a small arm of the sea: at their back Aetolia and Acrania and of each side Locri and Batha. At the first assault, the Conful without any relation won Panoplia in Phocis. Aetiae, likewise long endured not the siege. Then Ambrose and Haemulus were received by cold position, Darius by reason that it was situated upon a high hill which neither could be scaled nor forced by instruments and engines of battery. But the Romans by lancings their darts and shooting arrows against them that were in guard, trained them forth to skirmish: and alter some light rushings to no effect, whilst one while they seemed off, and other whilsts to pursue, they brought them to be to caelest to neg leg and to let escape, that when the enemies fled back within the gate, they entered perilous with the people to be Masters of the town. Other small forts likewise of Phocis yielded rather for less than any force offered unto them. Elseis kept their gates shut and made a counterenemey, that under that were driven thenceunto, they would receive within their walls neither Roman captain nor any.

While the Conful lay at the siege before Aetolia, there was presented unto him the hope of a greater matter, namely of withdrawing the nation of the Abbe from the Kings alliance to the enemy of the Romans. For they had expelled and banished Cybeleus the chief of that faction that sided with Philip and Aristopenes who intended the Romans and sought to be confedered with them was Pastor for the time.

Now the Romans agreed together with Aetolis and the Rhodians, rode at anchor in the haven of Thessalon, and they all were agreed in common to assail Corinth. But the Conful thought good, before that they should make that designment in action to send Embassadors to the State of Abbea, promising them that they would send him from the King and turn to them to deliver Corinth into their hands. By the same a league into the ancient league and council of their nation, and to by the same of the Conful, there were Embassadors sent to the Abbea from his brother L. Quinctius, from Aetolis, the Rhodians and the Athenians, and at that very day there was a Council and Embassadors held for to give them audience. Now the Athenians were not all one mind and alike affected. The Athenians (a dangerous and continual enemy of theirs) put them in fear of a conspiracy: the Romans they had in dread and honour of another. To the Macedonians they were obliged and bound by many good turns and favours, as well old as new. The X. himself they held in jealousy for his cruelty and treachery: and calling a proof and confinour by those couples which he then took and by his practices for the time they foreknew that after the war ended he would be inolerable and a very tyrant over them. They were besides not only ignorant, what every man had laid in the several counsels of every particular State, and in the general Diers of the whole nation, when they were required to declare their opinions; but also uncertain and unversed among themselves in their own minds what to will or wish. Unto men thus doubtful did express and undeceived, the Embassadors above said were admitted, and senee was given them to declare their message. For the Roman Embassadors L. Calpurnius, after him, thole that were for King Abbea, and in the third place, the Rhodians spoke and made discours: and consequently, the Embassadors of Philip were permitted to part. The Athenians had audience given them of all, and were referred of purpose to confute whatsoever she should be spoken and alleged by the Macedonians. And these Athenians in eigne made sharp and bitterly against the King: none had received either: more wrongs, or suffered the like indignities at his hands as they had. So this assembly verily for that time, by reason that the day was spent in hearing the continued orations of so many Embassadors) broke up about luncheon. The morrow after the Embassadors again: where the Magistrates by the voice of the Beadle or pulpite crier, after the return of the Greeks gave liberty to every person to deliver his mind, and no man stepped forth. Great silence there was, and not a word among them for a long time, looking

with one upon another who should begin first. And no marvell if they whose spirits were affonied in some parts within them, when they of their own accord cast and tossed in their minds things so different and contrary, were now more troubled and perplexed by those orations besides that had lasted all the long day, broaching, uttering, and advising many matters so hard, so difficult, and unpleasant unto them. At length, because the Council should not be dissolv'd without some speech and part, Aristides the Prætor of the Achæans began to speak, and said: What is be-ome (my Matters of Achæa) of those hearts of yours and courageous Romans, whereby at all your seats and in your private meetings (when talk is muffled of Philip and the Romans) you cannot hold your hands, but are ready to fly one in another's face? And now, when this honourable Con. of Parliament is published & held for the same purpose only, when we have heard the reasons & allegations of the Embassadors of all parts; when the Magistrates propos'd the matter to be debated in council; when the publick crier calleth you to give your opinions, ye are mum and mute? If the regard of the common good and welfare of us all, will not cause you to open your lips; cannot the private respects & affections which have entwined and carried your minds to the one side or the other, fetch out a word from any of your mouths?

Considering especially, that no man is so gross and blockish, who can be ignorant that now is the very time or never for each one to say and deliver his mind as he will himself, and as he thinketh best, before we resolve and determine of any course: and when a decree or act is once passed that all men are bound (even they themselves that before disliked it) to defend and maintain the same, as a good and profitable accord. This admonition of the Prætor was so far short of drawing any one of them to utter his opinion, that it cau'd not so much as the least noise of humming in so frequent an auditory and congregation of so many States together. Then Aristides the Prætor began again and followed his speech in this manner, It seemeth (my Matters and friends of Achæa, here assembled) that ye are not so much to feck for counsel and advice, but ye are as short of your tongues and loath to speak. And every one here is unwilling to provide for their general good; for fear least he should in any particular peril, My fellowlikewise peers endure would be silent and hold my peace if I were a private person: But now being Præ-tor, I speak thus much. That either there should have no audience at all been given unto the Em-badgers of Achæa, that they ought not to be lent away from hence without an answer: and answer then, how can I without your ordination? now seeing that there is none of you all, who have been summoned hitheer to this Council, that either will or dare say a word to the caucis: L let us examine throughly and consider well in your opinions, those speeces which ye-said yesterday were pronounc'd by the Embassadors; let us (I say) re-view them, as if they had not demanded those things which concerned their own good and commodity, but as though they proposed such points as they esteemed profitable and expedient for us all. The Romans, the Rhodians and King Achæus require our alliance and amity: and in that war which they wage against Philip they think it reason to be aid'd from us, Philip again putreth us in mind of our society with him and of our oath. One while he requireth us to stand and band with him: otherwhiles, he saith he will be content that we should sit still, and meddle neither one way nor other. Is there no man here knoweth the reason, why they that are not yet our allies demand and crave more than he that is our ally already? It is neither the modesty of Philip, nor the impudence of M the Romans that is the cause hereof. The ports and haven-towns they be of Achæa, which mi-mister confidence and assurance to those demanders, and take away the fame from them again.
From Philip we fee nothing but only, an Embassador. The sea-forces of the Romans and their fleet, ride in the harbours of Euboea: they carry all sort of them in the spoiles of the Cities in Euboea. The Conul himself with his land-army of the legions we see disjoynd from us by a small arm, only of the sea ranging at their pleasure all over Phocis and Laris. Marvell now longer if you can, why Cleomedon the Embassador of Philip demanded erewhile so coldly and diffi-cidely, that we should take arms for the King against the Romans; who, if we by vertue of the same league and oath, wherewith he seem'd to charge us in confidence, required of him again, that Philip should defend us both from Nabis and the Lacedaemonians, and also from the Romanians; would be to seek not only of a garrisson and power of armed men to shild us, but likewise of a very answer to shape us. And verily he would be no more ready to satisfy us, than Philip was himself the last year; who notwithstanding he frankly promis'd to levy war against Nabis & thereby affi'd to train and draw the flower of our youth from hence into Euboea, after that he was alone; that if we ourselves agreed to lend him that power, nor yet were willing to entangle our selves to be intercel'd in the Roman war, forgot soon, that society that now he ta-deth and vanteth so much of, and left us to the mercy and devotion of Nabis and the Lacedaemonians, to be spoil'd pilfer'd, and wafted at their pleasures. And surely, so much as I can conceive of Cleomedon his Oration me thinks it hangeth not well together, and one peace thereof for to be yet another. He seemeth to speak of the Roman war contemptuously, as if it were a matter of nothing; sayling the event & issue thereof to be like the former, which they maintained with Philip. How is it then, that he keepeth himself away, and in his absence demandeth 'out help rather than with his personal presence protecteth us both from Nabis & the Romans?
Us, I say, his ancient allies? But what speak I of us? Why hath our suffereth them so to force and win Etruria and Corsica? Why endured he, that so many Cities of Thessaly should be lost?
Now could he abide Laris and Phocis to be over-run so as they are? And Ellis now at this day day so fraughtfully beleaguered, and hocty affaitied? Why quit he the heights of Epirus, and abandoned those impregnable holds upon the River Arsus, by forces neither of his own accord, or howsoever, and when he had forgone and detested himself of that life, which he held, why retired he into the inland parts of his realm for safety? If warning of his own accord he abandoned so many of his allies, and left them to be iopiled and dishonored by the enemy, what can he alledge or say for himself, why those allies aforesaid may not rise for themselves the belt they can? If for fear, let him pardon us likewise if we bearrayed, that we were vauntified by force of armes, and therefore retir'd back, shall we, good Cleon: so remain and endure the army of the Gauls, and their mighty armies, against whom Macedonians were not able to stand? Or, would you have us to believe you, that bear us in hand, henceforth a Roman was not at B present, either with greater numbers of stronger forces than the Aquileto, rather than trust our own eyes, and that which daily we recieve out of receipt, but we do that they encoucrd the Aeolians with their navy, and warred neither men nor ships, nor with the army of a Conul, The maritime Cities of the confederates of This, were also and turned: but all the mediteraneen parts within the continent, were by the from the Roman forces, that Philip iopiled and forragcd the Aeolians in pofturing and seaing for help of the Romans, but all in vain, but now at this day the Romans having flighted the Carthaginian war, which for fifteen years space they supported in the very heart and bowels of Italy, have not sent a garrison to succour and maintain the Aeolians in their wars, but are come themselves, as leaders and commanders General, and by Land and Sea at once have warred up-C on Macedon. And this is the third Conul of theirs, who at this present maintained mortal war upon it, to the uttermost of his power, Selinus hath encountered the King in the midst of Macedon, hidden him battell, did omittcd and put him to flight, after he had laid waft and de-fot the wealthiest quarter of all his Kingdom. Quintius lately hath driven him out of camp and field, not withstanding he were posseffcd of the freights avemies of Epirus, and bare himself boltly and confidently upon the natural intuation of the ground,of his strong defences, and force of a complete army: and having purfued him as he fled into Thessaly, hath taken the garrison Towns of the King, and in manner within his own sight, won by mere force his confederate Citities. Suppose and say, that all those things which the Athenians erewhile have alledged concerning the cruelty, the avarice, and unbridled lust of the King, be not true, but supposcd handers: that admit that those enormities and wicked parts committed within the Attick land, against D the Gods of Heaven above, of the infernal spirts beneath, touch not us at all, and are much lefs pertinent, than those outrages which the Elxantas and the Abydens,so far remote from us, have endured. Forget we our felves, if ye will, the hurts, the wounds, and loffes that we have recei-vved, the murders the pillage and ridding of the goods of Messen in the midst of Likewise, how his friend and holf Gritterus at Cyparissus, was killed against all Law of God and man, even in a manner fittting at the board with meat in his mouth. Say we nothing also of Attalus the father and fon both Sicylonians, who were cruelly maffacrd and yet he was wont to call the filthy and wicked old man, Father. Also forbear us to speak of the sons wife, who was carried away into Macedon, to make her his harlot and combinate to abufe her at his plea-fire. Let other rapes of virgin, forcings of honorable dames be forgotten: let us imagine that we have nothing to do, nor to meddle with Philip for fear of whole cruelty ye were all so mute, and could not open our mouth, For what other cause of silence had ye, being called hither to this counsell? Let us put the case, that we were to debate the matter with Antigonus, that motl mild and just Prince, at whom gracious hands we have received so many favours and pleasures above all others Kings: would he demand, think ye, that we should do that whi. posibly then could not be done? Peloponnesus is a deann Island, joined to the firm continent and main land, by the narrow Strait or Bank of Ithamns, lying open and exposer to nothing more than to Seas forces. If one hundred covert and decked ships with hatches and fifty lighter vessels which are open together, with thirty Britangers or foils of fife, should come to pill and spoil our coasts, and begin and afflict our Towns and Cities that lie open upon the River even on the very strand and Seabanks; should we retire our felves, think ye, into our Cities within the Land? Why? what else? As though we were not already allisterd and plagued with interine war, which fliceketh even within our ribs and bowels? When Nabis and the Lacedemonians by land, the Roman navy by Sea shall lie upon us, to do us all annoy, how should I call upon the Kings society, or for the help of the Macedonians? Or shall we of our felves, by our own strength and means date our Cities which shall be aflafted, against the puifance and power of the Romans? For in the former war we bravely defended (did we not?) the City of Dyme. We have examples ough of the fevere calamities and loffes of others, that we need not to make our felves examples unto others. Take heed (I bedefee you) how you fet light and disdain that the Romans have over theirown motive offered their friendship and alliace, which indeed ye were to wish for, and seek all that ever ye could. It is for very fear (no doubt) that they are driven, being in a strange land to flie unto you for your alliance, because they would gladly throuth themselves under the shadow of your wings, be harboured within your havens, and inflaued by your vicinal and provision. No, no, Lords, they are first of the feas who can deny it? there is not a land they set foot into, but immediately it is their own and in subjection unto them, whatsoever they leem to requet, they can command if they lift, And because they are willing to spare and forbear you, therefor

therefore it is that they suffer you not to enter into any action that might be cause of your ruin or overthrow. For whereas Cleomenes erewhile deemed to throw and lay before you a mean and indifferent course and that fortooth, which should be the fadest way that you could take, name-ly, to enter into no arms at all, to fit fill and sleep in awhile from that, I lay, is no middle way, nor (to speak truth,) any way at all. For besides this, that ye must either accept or refuse the alliance with the Romans, what else will become of us, but to be a prey unto the conqueror, having loft the grace and favour both of the one and the other? As men that like neuters, expecting the issue of the war-frame our demigods and counsels to the blind direction of fortune, Wel, once again I lay, take heed thou think not fcom of that which with all your heart you should with & pray for, only for that it is tendered and presented unto you. And never think, that because to day you have the choice both in your own hands, therefore ye shall ever have the same liberty hereafter. Occasions & opportunities are not always the same, neither do they continue long.
All this whiles have ye had a desire to have and free your selves from Philip, but evermore by wishes & prayers in secret hearts, rather than by taking arms in open hand. Now there are those which with great armies & armadoes have paffed the seas, who without your pain and peril are ready to deliver you from his hands. These men, ye reject and refuse for your allies, ye are not well in your wits, & have them you must either your allies or your enemies, there is no remedy.

After this Oration the Preator, there arose a muttering and noise in the assembly, whiles some approved and gave assent unto that which he said, others rebuked in chamber, while those that accorded. Intomuch, as they jangled not one with another in particular, but the very States there assembled were at variance, & this debate between the Magistrates of the whole nation K (whom they call Demagogi, and ten they are in number) was as hotly maintained, as among the multitude. Five of them said, they would propose unto the people, and debate with them in counsel about accepting the alliance of the people of Rome, and put it to voices. The other five protested, that this was directly against a law, in that case prohibited, for bidding expressly that no Magistrates should either propose or determine in any Diet, prejudicial to the society and league with Philip. Thus was this day also spent in debating and wrangling, and nothing done.
There remained one day yet of a full Diet and Council, for by law they were to conclude and determine somewhat within three days at the farthest. Against that time, the parties were so hotly bent one against the other, that the fathers could hardly forbear to offer violence to their very children. There was one Rhysaphis of Peller, who had a son named Memnon, and he was a Demago, who took part and sided with them that would not permit the matter to be put to question, and determined by a scrutiny of voices. This Rhysaphis having instantly a long time importuned his son, and besought him to suffer the Achæans to provide for their well public, and not by his peevish forwardness undo the state of the whole nation: when he saw once that all his prayers prevailed nothing, he swore a great oath that he would kill him with his own hands and not take him for his son, but for an errant enemy. By which his menaces, he gained such much in the end, that content he was the next day to join with them that put the matter to question: who now being more in number than the other made a report and proposed the cause to the assembly: and when all the States in manner there met, and lined therein, and approved thereof, as they owed openly what they would ordain; the Dymanes, Megapolitans, and certain Argives, before the decree was enacted, rose up all at once, and departed out of the assembly, and no man either wondered at it, or blamed them for it. As for the Megapolitans, no longer ago than when their great fires days, at what time as they were expelled out of their country by the Macedonians K, Antigonus had restored them again. The Dymanes being but lately taken prisoners, and ravished by the Roman army, Philip having given order, that they should be redeemed wherefoever they were in slavery and bondage, he not only set free, but also replenished in their own country. The Argives left, of all, besides that they are of a settled opinion and belief that the Macedonian Kings are de-cended from them, were for the most part linked unto Philip in the right and regard of private hostility, and familiarship. In these respects, they went out of that assembly which inclined to the contract of alliance with the Romans, and were held excused for this departure; being thus obliged unto Philip the averse part by great favours and benefits, ye, and those newly received at his hands, all the other States of the Achæans, when they were demanded their opinions, without delay confirmed by their immediate decree, the society with Alcetas and the Rhodians: but the league with the people of Rome, because it could not be ratified and established without the Act of the people, was referred and put off until the time that Embassadors might be sent unto Rome. But for the present it was thought good that three Embassadors should be addrest unto L. Quintius, and that all the forces of the Achæans should march toward Corinth, for that Quintius having won the port of Cenobrea, was already at the siege and assault of that City.

The Achæans encamped themselves over against that gate that openeth toward Siquione: the Romans lay against that part of the City which looketh toward Cenobrea, and Alcetas having led his army through the narrow street of Thybuns, affailed them of Lechans side, which is an haven of the other Sea. At the first they made no hot assaill, hoping that there would be some mutiny between the Towns-men and the Kings garrison. But perceiving they were all of one mind and resolution, and that both the Macedonians defended the City, as their own native country: and also the Corinthians were content to be at the full command and direction of Androbonus the Captain of the garrison, as well as if he had been their fellow-citizen, and lawfully chosen by their
A their own election and suffrages: then the affillants had no other hope but in the violent force of arms and engines. And of all sides they had raised banks and mures, and were come close to the walls, although with hard access thereto. Now had the Ram, from that quarter where the Romans lay, beaten down a good part of the wall. To which breach, because it lay naked without defence, all the Macedonians ran to guard and defend it by strength of arms: where there was a cruel fight between them and the Romans. At the first the Romans were soon repulsed by means of the great numbers of defendants: but after the succours of the Achæi and Aetolus came unto them, they received them with equal valor: neither doubted they but to be able with ease to drive the Macedonians and the Greeks from their standings, and force them to retreat. But there were within the Town a multitude of Italian fugitives resented and fled from the Romans: part of them, a residue left of Aetolus his army: who having transgressed the laws, forfear of punishment were fled from the Romans, and took part with Philip: part also were mariners and seafaring men, who, for hope of more honorable entertainment and service, had abandoned their ships, and were gotten into the City of Corinth. These fellows had all hope of life, if the Romans had not should have the better hand, armed more like mad men than hardy and audacious foillours. Now there is over-against Sicyone a promontory of Iuno which they call the Cape of Acres, and it runneth into the Sea: from whence the passage over to Corinth is a cut almost of seven miles. Thither Philoctes, a Captain also under King Philip, had conducted through Pythias 1500 foillours: and certain Brigands of Corinth were there ready to embark that supply of aid, and to transport to them to Loc. At this time Aetolus advised to let on the engines and fabrics that they had made, and presently to give over the siege. Quimius persisted yet more obstinately in his enterprise began. But he also seeing the Kings guards ranged and quartered at every gate, and that they should have to fully out their violence would hardly be restrained, was of the same mind with Aetolus. So without effecting anything, the Achæans were dismissed, and the ret returned to their ships, Aetolus to Parnassus, the Romans to Coeryra.

During this service by Sea, etc., the (other) Coniol who lay in camp before Elasa in Phocis, first assailed to gain the City by conference and party with the principal citizens thereof: but after answer made, that it lay not in their hands, and that they who were for the King, went out and the Townsmen both in number and strength: then at one from all parts he gave an assault unto the City both by fire of arms, and also by engines of artillery. The Ram was bent against the walls, and as much thereof beaten down with a minute crash and fearful noise, as stood between the Towers: whereupon the town was dismayed, and laid naked and withal a Cohorte of Roman soldiers entered at the open breach; and so from at once the defendants abandoned their guards, and ran to that place that thus was despoiled by the enemy. And at one instant the Romans advanced themselves over the breach, and let up scalingadders against the wall which was standing, and whiles the enemies were armed wholly, and had their eyes only upon that one place where the onslung was, the wall in many parts was railed, and armed soldiers mounted into the City. At which sudden tumult and alarm, the armed men having quit the place which they guarded with a thick troop fled all into the castle for fear and the unarmed and naked multitude followed after. Thus the Coniol was master of the City: which being ransacked, he went unto the Castle certain meleesens, promising life to a many of the Kings garrison as would depart away without arms, and offering liberty to the Elasians: and after security given hereof, within few days the Castle also was rended into his hands. Moreover, by the arrival of Philoctes (a commander for the King) in Aetolus, not Corinth was delivered from siege, but the City also of the Argives, was by certain of their principal rulers betrayed unto Philoctes, who before had founded and solicited the minds and affections of the common people. There was a tumult in this City that upon the first day of their general assemblies, the Preitor should in token of good luck pronounce the names of Juno, Apollo, and Hercules: and afterwards ordained it was besides by a law, that the name of Philip should make up the fourth. Now after the alliance accorded between them and the Romans it hapned that the beadle or publick cryer left out the name of Philip: whereat the multitude first began to matter and grumble: then arose a loud cry of those that put him in mind to name the King, willing him to give him his honor due by law: until at last his name was also pronounced with great applause and consent. Upon the confidence and assurance of this favour, Philoctes was sent for who by night seated upon an hill that commandeth the City, which commonly is called the fort of Lur Pilis: and having put a garrison thereon the next morning betimes he advanced forward with banner displied, and came down toward the common place lying under the厉害s aforesaid: where there encountered him a band of armed men well appointed in order of battall. These were the garrison of the Achaian lately there placed to the number of 5000 elect men chosen forth of all the States of Achaia: and one Euclides as a Dyman was their commander. Unto him Philoctes (one of the Kings Captains aforesaid) addrest a special messenger to persuade and exhort him to quit the City: giving him to understand, That he and his Company were not able to match the Townsmen alone: who caried the same mind that the Macedonians had done: much less then should they stand out when the Macedonians were joined unto them: the Macedonians (1152) whom the very Romans themselves could not sustain at Corinth. At first he did no good either with lesser or foillours: yea, and when within a while they beheld the Argives also marching armed against them with great troop from another part, and saw present death before their eyes, yet it seemed they would have put it to the hazard of a conflict, and and fought to the last man, in case their Captain would have stuck to it, and not relented. But Eufidemus for fear left together with the City, the flour of all the youth of Acharn should perish, capitalized with Philades, that they might be compelled to depart and go their way: but himself kept his ground still in his armour, with some few of his followers and valets, and removed not a foot. Then Philades sent out unto him, to demand, What he meant thereby? Unto whom he gave no other words, but holding forth his shield before him made answer, That armed as he was he would live and die in the guard and defence of that City which was committed to his charge. Then by the commandment of the Captains, the Thracians lanced their darts and shot at him; and both he and the company about him were slain every one. Thus after the accord of alliance between the Achaean and Romans, two most noble and famous Cities (Argi and Corrinch) came under the subjection of the King. These were the acts achieved by the Romans as well by land as Sea this summer.

In France there was no exploit performed worth remembrance by Sext. Aelius the Consul, notwithstanding he had under his government two entire armies: the one that he retained still with him, which by order he should have discharged, and was the fame that had before been commanded by L. Cornelius the Pro-consul, and now by him was committed to the charge of C. Aelius: the other, that he brought himself with him into the Province. So that he employed the whole year almost in compelling the men of Cremona and Placentia to return into their Colonies, from whence by sundry casualties of war they were chased and dispersed, As France that year was in quiet beyond all hope and expectation, so about the City of Rome there had like to have been a commotion and tumult of bondslaves. The Carthaginian hostages were in guard and kept at Setia, where they had attending about them (as meet was for the children of the chief Nobles and Princes of Carthage) a mighty train and retinue of servants. The number of them was the greater by occasion of the late African war: during which time and presently after, the Setins also themselves had bought up many of that nation which were taken captives, and came in port-fee with the reil of the prizes. Thesel having conspired together, sent out certain of their own company to solicitate also the other slaves that were in the territory of Setia, and so forth, as many as they could find about Norba and Circeti. Their plot was, that when all things were provided a forehand, they should upon the very day of the solemn games and plays (which shortly were to be exhibited and set forth in Setia) take the opportunity of the time, when as the people were busy in beholding the spectacle and showed represented unto their eye, and to run upon them: and when they had by massacre in this sudden hurriedly possessed themselves of Setia, then to go forward and surprize Norba and Circeti. This horrible compot and conspiracy was detected, and information given at Rome to L. Cornelius Merula Pretor at that time of the City. For two bond-slaves early in a morning before day, presented themselves unto him, and opened from point to point in order, namely, what had been contrived and done, and what remained yet to do. The Pretor having taken order for their safe custody at home within his own house, called the Senate together; where, after he had recounted and declared unto them what these informers had revealed, he was commanded to go abroad to search out and repres this conspiracy. Forth he matched with five Lieutenants of the camp, and look how many he could meet with in his way all over the fields, villages, and hamlets, he tended unto them a military oath, and constrained them to arm and follow him. Thus in this hasty manner of levy, he armed well near 2000, and with them all together (who knew not whither he meant to go, nor to what piece of service he led them) to Setia he came. At his first entrance, he suddenly in great haste apprehended the principal heads of the conspiracy: whereupon the slaves fled out of the Town. Then were sent out certain into the fields, to trace and to find them out by their tracks. In this business there were two bondslaves and one free man that performed singular good service. Unto him the LL. of the Senate gave order that there should be paid 100000 Allies in bras coin: but unto the slaves 25000 and their freedom. For the redemption of whom, their masters were contented their full price out of the Chamber of the City. Not long after, it was reported that the remnant of this conspiracy purposed to surprize Fraccia. Thither marched L. Cornelius the Pretor of the City, where he executed about 300 persons who were found guilty. The City was in great fear to see how the hol-gests and captives of the Carthaginians prefixed such troubles. Therefore in Rome a standing watch was kept in every street: and the inferior Magistrates were charged to see to it and to walk the street, and the Tribunals likewise (for three Sheriffs) to have a better eye and look to the Quarry-prison. The Pretor also directed his letters into all quarters of the Latin nation to this effect, That all the hostages should be kept within doors, and not suffer to go abroad into the streets: That all captives and prisoners should have gives about their heels of pound weight at least, and be kept in no other ward but in the common goal.
The same year came Embassadors from King Attalus, who prefented in the Capitol a golden Crown of 246 pound weight, with great thanksgiving unto the Senate, that King Antiochus in regard of the authority and countenance of the Roman Embassadors, had withdrawn his forces out of the confines of Attalus. The same number two hundred men of arms, ten Elephants, and 200000 Modii of wheat sent from King Mysamia, arrived at the camp in Greece. Likewise out of Sicily and Sardinia, there was sent great store of victual and livery for the army. In Sicily M. Marcellus was Governor, and in Sardinia M. Porcius Cato, an upright man and living without touch and reproach, lave only he was thought somewhat too severe in refraining of ultery.

Six Proconsuls being returned to Rome out of France in regard of the general assembly for election of Magistrates, created Conflus on, Cornelius Cæcilius and Q. Qeminius Rupas. And two days after, the election was held for Proconsuls. This year first were chosen six Proconsuls. Thereupon the number of Provinces increased; and the Roman Empire and Seignory extended farther. And there were, to wit, L. Manilius Volo, Cn. Sempronius Tidiantus, M. Sergius Sicius, M. Helvius, M. Munius Rufus, and L. Aelius. Of these, Sempronius and Helvius were Electors of the Commons; Q. Minucius Thurinus and T. Sempronius Longus Ediles of the chair. The Roman games this year were four times renewed. Cn. Cornelius and Q. Qeminius being Conflus, above all things went in hand with the Province of Conflus and Proconsuls; and first they disputed the matter that concerned the Proconsuls (a matter that might be decided by calling lots.) To Sergius fell the jurisdiction of the City, and to Minucius the herculean, or strangers. Aelius was appointed to Cæcilius, M. Munius to Sicily. Sempronius to that part of Spain between Italy and Tunis; and Helvius into the other beyond the River.

When the Proconsuls were upon the point to call lots likewise for their provinces: namely, Italy and Macedon, L. Oppius, and Q. Fulvius Tribunes of the Commons, interposed themselves and aided them, alledgeing: 'That Macedonia was a province lying far off, and there was no one thing that had more empowered and hindered the proceeding of wars to that day than this, that in to remove part, the Consul ever of the former year was called home before he were led in his affairs, and when he should be employed most in wars. Now have there four years already gone over our heads, i.e. we desired and continued to follow the Macedonian war; during which time, Sulpicius spent the greatest part of his year in seeking after the King and his army; Fulvius, when he should encounter the enemy, was called away before he had liked any exploit.' For Quintus, he was kept at Rome still for the most part of the year, in attendance, because the King and his, and the affairs of war under his conduct were managed so well, that either he had gone sooner into his province, or the winter had been later, he might have dispatched the wars; and now, that he is ready to retire into his standing camp and wintering, the republic is, that he hath brought the war to that good pace and forwardress that we see he be not hindered by a new successor, in all likelyhood and appearance, he will make a final end thereof this next summer.

With these specers they prevailed so much, that the Conflus for their part promised to be ordered and let down by the Senate on this behalf, upon condition, that the Tribunes would be content to do the like. Now when of both sides, they had referred themselves to a free and absolute consultation the LL. of the Senate assigned to both the Conflus the government of Italy, and continued the command of the army fell with Q. Minucius, until there came another to succeed him. Two legions were appointed for the Conflus, with commission to war upon the Greeks between Rome and the Alps, who had revolted from the people of Rome. And for Quintus ordained it was, that there should be sent into Macedonia into him, a new supply of 5000 foot, 300 horse, and 3000 seadivers and mariners. And likewise, that the same L. Quintus Flaminius should be Admiral of the navy, as before. For the Proconsuls who were to go into Spain, there was an allowance of 8000 footmen out of the allies of the Latin nation, and 400 horse men, so that they diffimil the old footmen out of Spain; and enjoined they were to limit and let out the bounds of their several provinces, whereas the higher Spain and the lower should part. And for Macedonia there were two Lieutenant-masters for the army appointed, to wit, P. Sulpisius and P. Villius, who had been Conflus both, and in that province.

Before that either Conflus or Proconsuls went out into their provinces, it was thought good to take order for the prodigious tokens which happened. For at Rome the Temple of Vesta and S. Quiri at Fregilla the wall and a gate of the City, were broken with lightning. At Praeneste it appeared light (as it had been clear day) in the night thatason. At Asculum a Lamb was seeing hanging two heads and five feet. Also at Forma two wolves entered into the Town, and worried some that were in their way. Last of all, at Rome there was a wolf, that not only came into the City, but went forward as far as to the Capitol.

C. Aelius a Tribune of the Commons proposed a law, that there should be five Colonies conducted to the sea side and there plantee: two at the mouth of the Rivers Tiberina and Litterina, one at Praestia, another in the Burrough Town of Salapia, and to make the rest, * Luccenium was adjoined to the rest. Into every Colony order was taken, that there should be thirty hundred men. The three Commissaries, called Triumphs, for the conducting of these Colonies were created: namely, M. Sexilicus Gemmian, Q. Minucius Thurinus and T. Sempronius Longus, * Scaean. These three had commission to continue in the charge of this office three years. After the manner, and all other matters accomplished, pertaining to God and man that were by the Conflus to be performed, then they let forth both into their provinces. Conflus took his way directly against the Insulians, who accompanied with the Cenomani, were entered at that time into arms: Q. Minucius in his journey bare on the left hand of Italy toward the nearer sea; and conducting his army to Gemina, begin with the Ligurians to make war. C. Fiscinum and Lutobadii, Towns both of the Ligurians, likewise two States of the fame nation, the Celcusi and the Cerdicats succeduced unto him: innumerable as all the country on this side the Po, were in insubordination to the

Romans,
Romans, except the Boians among the Gauls, and the Illustri among the Ligurians. By report H there were fifteen Towns containing twenty thousand men, which yielded unto them. From thence he led the legions into the territory of the Boians. The army of the Boians had passed over the Po a little before, and joined with the Insubrians and Cannons: for hearing that the Confuls would war jointly with both their forces, they intended likewise to make themselves more strong, by uniting and bringing their power together. But the truth being blown abroad, that once of the Confuls invaded and fired the country of the Boians, presently there were arumal. For the Boians demanded, that they all in general would help them in their diffirtles. The Insubrians refused and laid, That they would not abandon their own confines: by which occasion they distanced. The Boians went to the defence of their own country, and the Insubrians with the Cannons, fat them down upon the banks of the River Aunius. Five miles beneath that place, the Conful I Cornelius also encamped himself near the said River: from whence he sent certain messengers all about the villages, and to Brixia, the head City of that nation: and being advertised sufficiently that the youth was up in arms, without the warrant and content of their ancients; and that the Cannons joined not with the Insubrians in their rebellion by virtue of public counsel and authority: he sent for the principal persons among them, and began to labour and deal with them, that the Cannons would forsake the Insubrians, and openly with their ensigns advanced, either to return into their own country, or turn to the Romans. This they could not bring them to: howbeit they assur'd the Conful, that in the field they would either fit full and do nothing else, if any good opportunity was presented unto them, they would aid the Romans. The Insubrians knew nothing of this complicity: and yet, some doubt and suspicion they had, that their allies halted, and were not K found of all hours: and therefore when there was occasion to lead forth to fight a field, they durst not trust them with either of the two wings and points of the battle, for fear if they retreated like fable brethren, they should hazard the main chance: but placed them behind the ensigns in the rearguard. The Conful in the beginning of the battle vowed a Temple to Jesus Spathius, in case he discomfited the enemies that day, and put them to the rout. The footsoldiers set up a shout, and cried aloud that they would bring it to pass that the Conful should have his desire, and therewith charged the enemy right fiercely. The Insubrians could not abide the first shock. Some write, that in the very conflict the Cannons also suddenly let upon their back, whereby they were distressed, and in danger both before and behind; and that there were slain enclosed in the mids five and thirty thousand of the enemies, and seven hundred taken prisoners, and among them Amilcar the General of L the Carthaginians, who was the cause of this war: also that there were a hundred and thirty ensigns carried away, and of chariots above two hundred. All the Towns that followed this revolt, yielded to the Romans.

Aunius the Conful, at the beginning made excursions into the country of the Boians, walling and spoiling it all over; but afterwards when they had forstaken the Insubrians, and were retired home to defend and save their own, he kept himself within camp, making full account to trie a last battle with the enemy. Neither would the Boians for their part have been behind, but ready to have answered them, had not the rumor of the Insubrians overthrow, daunted and broken their hearts. Wherupon they forsook their leader, quit the camp, and betowered themselves in the Towns and Villages to guard every man his own, and quite altered the course of their enemy his M war, and put him besides his account. For the Conful put all hope now to determine the quarrel in one ranged battle, began again to forrage the fields, burn all buildings, and force Towns by assault. Much about the same time Cladius was set on fire. And from thence the legions were conducted against the Insubrians among the Ligurians, who only flew out and would not come in, and yielded obedience. Which nation like wise hearing that the Insubrians were defeated in a battle, and that the Boians were so feared, that they durst not venture the fortune of a field, submitted themselves. At the same time the letters of the Conuls, containing their happy affairs in France, were brought to Rome. Cladius the Praetor of the City first read them in the Senate, and after wards by the advice of the Senators, rehearsed them in a full audience and assembly of the people. And a procession was decreed for the space of four days.

Now was winter come, and whilst T. Quininius after the winning of Elatea, attended his armies in divers harbors within Pius and Locres, there arose a mutiny in Opus. The one faction sent for the Aetolians their near neighbours to side with them; and the other for the Romans. The Aetolians came first, but the mightier faction would not suffer them to enter in: for having dispatched a messenger to the Roman General, they held the Town until his coming. The Kings garrison kept the fortresses, neither could they be brought to a sanction either with the menaces of the O-puntians, or the authority and countenance of the Roman commander. The only let and stay why it was not immediately assailed was this: Because there was come an herald from the King, requiring time and place of a parle, which with much ado was granted to the King: not because Quininius of him self was not defirous and wished that he might be thought to have ended this war, O by force of arms or conditions of peace; for as yet he knew not whether one of the new Conuls should be sent to succeed him, or his government continued full unto him (according as he had given his friends and kinsfolk in charge to bring that about by all the endeavours and means that he could make;) but he supposed verily, that this parling would be to good purpose for him, if it might be in his liberty to drive matters unto war if he stayed full, or draw to a peace if he departed home. So upon the Brand and shore of the gulf Maera, they chose a place near unto Nysa, Thither
A Thither came the King by water from Demetrios with five brigantins or pinnaces, and one ship of war with a brace beak-head. There accompanied him the chief I. of Macedonia, and Cyclades a noble personage of great mark among the Achæans, and one that was thence banished. With the Roman General were King Aminander, Dionysodorus an Embassador of King Attalus, and Aegeomnnes Admiral of the Rhodian fleet. Phanes the chief and principal Magistrate of the Achæans, and two Achæans Aristobulus and Xenophon. The Roman General in the mids of the e, advanced himself forward to the edge of the very shore, even to the bank side, whiles the King came forward to the beforedeck of his ship standing at anchor : and thus he began and said unto the King: "Sir, you may do better to come ashore that we may commune and confer together close, and both speak and hear one another more easily. The King refrained to do so: and why? quoth

B "Quintus, who is it that you fear? a man may know? Then with a hasty spirit and kindlike: If

C feart none (quent he) but the immortal Gods: but I mistrust not the fidelity of all that I see here ab:

count you, and, namely, the Achæans least of all other. Why (quoth Quintus again) this is the crime of all them that come to play with enemies; namely, to be in danger one of ano-other. Yeansly, quoth the King, but by your leave Quintus, the price and recompence of tre-chery and falsehood (if it should come to that) is not all one for killing Philip and Phanes: for the Achæans should not find it so hard a matter to substitute another Pretor, as the Macedonians to create another King in my room. This said, there was not a word more to the point: while the Roman General thought it reason that he should begin who fought for a pæle; and the King supposed it meet that it was his part to speak first who should give conditions, and not for him that stood at receipt, and was to accept thereof. Then Quintus began and said, that his speech should be plain and simple: for he would say no more, but propose only those points which if it might not be performed, there would be no peace upon any condition at all. First, that the King must withdraw his garrisons out of all the Cities of Greece, Item, that he is to deliver up all the prisoners and fugitives revoluted that he hath, unto the allies of the people of Rome, Item, That he re-ture to against the Romans all his fort pieces in Abydus, which after the peace concluded in Epistus, he had seized upon. Last of all, that he surrender unto Ptolemaeus King of Egypt, all those Cities which he poissessed himself of after the death of Ptolemaeus Philopator. These (faith he) are the conditions, that I and the people of Rome do demand: but meet it besides, that you hear the demands also of the allies. Then the Emassador or agent for King Attalus required, that the ships captives which had been taken in the Sea-fight before Chius, should be rendered and that Nica-ceropolis and the Temple of Venus, which he had pillaged and spoilt, should be restored as good and entire, as they were before. After him, the Rhodians made claim to Pera (a country in the continent right over-against their Isle, and an ancient appurtenance of their Seignory) and demandded within, that the garrisons should quit Isatis, Bargon, and the City of the Eunomians, and about Hellespontus, likewise the Cities of Selinus and Abidos. Item, that Panopolis should be restowed unto the Bizanzians, with the ancient charter of their franchises and liberties. Finally, that all the Merchant Towns and Ports in Asia might be freed from paying customs. Then came upon him the Achæi, and challenged Corinbas and Argos as their own. After them, when as Phanes the Pretor of the Achæans) had demanded in a manner the same that the Romans had before;

E namely, that the Kings forces should depart out of Greece, adding moreover, that those Cities should be rendred unto the Achæans which in times past belonged to their dominion and juridicit then one of the heads of the Achæans named Alexander, an eloquent man among them, as any other, presently interred and said, "That he had long time often seen, and opened not his mouth, not because he thought that in all this conference they would grow to any point or conclusion, but for that he would not interrupt any of their allies in their speech. And as for Philip, quoth he, he dealt not soundly and bom-fide in treaties of peace, no more than ever herebefore he had managed his wars with verite and true value. For in all these parleys and conferences he layed trains, and liet to catch advantages: in war he never triketh a battral in plain field, not come to clothe fight hand to hand, but in his routes and fights, burneth and lacketh Ci-pies: and thus being himself vanquished,spoilet and makes havoc of that which by right is due reward and recompence of conquerors. But the noble Macedonian Kings in old-time, took no such courtesies. Their manner was to fight it out in open field, and to fare Cities and Towns, all that ever possibily they could; to the end that their dominion might be more wrestly and perilous. For what kind of policy is it, for him to ruinate and destroy utterly that, about the pollition whereof he is in question, and relieve nothing for himself but only war? This Philip the year past hath laid before in Thessale more Cities of his allies there, than all the enemies have done that ever Thessale had; and hath taken more from the Achæans themselves, while he was a confederate and friend with them, than all the time that he was their professed enemy. He hath jeazed upon Xemodamus, expelled their Pretor, and chased out the garrision of the Achæans.

ablefull falsehood and deceit he is poissessed of * Thebes in Phthia, Echnuns, Lariqas, and Vberonas.

Philip netted and galled at these words of Alexander, commanded that his ship should approach nearer to the bank, to the end that himself might be better heard. And as he began to frame bitter involves against the Achæans principally, Phanes cut him off,Isaying, That the quarrel was not to be decided by word, but with the sword: and either he must win it by mere force, or yield obedience to the mightier. That is true, quoth Philip, and to evident, that a blind man may see it;

A to his mind, or else would come off and suffer himself to be persuaded and over-ruled by them. The place of meeting was appointed upon the strand near Tharsis: and thither they repaired on both parts betimes. There Philip first and foremost, befought both Quintus and all those that were present, not to disturb the hope of peace, but that it might come to some effects: and in conclusion, craved time wherein he might send his Embassadors unto the Senate of Rome: assuring them, that if he could not obtain peace under those articles aforesaid, he would accept of any other conditions, which it should please the Senate to put upon him. All the rest thought he did suppose that he ought for nothing else but delays and tract of time, whiles he might gather his forces together. But Quintus interfered again, That well it might be to and at truth indeed that they alledged, if it were summer time and a season fit for war and mortal exploits: but now, considering winter was at hand, they could lose nothing by granting him respite to address an embassage.

For neither (as he) will any capillimation and composition which we should make with Philip stand good and firm without the approbation of the Senate, and in this one winter (when of necessity we must first ease from war) it may be known what the Senate by their authority will approve. To this advice the chief of the confederates acceded, and therein refuted. So there was a cessation of arms for two months granted: in which mean time it was thought good, that each of them likewise should dispatch one Embassador to advertise the Senate, to take heed they were not over-rush'd by the solicitude and strain of the King. But provided it was in the covenant of the truce aforesaid, That incontinently the Kings garrisons should void the territories of Phocis and Locris. Quintus also himself sent (together with the Embassadors of the allies) to Amissus, King C. of the Athenians; and to make the embassage more honourable, Q. Fabius (his own wives filters) for Q. Fabius and P. Claudius accompanied the King.
